The Life Story of "The Quiver Waifs."

IN this driving age, when the crowds stream along, some making haste to be rich, others bent as eagerly on pleasure, and the greater number, with the lines of stern duty impressed on their faces, toil on, every faculty of the mind on the stretch in the struggle to keep their heads above water—in these days, when we have learned all too well the lesson of minding our own business, how liable we are to overlook those who are not in the flow of the stream at all—the hapless ones who are sinking in whirlpools, or lie stranded on mud-banks!

As we troop on, what slender thought we give to the little street children that dodge about our knees or play in the gutter! Sometimes, in the midst of our schemes and calculations, we drop our eyes and note them, amid all the bustle of the crowded thoroughfares, wandering aimlessly along, now and again idly pausing to look over a bridge, or vacantly staring at the big posters on the walls, for all the world as if they were strangers and in a foreign land.

How seldom do we pause and reflect that beneath that tattered hat or shock head there is a world of surging ideas, hopes many and fears dire; in that little bosom, though it has but a rag of shirt to cover it, there are affections deep and true, and very often a generosity and unselfishness which the Piercing Eye, that singled out the poor widow casting into the treasury all her living, will approve as princely and heroic.

The wretched homes of the abject poor, how often have they been described—the darkness, the rotten stair, the sickening odour that clings to the roof of the mouth as one recalls it, the wretched room with the five or six occupants, the heap of rags that serves for a bed, the moaning, sick child that lies upon it, the woman uncombed and in rags, crushed and dispirited, the baby in her arms that does not smile, but seems to look out aghast at the world it has entered. These things once seen are not to be forgotten; and when added to all this we find drunkenness, immorality, and cruelty, how appalling is the picture! Yet, in this atmosphere, thousands of children, perhaps as tender and as winsome as our own, are brought up.

For a moment we think of our own childhood. We had a father who was the embodiment of justice, and a mother who was incarnate love; but thousands of these waifs and strays are worse than orphaned. From the very commencement of their lives the landmarks of right and wrong are broken up; and as for justice, they do not know that such a thing exists.

You have glanced up at your boy as he bounces into the room with glowing face and fearless eye. Have you noticed the drunkard's child as he creeps home, how his steps slacken as he approaches the door, how he peers inside to see if his father has returned? Have you marked his attitude as he holds the knob of the door in his hand, ready to advance or ready to retreat? Have you seen how he scans the drunkard's face, how he drops his voice? how keenly he watches the moods of the fierce irrational giant he calls by the name of out some hand stretched out to help, some finger to point upward?

It is a grand feature of our times that so many warm human hearts throb with sympathy for these hapless ones—that so many have bent all their energies to the noble work of rescuing them from the life of wretchedness, dishonesty, and shame which is almost inevitable.

Our readers have no doubt followed with deep interest the accounts we have given from time to time of such noble workers in this field as Dr. Barnardo, Miss Rye, and others. We have determined, with God's blessing and with the aid of the readers of THE QUIVER, to bear a hand in this Christ-like work.

It is a labour full of promise, and almost the only key to the vexed question of what to do with the outcast classes. For though it is impossible to straighten and untwist the gnarled and crooked thorn that for years has wound its tortuous roots into the soil and flung its perverse branches overhead, yet the tender sapling may be checked and directed, for within it there is still the law which makes it stretch its head upward towards the light.

In opening this new volume of THE QUIVER we inaugurate a new work. We have resolved, in the name of our readers, to adopt two "QUIVER Waifs"—a little boy, who is to be under Dr. Barnardo's care to be clothed, fed, and trained, at our expense, for a useful and godly life, and a little girl, one of Miss Rye's flock.

And now we will tell you a little of the history of these "QUIVER Waifs," hoping that you will take an interest in them, and render what assistance you can, for their own sake, and for the sake of Him who said, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these, My little ones, ye did it unto Me." Particularly do we hope that our younger readers will, in thankfulness to God for their happier lot, join heartily in the work of rescuing these little souls from misery and ruin.

It is but a short time since we went to see our "QUIVER Waifs," Mary Jane, the little girl of our adoption, is a bright, interesting child of seven years. She looked so sweet and clean in the brown dress and large white pinafore which had been provided for her, that we could not refrain from giving her a kiss.

We give you here a sketch, taken from life, of Mary Jane. So bright and happy she looks now, that you would never dream that she had suffered much from privation and cruel ill-treatment. But it is so. Her father died, and her mother married again, and treated the poor little thing with the utmost brutality.

We have all sung the hymn—

"Can a woman's tender care
Cease toward the child she bare?
Yes! she may forgetful be—"

and we have felt the pathos of the lines. But it is only too true that there are women who have sunk to that very lowest state of not only neglecting, MARY JANE.

(The QUIVER Girl Waif.)

—father? Truly, he lives on the brink of a volcano, and cunning and deceit are his only protection. Deep wells of love and hope, and desire for excellence, are in his heart, God-implanted, but will they not be choked and dried up amid such surroundings, with-but of positively hating their own little ones. Such a one is Mary Jane's mother. The neighbours were alarmed for the child's safety, and when it was proposed to take Mary Jane off her mother's hands she was only too glad to get rid of her.

At night, when the lady at Miss Rye's Home undressed the little one to wash her, she found great wales and lashes scored into her back—the work of a mother's hand!

But all that is over now for Mary Jane: her face beams with happiness, for she has heard the music of kind words, and no longer does she live in dread of cruel blows. She is being trained for a cheerful and useful life in Canada, and will soon be sailing over the Atlantic in company with other rescued ones, and most likely by the time these pages are in the hands of our readers she will be safely housed in Miss Rye's Home at Niagara.

Now for our other "QUIVER Waif," a sketch of whom we give also.

Little Willie is a gipsy-looking boy, with dark hair and wistful brown eyes. He is a bright, intelligent little fellow, about ten years of age.

All his life has been spent tramping about the country with his mother. Hungry, ragged, and dirty, they travelled from place to place, gaining a miserable living by selling such small articles as pins, needles, and matches; and when their stock-in-trade ran short, by singing and begging. At the end of each day's tramp they found shelter in the casual ward, but often enough, when the distance from workhouse to workhouse was too great for the child's weary little feet, they would lie down to sleep beneath the night sky in some barn-yard or under a hedge.

The little homeless wanderer had longings for something better than this mode of life. He had heard, as he dragged on from town to town, or slept huddled together with others in the casual ward, that there were men and women in this world who lovingly cared for the homeless and destitute ones, and that Homes had been established, where such as he were taught to read and write, and put in the way of earning an honest living.

So deep was the little fellow's aversion to the life of a vagabond, that he told his mother that he would run away from her, unless she placed him in some institution where he would be trained to become a respectable man.

Little Willie is eager to learn, and his ambition is to be a carpenter. He came down yesterday to see us at our house by the water; his admiration of all he saw was great. He says he "should like to bide here always." It would have done you good to see his eyes when a fruit pie was brought on the table at dinner-time.

He is a gentle little fellow, and our children took to him at once. They led him down to the water-side, and showed him all the attractions of the place, and on leaving he said "it was the best day he had ever had in all his life." If our readers could have seen him, certainly our cause would have required no further pleading.

LITTLE WILLIE.
(The QUIVER Boy Waif.)

These are the little Waifs you are asked to care for and support. Surely in every way it is a sound and Christ-like work. Little ones who are precious in the sight of God are sinking into the miry clay and horrible pit of vice and hopeless degradation for the want of a hand stretched out to help in the morning of their lives whilst yet there is hope.

The Editor of THE QUIVER, whose address is La Belle Sauvage, London, E.C., will be glad to receive any contribution in answer to the appeal of "THE QUIVER Waifs;" in the meantime, by the kindness of the proprietors of this magazine, he has been enabled to advance the sum necessary for the first year's support of these little ones—whom surely, had Jesus been living on earth now as of old, He would have taken in His arms and blessed. Indeed, they ARE His little ones, and the readers of THE QUIVER will assuredly love and cherish them for His sake.

NOT ALL IN VAIN.

CHAPTER I.

AN EVENTFUL SUNDAY.

"Unregardful of aught else, beheld
Her face, and looking in her face, saw youth,
And beauty shining in the light of youth,
And seeing, loved."

ON a bright, cold Sunday in mid-March, early in the morning, the solitary waiter at the Royal Alexandra Marine Hotel, Flashford-on-Sea, stood at the hotel entrance surveying the prospect. Not that it was new to him—that stretch of sea, where the little waves raced so merrily along, and the brown fishing-smacks swayed lazily at anchor in the miniature harbour—but chiefly because, for the moment, he had nothing to do. The square-topped railway station to the left, and the tinsel-Gothic Town Hall to the right, closed in the view. Just at hand the church bells of St. Cecilia chimed out a blithe invitation to all and sundry to hie thitherward and worship.

But to all these attractions the countenance of Duke, the hotel waiter, betokened a noble indifference. He was a short, fat, greasy man, who "man and ooy" had been an appendage of the Royal Marine Hotel. Indeed, it was his firm conviction that that establishment could not get along, deprived of his services. And perhaps he was right.

There was but one guest staying in the hotel this sharp March morning, when the east wind drove the dust in clouds along the sea road. He had come out from the neighbouring manufacturing town of Bullionston late the night before: not to stay for long, for he brought but a small Gladstone bag with him. This young man had not yet entered an appearance in the breakfast-room, to the intense annoyance of Mr. Duke, who, in his leisure moments, sang in St. Cecilia's choir. He was used to missing many a service in August and September, when it was "the Season," and the hotel was crowded with visitors; but to be delayed and kept away from his place in the choir for the sake of only one, and that a hale young man, who should have been out of his bed long since, was really most vexatious.

A slow, lazy step echoed along the tiled corridor, and, turning, he beheld the said young man coming to the open door to look out at the morning.

Stephen Wray stretched himself in the cold, keen sunshine, filling his lungs with a great breath of the fresh sea air. A Londoner born and bred, he never tired of the sea, when he could get it. He was a strikingly handsome youth, slight and tall, and wiry-looking, with eager blue eyes full of fun and frolic. He looked as if he had never had a care in his life—which was indeed the truth. Broad-shouldered, remarkable rather for length of limb than weight of flesh, he looked a manly young fellow enough. A deep upward crease between his brows might mean temper, but did not. He possessed a temper absolutely sweet and sound. Neither did this perpendicular line betoken studiousness or intense thoughtfulness. His Oxford career, now lying behind him in the past, had been eminently respectable rather than brilliant. He was at that happy age when the man begins to mould the life, and the boy is left behind. Athletics were no longer the supreme interest in life. At three-and-twenty years of age, although happy as a boy, and with something of a boy's simplicity still lingering about him, he had put away childish things, and felt the young, strong manhood stir within his pulses.

"What bell is that?" he asked, seating himself at the breakfast-table to which the waiter deferentially summoned him.

"St. Cecilia's, for morning service, sir."

"I shan't be in time," looking at his watch.

"No, sir. But at Biffey Church they don't begin till noon. At St. Cecilia's we have the best of music, and very short sermons, sir. Mr. Fletcher wouldn't think of trespassing on our attention more than fifteen minutes or so; while they do say, down to Biffey Church, Dr. Romney, being as it were a gentleman of the old school, goes on preaching for close upon an hour. He forgets himself, like."

"And where is Biffey?" asked the young man.

"Biffey!" with a scornful arching of eyebrows. "Oh, Biffey is down in the back streets. This is Flashford."

Here it must be explained that Flashford was a parasitic outcome of Biffey, an ancient and mildewed fishing village. In the neighbouring manufacturing town of Bullionston, where the factory chimneys crowded close, and the narrow streets were dense with smoke and dirt, there had arisen a cry for fresh air, for sea-breezes to blow the roses back into the children's faces and the brightness to their eyes, and resultant of this outcry was Flashford-on-Sea. Rows of terraces, semi-detached villas, sprang into being with the rapidity of Jonah's gourd; a new church was built, as well as one or two dissenting chapels; the aborigines, sorely displeased, withdrew into their own borders, and refused to have any dealings with the outer barbarians of Flashford. But Flashford managed to exist, notwithstanding, and, indeed, succeeded, with its Royal Crescents and Albert Edward Terraces, in completely elbowing poor old Biffey out of sight and out of mind.

Bullionston held calmly on its way, sending out its annual inundation of summer visitors, and unmindful of the feud between the old town and the new, merely demanding there should be found in either a reliable butcher and baker, and pleased that on that tame, flat coast no cliffs should be for the children to fall over, and be prematurely cut off in their early bloom.

"And so there's a church at Biffey," said Stephen Wray, "where morning service commences at noon. What do they call their church?"

"Just Biffey Church, sir—Biffey Church plain," replied Duke, with a touch of scorn. "As to a bell, they've none. The Biffey people say, quite proud like, they've been going to church, man and boy, since there was a church to go to, and they don't want no bells at this time of day to remind them of their dooty. I like St. Cecilia's myself: everything there is most correct and in order; Mr. Fletcher, if I may so speak, 'aving served his time in one of the superior London churches."

Stephen made a wry face.

"No London-and-water for me," he said, rising from the table. "Besides, in any case I am late for St. Cecilia's. The bell has ceased for some time. I shall go to Biffey."

"Dr. Romney is a fine old gentleman of the old school, but tedious, sir, tedious," replied Duke, loquacious as a hairdresser; and in a few moments more he stood at the Royal Alexandra door again, contemplating Mr. Wray as he sauntered down the garden path, and out on the road by the sea.

The young man walked on slowly, enjoying the fresh cold air and the bright sunshine, which beautified even ugly, staring Flashford. Presently he found himself outside St. Cecilia's, standing spick and span in the centre of her own greensward. He could hear the chanting within as he paused a moment, irresolute, at the open gate. But Stephen Wray had a vein of perversity in his character, which, developed, might go far to make an unbearable oddity of him in his latter days; and just because St. Cecilia was there at hand, looking so trim and new and orderly, he would have none of her, but turned off resolutely to seek and find poor old despised Biffey in the back streets.

To seek and find Biffey.

Yes, Stephen Wray—that is all very well. Here you are with a Sunday on your hands to spend as best you may in this strange place. You may as well go seek and find Biffey. It will be something to do.

And find what else besides?

Would you now, as you stand a moment at St. Cecilia's gate irresolute, if the veil over your future were to lift an instant and show you what is to come of your going to Biffey Church this Sunday morning—would you go on? Or would you slip into a modest back seat at St. Cecilia's, and listen to the fifteen minutes' ethical discourse of the polished Mr. Fletcher, and return to London to-morrow morning no better and no worse than you came?

The way to Biffey was not hard to find. After he had gone some way along the main street, with its double line of closed shops, he came on small groups of people with books in their hands, all wending in one direction. With these he mingled, and presently found himself in a narrow lane bordered by two high walls, with clustering ivy on the top.

A high gate, wide open, introduced the churchyard to his notice, and he turned in. The tall and stately young stranger caused a sensation, of which he was beautifully unconscious, as he walked up the aisle of the dark little church. The ancient verger considered the classic retirement of the Rectory pew the only fitting destination of the distinguished stranger, and accordingly popped him in there.

Stephen nearly gasped as the intense and consistent hideousness of the building suddenly rushed in upon his soul. The church was low, flat-ceiled, white-washed, and perfectly square. It was an ordinary room, in fact, with a three-decker arrangement of table, reading-desk, and pulpit at one end, and an object in the form of a diving-bell gracefully poised above the pulpit.

Presently a side door near him opened suddenly, and admitted a burst of wintry sunshine and two individuals—an old gentleman and a young lady.

Stephen Wray almost gasped, and rubbed his eyes as this vision burst upon him. It was not the classical beauty of the young woman—he had not eyes to look at her—but the supreme elegance of this marvellous old gentleman which made him wonder.

Never before had he beheld a mortal man gotten up in a cut-away velvet coat with lace ruffles, several brilliant waistcoats of silks and satins, knee-breeches and buckled shoes, and long hair worn in a queue.

This quaint apparition of bygone modes came right on to the Rectory pew, filling all the church with his benignant smiles. Courteously he held open the pew door to allow his companion to step in.

Then he marched in himself, and seating himself, looked curiously at Stephen Wray. The young man felt rather uncomfortable.

"I trust I do not intrude," whispered Stephen hastily, for the square high pew, with its seats all round and carpeted floor, seemed to him more like a private room than a seat in a church.

"Not at all, sir," responded the old gentleman, bowing in the most chivalrous style imaginable.

Stephen returned this courteously inclination with a brusque bow of the Jack-in-the-box style of salutation common in these degenerate days, when elegance of deportment may be classed among the lost arts.

At this moment a venerable harmonium—which, like most things present, had seen better days—began to wheeze forth a melancholy melody; the ancient sexton took up his position in front of a cushioned stand, whereon reclined an enormous prayer-book; and a heavy-browed, ponderous man in a crumpled surplice made his appearance, and clambered up into the second storey of those mysterious railed-off spaces at the end of the church.

The old gentleman in the pew with Stephen politely handed him a book, and the service began to drag its slow length along.

Stephen was longing to study his companions, especially the younger one, but politeness forbade him. He furtively looked within his book, and found, inscribed in faded ink, a legend, setting forth the gift of the said book to "George Frederick Augustus Drury, from his loving sister, Hilda Romney." The prayer-book fervently besought blessings upon "our most gracious and religious sovereign, King George the Third," and was furthermore adorned with long s's, which wofully puzzled poor Stephen's intellectual capacities.

Since he had been a curly-headed little thing, in velvet frocks and lace collars, Stephen had been accustomed to go to church, and to behave himself with propriety while there. But here, to his great shame and confusion of face, he found himself the object of general attention, and the cause of some tittering. The Biffeyites were not going to keep a clerk to say "Amen," and do their own "responses" at the same time. The ancient sexton represented them amply, and they sat mute. Stephen felt greatly ashamed, and hiding his roseate countenance within the covers of his book, hoped the young lady opposite had not heard him.

When the old clergyman had clambered into the topmost place of all, and began to drone out his sermon, Stephen dared a little, and looked about him.

His eyes wandered from the quaint form in the pew with him to the rows of bent silver heads (occasionally nodding) and rusty poke bonnets (vigorously alert and wakeful); and he wondered for how many years the owners of these heads had been coming to this musty old church, where the very atmosphere smelt of dust and mildew, and cobwebs adorned the window corners, and hung festoon-like from the heavy fringes of the pulpit and reading-desk cushions. The wrinkled sexton seemed to bear the hall-mark of centuries on his thin, hard face, and the old parson appeared more than half asleep as he laboured through his sermon.

A ray of brilliant sunshine suddenly slanted in athwart the dingy edifice. Stephen's eyes involuntarily travelled along its track, and it carried his gaze straight to the face of the young lady in the pew, at whom, since his early disaster, he had not ventured to look. She moved a little aside, but finding she could not get out of range of the sunbeam, she submitted to its scrutiny, simply leaning her head against the high pew behind her, and closing her eyes.

Stephen now could look at her as much as he would. And looking, he said to himself that she and the sunbeam were surely kindred—the only bright things in all that mouldy old place.

She was very young, and very simply dressed. A long brown velvet cloak, bordered with fur, and fashioned in a style of twenty years ago, hid her figure, while a heavy brown velvet bonnet framed her small face like an aureole. But Stephen liked her dress. Fastidious as he was, and well versed in ladies' dress, as is the wont of the existing generation of fashionable youth to be, yet he liked the dingy, unsuitable costume of this young girl. He recognised its age at a glance, and wondered what his sisters would say could they see it. In all his life, he thought, he had never seen so fair and sweet a face. Small, regular features, framed with soft brown hair, and long lashes lying on the clear pallor of satin-smooth cheeks. But more than the flawless beauty of outline and contour, the deep, unconscious sadness of the girl's face attracted him. The lips in repose took a patient, pathetic droop, strange to see on a face so young. It went to Stephen's heart with swift directness, for his was a nature quickly miserable at the sight of pain in others. He wondered why a cloud so deep shou'd rest on a face so young, so altogether lovely in its pure, childlike beauty.

She sat very still, with closed eyes. One might contemplate her as one would a statue or a picture, and with some of the same artistic pleasure in so doing. Stephen wondered of what she was thinking. He tried to weave out for himself the probable pattern of her daily life. He was just endeavouring to satisfactorily adjust her relationship to the quaint old oddity with her, when the sunlight passed from off her face, and, opening her eyes, she looked straight at him.

Page after page of sermon-paper had been turned over by the preacher, Stephen catching here and there classical allusions and quotations which surprised him; noisy flies, waking in the brief scant sunshine from their winter sleep, buzzed up and down the dusty window-panes; the weary old sexton dozed and nodded in his place, and the grimy-faced clock—four hours and twenty minutes slow—ticked loudly on, when the ray of sunshine vanished as capriciously as it had come, and Hilda Romney, opening her eyes, found the stranger calmly contemplating her.

He blushed vividly—and so did she. And for the rest of the service the only thing that interested these young people was the pattern of the carpet beneath their feet.

But he had caught a glimpse of her eyes. Grey, clear, almost child-like in their innocent sweetness—very lovely eyes they were.

The longest sermon comes to an end, and so did this one. Stephen found himself holding the pew door open for the young lady to pass out, and returning the courteously salutation of the old gentleman in the many-coloured waistcoats. She did not vouchsafe him even one little glance in going. The young man possessed himself of his hat, and prepared to depart, not without a wistful look in the direction of the little side door through which she had disappeared, and with a certain unpleasant, half-defined sense of loneliness at his heart, which was, to say the least of it, very unaccountable.

In going down the aisle, he suddenly found himself face to face with the preacher, who was shambling along vestrywards. The young man stood politely aside to let him pass, a little awed to find himself rubbing shoulders with the divine.

Dr. Romney, the "gentleman of the old school," and who felt himself pretty much the same individual in his ecclesiastical garments and out of them, raised his head abruptly, and looked at the stranger from under his shaggy brows—a glance which surprised Stephen by its keenness, contrasting oddly with the mumbled service and sermon just gone before.

"A stranger," he said abruptly, and in a tone which implied that this was a most objectionable point in Stephen's character. Stephen felt he was not to blame, but he had to own to the charge.

"I came to Flashford yesterday evening," he supplemented, in extenuation.

"We call this place Biffey," the old clergyman said severely.

Stephen felt he had blundered.

"And I heard so much of St. Cecilia from the waiter at the Alexandra this morning," the young man went on suavely, "that I decided to come to Biffey for morning service."

Dr. Romney looked pleased. He waved his hand about him magnificently.

"Ours is a very beautiful church," he said, "and very old."

Stephen bowed assent, not making it clear whether it was to the beauty or to the antiquity of the fabric he handed in his adherence.

"Have you friends in Biffey, sir?" asked the old clergyman abruptly. "No? Then perhaps you will honour me by stepping into my house close at hand; we are to use hospitality, you know; 'angels unaware,' you know, and that kind of thing. But few strangers come our way to test our principles, so we had best make the most of those that do.—Here, Morton, take my things."

And unrolling his robes upwards, all in one grand wisp, leaving them for the long-suffering Morton to disentangle at his leisure, the fat old parson rolled along the aisle, conducting Stephen to the selfsame little door where she had disappeared.

CHAPTER II.

STEPHEN WRAY MAKES UP HIS MIND.

BIFFEY PARSONAGE was just as old as Biffey Church, but happily of a more qualified ugliness. Going over it, one came to the sarcastic conclusion that it had been planned in a nightmare, begun on the 1st of April, and finished—never. Dark, tortuous passages, that could easily have been straight, cunning flights of steps in hidden places, to serve no other purpose, apparently, than to cause the unwary to fall and crack their necks, for no sooner down than an equal number of steps led back to the original level. Unnecessary doors abounded, blind windows—in fact, a general wild incompleteness of design—were the distinguishing characteristics of Biffey Parsonage.

The people of the house were no less strange, thought Stephen Wray, fresh from the artificialities of his home in London. Dr. Romney, father and patriarch, was a man of great learning—learning and attainments both—which all his life had hung like a millstone about his neck. It was hard to believe now, looking on the deeply furrowed face, and meeting the harsh abruptness of his manner, that this old man had been young once, and ambitious and happy. Yet he had been all three. The youth had fled, the ambition waned; the happiness lay buried in a grave close by in Biffey Churchyard. She who for a brief space had made his life blossom as the rose had at the birth of their one child closed her eyes in the sleep which knows no waking. Since then his life had been sombre; all interest in outer things left him, and of the many bright hopes he had started in life with, he had neither heart nor courage to attempt to achieve even one. With him lived his wife's brother, Master Drury as he was always called. His life, too, had seemed to stop short at his sister's grave. And to both of these young Hilda was the dearest treasure this life could hold.

Miranda on her island home knew more of the world than did Hilda Romney. She was nineteen now, and all her life had been passed in this dark old parsonage, shut in from the small world of Biffey by high, ivy-clad walls. If the truth must be told, the girl loved her uncle better than her father. His queer, quaint, wrinkled face had always a loving smile for her; his manner to her was the very embodiment of courtly chivalry; he watched her as carefully as he watched his flowers; he tried in many small, pathetic ways to please her, to give her pleasure;—while her father was so quiet and reserved, and his thoughts and affections so much buried in the book he was writing, that days might pass without his seemingly remembering her existence. But to old Master Drury she was the lodestar of life, the very apple of his eye.

Her life had always run in the one tranquil groove. Week in, week out, an unbroken serene existence, a round of homely duties faithfully performed. The same fresh joy in each successive spring, when the sap rose in the branches, and she felt youth and health within her veins; the same gentle regret when the year slowly yellowed to its close, and the wintry winds and fogs returned, the brightness all buried till another year, with its blossoms and bird-songs, should roll round again. She knew of no other life than this—this gentle, sweet-eyed maiden guessed not at the hidden possibilities of life, but moved through her little world with serene, unawakened heart, and fair, placid, smiling eyes, the joy of all who looked on her.

"I wonder where that young stranger in our pew came from?" mused Master Drury, as she and he passed homewards through the churchyard.

Unwittingly he had struck upon the subject of his niece's meditations.

"Yes, I should like to know," she replied readily.

"He looked so stiff and ungraceful," Master Drury went on; "and was so badly dressed."

"Did you think so?" Hilda said, with evident disappointment. "I thought he had such a nice face."

"Face, yes; perhaps so. But his dress!"

"I suppose," said Hilda hesitatingly, "it is our dress, uncle, that is really odd and absurd. This mantle of mine was mother's, and it is not like in shape to any of the cloaks the ladies who come here in summer wear. I am sure they would laugh at it!"

"Let them laugh," Master Drury replied, with scorn. "I should like to know if one of them had a face so pretty as yours to show above their fine cloaks."

Hilda smiled. She was so used to her uncle's extravagant admiration, it had not the effect of making her vain, for she told herself it was only his love for her that made her beautiful in his eyes.

They had reached the Parsonage door now. As they paused, and Hi'da looked round, a sudden colour came up in her face. Through the postern-gate into the churchyard, which she and her uncle had left open for her father, came the heavy, stooping figure Drury had likewise disappeared — presumably to announce the new arrival to the cook—Hilda was thrown on her own resources to accord a welcome to the stranger.

"She sat very still, with closed eyes."—p. 6.

of Dr. Romney, and with him, in quite familiar converse, the tall young stranger who had this morning occupied so many of her thoughts.

"Hilda," her father said, in his abrupt way, "here is a gentleman who has had the good taste to prefer our simple church to the gaudy attractions of that place which it pains me to mention. I have brought him to dinner. See to it."

Then he disappeared into the house, and as Master

Stephen felt miserably awkward, and she was tongue-tied and shy. The poor young things looked at each other in a dejected manner, half-apologetic but entirely absurd.

Woman-like, she was the first to regain self-possession. She offered him her hand with a pretty smile. "I am very glad to see you," she said, with simple directness that was in itself a charm. "May I know your name?"

"My name is Wray—Stephen Wray," the young man replied shamefacedly. "And indeed, Miss Romney, I do not know how to apologise for this intrusion."

"Pray do not try," she said graciously. "If papa thought you admired our poor old church more than St. Cecilia's, of course he asked you to dinner. He would give you anything in the world if he thought that. But, Mr. Wray, how could you pretend to like it best? Don't you think it was very wrong of you? Because it could not be true, you know."

The reproach in the girl's eyes stung Stephen into exculpation of his sin. He explained how matters really had fallen out, but he could see by her quiet, amused smile that she did in nowise believe him. He chafed helplessly under the sense of this. "I could make no comparison between the churches," he said, in loftily injured tones, "seeing I have never crossed the threshold of St. Cecilia's."

"Should you like to see our garden before we go indoors?" she asked him, dropping the thorny question of the churches. Stephen assented very willingly, and she led the way along the strip of lawn beneath the Parsonage windows, and into a large and apparently well-stocked fruit-garden behind the house. Within the garden door was a stretch of grassy sward, bordered by overshadowing apple-trees, not yet in leaf this March day, but holding up bare, shining branches to the cold blue sky. As Stephen followed his fair hostess from flower-bed to flower-bed, he little thought, or imagined, or foresaw how intimately every smallest detail of this sunshiny and sequestered garden nook was to grow into his spirit, become a part of himself, as it were, and parcel of his life, and of its every memory of joy and pain. He now walked through it as a stranger, stopping every now and again to rapturously admire a cluster of crimson auriculas or scarlet anemones, or the long ranks of tall, upstanding daffodils by the ivy-covered walls, while all around him tribes of jubilant spring blossoms glorified the smooth-shorn sward, and made the very atmosphere sweet and warm with fragrance.

"It is like a garden one reads about in a poem!" the young man exclaimed, standing still, and looking about him.

"I am glad you like it," said Miss Romney. "Uncle Drury is our gardener, and he loves his flowers as though they were living things, as indeed they are. But you should see this place in summer, when the limes on the lawn are in blossom, and the house is smothered in flowers. It is really pretty then."

"It is lovely now," he said, wondering at the old-fashioned garden, and the great beauty of the girl beside him, and, most of all, at himself—that he should find himself here.

"You live in London?" she said timidly. Then, with a rosy flush, "Forgive me; it is rude to ask questions."

"Ask me as many as you like," he said eagerly. "I have a father and a mother, and two sisters, and we live in Portman Square; and, on the whole, we are a most uninteresting and commonplace family."

Hilda did not think him either uninteresting or commonplace, but she did not say so. "You have a mother," she said softly; "and I have not."

Stephen felt deeply ashamed of himself when the pathos of this little speech struck on his ear. He was not accustomed to look upon his mother in the light of a blessing exactly.

"Your mother is dead?" he said.

"Yes, so long ago—so long ago that I do not remember her; but I think of her. And sometimes I think how different all would be if she were still here with us. But that, I suppose, is useless, and perhaps wicked, to think. And I have felt as if she were very near me. Sometimes, when I am grieved or unhappy, I feel as if she comes quite close to me; and, though she says nothing, her presence soothes me, and I grow happy again. Do you think she really comes to me, or that I only imagine she does, as Uncle Drury says?"

"I am sure she comes," Stephen replied fervently. He did not in the least know how to answer the question, or the look in the appealing eyes raised to his. He wished he could frame some pretty remark suitable to the occasion, but he could think of nothing.

"I think we had better go down to the house now," she said; and obediently he followed her from the garden, feeling very much as one may imagine the fairy prince felt when wandering in the enchanted mazes of the wood where the sleeping princess lay.

Master Drury came ambling across the lawn to meet them as they left the garden. The sunshine fell full on his powdered hair and brilliant attire.

Hilda introduced the stranger, to whom the old man most graciously bowed—Stephen looking rather as if he had swallowed a ramrod, and it had disagreed with him. Master Drury led off with some suitable remarks, and Stephen found himself replying, with the impression of being in a dream deepening upon him every moment.

The grass out here was just as green and carefully cut as in the garden, but the flowers were not so luxuriant as within the high shelter of the red brick walls. Here also a long rank of daffodils waved their golden heads in the sunshine, against the sombre background of a laurestinus hedge.

Hilda stepped away across the grass, leaving Stephen in conversation with her uncle, but with his eyes and thoughts following her.

Presently she returned to him, a small bunch of Russian violets in her hand.

"These are all I could find," she said, with a frank smile, and held them out to Stephen, who took them gratefully, wondering if there was another girl in the world so deliciously sweet and natural—like her own violets, he thought, as he carefully placed her offering in his button-hole.

With any other young lady he ever met, the fellow would now have played a little comedy anent the pinning-in of the flowers to his coat—a comedy both he and she would have perfectly understood; but with Hilda Romney things seemed different. There was an atmosphere of simple truth about her that disarmed him, and kept him at a distance, even while he felt she was the most charming woman he had ever met.

Then they went indoors.

The Parsonage drawing-room was as mellow with age and old-fashioned ideas as the rest of the place. The architect's eccentricity had in it taken the form of unexpected nooks and recesses, with one side of the room boldly curving out into the lawn like an overgrown oriel window. It was nevertheless a pretty room, its dark oak carvings lightened up by an overflow of the garden outside into every nook and cranny. There were flowers everywhere, and ferns and palms in large old china jars standing here and there.

Stephen had not time to notice many details before dinner was announced, and Dr. Romney led the way to the dining-room. Here was more oak carving, but the walls were hung with tapestry: Rebekah at the well, Moses in the bulrushes, Samson and Delilah; Stephen felt more than ever like the fairy prince—oak carving and tapestry as daily furniture in the nineteenth century was too much for his equanimity—only the fairy princess was not asleep, but very wide awake, sitting opposite him at the table, stealing glances at him from time to time from her soft grey eyes, and across the dream and the glamour mingled the fragrance of the violets she had given him.

"We dine early, sir," remarked his host—"that is, on Sunday—as my evening service commences at five."

"Do you make a lengthened stay in Biffey?" Master Drury asked, by way of conversation; for if Dr. Romney asked a man to dinner, he had no idea of entertaining him mentally as well. He left all efforts after sociability to his brother-in-law and his daughter.

"No," replied Stephen. "I return to town to-morrow morning. The fact is, I came to Bullionston on business for my father, and was not able to get it finished in time to go home yesterday evening, so ran down here last night for the Sunday. I am glad I did now."

Master Drury politely bowed at the compliment implied.

"Perhaps you may have heard of the firm of Wray and Owens?" Stephen went on, not sorry of an opportunity to offer hostages to conventionality, and give some certificate of respectability to these innocent people, who asked for none. "My father is the head of the firm."

"Publishers?" Dr. Romney asked, with sudden interest, lifting his shaggy head from his plate.

"No; stockbrokers," Stephen replied, smiling at the idea of his father, or old Owens either, knowing anything about the inside of a book, unless it was a book all red and blue lines, and with frequent references to £ s. d. within its pages.

"And how do you like our church, Mr. Wray?" Master Drury asked, falling back on that question, inevitable at a parson's board.

Stephen glanced at Hilda. She was smiling at her plate in a most provoking way.

"It is very old," he stammered. For Stephen, although a young man of the world, was one of those rare souls to whom even the shadow of untruth was as painful as sand in the eyes is to the ordinary human being.

"That is its chief beauty," Master Drury replied solemnly, all innocent of irony. "We are old people here—and we like the old ways."

"And you, Miss Romney?" said Stephen boldly, determined to carry the war into the enemy's country. "You are not old; and what do you think of St. Cecilia's?"

"Papa does not approve of my going there, and so of course I never go."

Dr. Romney gave a grunt expressive of disdain, and as Stephen noted the colour in her face, he felt rather sorry he had put her to such a test.

"We are a remnant of another age," Master Drury went on solemnly. "Stranded here by time—far removed from the clamour of earth—the world forgetting—by the world forgot"—Hilda even, young though she be, belongs rather to my age than to her own. From all I gather of the ladies of the present day, Hilda is not the loser from our life of cultured retirement."

Stephen thought of his sisters, and looked at the sweet, serious face of his young hostess, and marvelled if this indeed were the sole cause of the wide difference between them and her.

"I don't think the new type of woman is to be admired by men or angels," he replied, with a touch of cynical disapproval which surprised himself. Heretofore, the young women of his acquaintance had not been so marvellously distasteful to him, and his sisters had been good girls enough, as girls go. His ideal had suddenly become higher. In fact, he never had had an ideal before—now he had. He had looked upon women as all precisely the same, some of them perhaps a little wittier or a little prettier than others. Now they were suddenly severed into two classes. In one class, Hilda Romney—with half-reluctance he owned it, for he should have liked Hilda to be first and alone—and Mary Owens; in the second, all the rest of the women his world held.

"In my young days," continued Master Drury, "all women were beautiful and good. We men, made of a coarser fibre, found our highest meed of praise in the approval of their bright eyes. We tried to present ourselves in the best of lights to them. Now, what cares a man what a woman thinks of him? She has stepped from off her pedestal, and fights in the arena with him on equal terms. Ah, my young friend, I pity you!"

Stephen was by no means an adherent to the theory that women were sent into the world to stand aloft on pedestals, but he was not rash enough to attempt to argue the point with Master Drury, and so silently accepted the proffered pity.

"We are going so fast," he said, as Master Drury paused, and he found he was expected to say something, "that I suppose we must all, men and women alike, move onwards, or we shall get left behind."

"Yes, you live too fast. You drain the goblet of life so swiftly that the delicacy of its aroma is lost. Here we live apart, in our mellow and chastened atmosphere, not altogether untouched by sorrow, or forgotten by the hand of Time. My brother-in-law is engaged upon a stupendous work which will stamp the name of Romney all along the ranks of posterity. I live in the Arcadia of my flowers and the memories of my youth. And Hilda—my niece—she supplies the element without which life must be inharmonious —the benign influences of womanly grace and beauty."

Master Drury paused triumphantly. And to himself, deep within his heart, Stephen pitied Hilda.

She, blushing a little at her uncle's praises in the presence of a stranger, rose and led the way to the drawing-room.

"I think I must be going," said Stephen presently. He hoped Hilda would press him to stay, but she did not.

"Can I say good-bye to your father and uncle?" he asked, lingering.

Hilda smiled.

"Come with me," she said, with her pretty little laugh, and Stephen followed her back to the dining-room. There, in an arm-chair, lay Master Drury, fast asleep, a gentle smile playing over his features. Hilda stole softly in, and placed a velvet cushion behind his head.

"Come," she whispered again to Stephen, who had modestly remained at the door. And she led him along a dark passage, warning him in whispers of the steps in secret places. She opened a door to the left, and silently pointed in.

He looked cautiously into the room. It was fitted up as a study, and a bright fire was burning on the tiled hearth. On a sofa close by the fire was extended the portly frame of Dr. Romney with one pendant hand prone along the floor, and a silk handkerchief over his face. Master Drury had been caught napping, as it were, but Dr. Romney had deliberately laid himself down to woo sleep. There was no mistaking the trumpet-like tones proceeding from beneath the handkerchief.

"Is it always like this?" Stephen asked, as they retraced their way along the passage to the hall.

"Yes," said Hilda simply. "They are both old, you know, and need rest."

"And you?" said Stephen. "What do you do?"

"I read," she said. "I read as much as I can. I have many books, and I want to read them all—over and over again—and get them quite into my head, that I may have them to think about afterwards."

There was a sudden feverish energy in her manner as she spoke which surprised Stephen. And a look of deep, unutterable sadness came suddenly into her face. Every vestige of brightness died out from her eyes and voice.

"But would you not rather have new books?" he asked. "I would send you some gladly, if you would let me."

"No," she answered sorrowfully. "New books would only puzzle me. I want to read my own old ones, so that I may remember them by-and-by."

She pressed both her hands to her face with a little gesture of despair that thrilled the young man through with pity, though he did not understand it.

She looked so small, and slight, and wistful, standing ever in the shadow of these old lives, that all his heart went out to her, and he would have liked to gather her up in his arms, and kiss and caress her as one does a little pet child.

"But I am detaining you with my foolish talk," she said, holding out her hand with a little air of dignity all her own. Stephen felt himself dismissed.

"If I come to evening service," he said, grasping this last straw of hope, "shall I have an opportunity of thanking your father for his kindness?"

"Papa is sure to be there," she replied.

He would have liked to ask if she would be there, but most unusual shyness stopped his tongue. A trim housemaid was already holding the door open for him, but still he lingered.

"Perhaps, if you do not find it dull," she said, "you would come in after service to tea?"

"Dull!" he exclaimed indignantly. "I am as sorry as I can be to go away now."

"Then why do you go?" she asked. "Have I been rude, and made you think you ought to go?"

Stephen was in that frame of mind that he thought she was an angel, and would have liked to tell her so. But he restrained himself.

"You must not judge me by your sisters," she went on hurriedly, "or London young ladies. I do not know quite how to behave. But I am sure papa and Uncle Drury will be disappointed if you go away. It is such a pleasure to them to have someone new to talk to, and you must not be vexed because they have gone to sleep. They are so old, you know. But if you like to stay, and as you have no other friends at Biffey—and if you do not really find it very dull—I shall be very glad. If you liked, we might go and see some of the sick people in the outlying hamlet, and I could show you the place."

It is hardly necessary to say how eagerly Stephen jumped at the offer.

An hour later he and she were walking briskly homeward by the sea-shore. The village soon lay behind them, and they were out on a long flat reach of scant herbage. There was no beauty along this tame coast; but on this March Sunday, the sunshine, clear and cold, bathed every object in dazzling radiance, and made the smooth surface of the steel-blue sea impossible to look upon.

Presently she led him down upon the strand of hard, unyielding sand, with its fringe of blanched ocean-wrack and weed. Then they turned up a narrow deeply rutted lane, which led them to a hedge-bordered road, and so home again to Biffey.

Stephen never in his life enjoyed a walk so much. He would have been ready at that moment to declare that Biffey was situated amidst the most beautiful scenery in the world. The barren reach of desert sand-hills was glorified in his eyes.

Hilda talked to him as they walked along—gravely chatted to him about her life, and its little interests and occupations among the poor. She told him of the books she liked, and, warmed by his sympathy, revealed perhaps more than she was aware of herself, her dreams and girlish thoughts, and, above all, her simple piety.

To her, he was simply the most delightful companion her solitary life had known—not ancient, but rather of her own age, and with heart and thoughts in harmony with hers. And so with sweet and gracious unconsciousness her nature revealed itself to him in all its maiden softness and high nobleness, expanding in the pleasure of his companionship, as the folded beauties of the delicate sea-weed fronds reveal themselves when the tide rises, and the limpid sea-water stands in every little pool.

To him—what was she?

Simply the loveliest, and best, and sweetest woman he had ever known—and his wife, if he could win her.

CHAPTER III.

A WORLDLY FAMILY.

SUNDAY came not as a "day of rest and gladness" to the Wray family, but rather as an oft-recurring period of intense dullness, to be got through in the best way possible, with novels, and yawns, and family jars.

The father and mother of the family usually spent the afternoon of Sunday in their own especial sanctum, a small and dingily furnished room, looking out at the back of the house. This worthy pair had not always been in circumstances so affluent as those they now enjoyed, and possibly both felt most at their ease in this plain, ugly room. A large table with an oil-cloth cover filled the centre of the room, and rows of stiff, hard chairs stood along the walls; at each side of the fire-place a lumbering arm-chair, and in these chairs Mr. and Mrs. Wray reclined, the former having the additional comfort of his feet upon another chair.

Mr. Wray was a short, stout man, with an exceedingly red face, a shining bald head, small sharp eyes adorned with outstanding brows, and a nose scarce worth mentioning, so small an oasis was it in the vast desert of his face. He had one worship—money; one rule of life—"Get money"; one creed—belief in money. Never at any time in his life had he lost sight of the end and aim of his being, and he was now a very wealthy man. He married young, and had three children, and as years went on a large household of servants and a respectable office staff came under his control, but no one of these human beings had ever loved him; some had feared him, some deceived him, some despised him, but not one had ever had a kindly thought associated with him in their hearts. Not that he wanted or cared for any "humbug" of the sort. If they each did their duty in that state of life to which it pleased him to call them, that was all he needed; if they failed to do so, they might go elsewhere. The culprit was summarily condemned on the first offence, without hope of reprieve. His wife was the sole person who contradicted the autocrat. She feared him not at all. His daughters and his son both feared and disliked him cordially.

Mrs. Wray consented to his authority on the tacit understanding that in most cases her word was as good as his. She seldom actually opposed him in any of his plans, but she ever met him at every point with a rapid stream of contradiction and condemnation.

Her favourite rôle in life was to pose as a "doleful creature." No one could be lively, or witty, or even cheerful, in her society. She infused a drop of gall into every cup. The most harmless gaiety felt itself sinful near her, and withered up. Her husband, her son, her daughters, her servants, she looked upon as so many thorns in her pillow. In her scheme of existence everything always invariably went wrong, and nothing ever by the remotest chance went right. In the great dining-room down-stairs there was a full-length portrait of her as a young woman, in her bridal silks and laces. Even then had there lurked a latent acerbity about the coldly smiling lips. Years had developed the acerbity and extinguished the smile.

On this especial Sunday afternoon Mr. Wray appeared to be in anything but a good temper. Perhaps the east wind blowing along the dusty streets outside may have had something to do with it.

"I can't understand," he said peevishly, in reply to some remark his wife had made about his daughters—she always styled them his, as if she had nothing to do with them or him—"I can't understand why those girls are not married."

"They've had offers," Mrs. Wray replied.

"Yes, yes; I know. Fortune-hunters; but never a one with pound for pound with them—not one amongst the lot that could have made a marriage settlement. What's the matter with them? They're not very ugly, though they have not much to boast of in the way of good looks. Stephen's got any good looks that were going. I don't know where from. I am sure."

"Not from you, Mr. Wray."

"I'd say the same to you, only it might not be polite, Mrs. Wray," her husband returned placidly. "What's the matter with the girls? They're properly dressed, they've all they need; no father could do more than I've always done for them. Over a hundred a year for their schooling alone. They go out, they've a box at the opera, they've carriages, riding-horses, everything any young woman can need to set her off, and there they are still on my hands. I've often said I'll give each of them ten thousand down on their wedding-day, and then I'm done with them. I must save the rest for Stephen. He's my only son, and will carry on the name."

"That is a great consideration," Mrs. Wray said sourly.

Her rank had been one degree higher than her husband's in the social scale when she married him long years ago, and she never allowed him to forget the condescension she had shown.

Mr. Wray snorted angrily, but did not attempt to argue the point.

"My father was at least an honest man," he said, "and yours was a scamp of an attorney."

"Go on, Mr. Wray, go on as long as ever you like. You are my husband, and I suppose I must bear insults from you with what meekness I can command."

"Never mind our fathers, Jane. I don't want to insult you, but you'd try the patience of a saint—you really would," Mr. Wray replied, putting his feet back on the chair from which he had withdrawn them in his wrath. "The question is not what our parents were, but what to do with our children. I want those "Stephen is young enough. He's only three-and-twenty. But I intend him to marry this year. Someone will snap up Mary Owens and her money if he does not look sharp."

"It is like a garden one reads about in a poem."—p. 9.

girls married and out of the way; for every day they live in my house, and spend my money, that is so much out of Stephen's pocket. Louise is close on thirty, and Annette is eight-and-twenty this year. They ought to be married. It is absurd for them to expect I am to support them for ever. I'm not going to do it."

"Why don't you tell your son to marry, if you're in such a hurry?" Mrs. Wray asked, as he paused.

"No fear of that," replied Stephen's mother. "Mary Owens has been waiting for Stephen long enough. Since they were children she's been fond of him."

"That's so much the plainer sailing."

"Stephen won't marry her," Mrs. Wray continued. Not because she believed what she said, but that she wanted to say something irritating.

"Stuff and nonsense! Stephen will do what I tell him," the father returned sharply.

"Mary Owens is two years older than him," Mrs. Wray said, with a cold smile.

"I don't care if she was twenty years older than him. He's got to marry her, that's all there's about it. No great penance either, to marry such a fortune. Twenty thousand in her own right from her mother, and all her father will leave—as much as I have for my three children. Stephen's no fool. He'll do what I tell him."

"He does not care about Miss Owens."

"And who wants him to? Do you think I care a pin whether he does or not? Why, you talk like a fool, Jane. One woman is as good as another, and a good deal better if she has money. I'll speak to Stephen about it to-morrow."

"You'll find he'll rebel," Mrs. Wray returned. In her secret heart she believed Stephen was very fond of Mary Owens, and fully intended to marry her.

"I'll find he'll do nothing of the sort," Mr. Wray returned fiercely. "Rebel, indeed! And he dependent on me for the very food he eats, and the very clothes he wears! I gave you credit for more sense, Mrs. Wray. I shall tell Stephen to-morrow I wish him to marry Miss Owens. You say she'll have him—very well. This is March. I'll give him six months. He'll marry Mary Owens by next September, or I'll disinherit him. Good gracious! you drive me mad with the mere suggestion of his letting slip such a chance. He might live long before he would meet with such another."

"Stephen has a good deal of your obstinacy about him," Mrs. Wray said, in a slow, languid voice that always intensely irritated her lord and master.

Mr. Wray rose from his chair, gasping with rage, and his face growing purple with indignation.

"I don't care if he has all my obstinacy in him," he almost shouted, "and all yours too, which is saying a great deal more. He is my son, and he shall obey me. Say no more about it, madam."

So ended the parental conference. Mrs. Wray retired weeping to her own room, and Mr. Wray poked the fire vigorously to let off his angry feelings, and then sat down in his arm-chair again, and fell asleep.

Up-stairs, in the vast region of ormolu and gilding and mirrors known as the drawing-room, Stephen was also the subject of conversation.

The Misses Wray were very like each other. They were built on a large and decided type. Their dress was decided, also their opinions and conversation. There was no gentle feminine haze of hidden possibilities about their characters. They were clear, hard, and defined as a basso-relievo, and with something of basso-relievo rigidity also.

Both felt secretly that they were "social failures." Men had come, and men had gone, but they were still unwed. Their circle was a limited one, for they had committed the error—condemned in the vulgar proverb—of throwing out dirty water before they had gotten them clean. They wanted to know "lords and ladies," and so moved out westwards, and cut their former acquaintances; and, after five years of Portman Square, knew not a solitary "lord" or "lady," with the exception of the widow of a defunct Lord Mayor, who had been knighted during his year of office. Stephen had graduated at Oxford, and knew a much better class of people than they did. His men friends came to the house, and were polite, and went away again untouched by the charms of the sisters. Louise had come to that now, she confided to Annette, that she would marry "anyone." And Annette was rather of the opinion that "anyone" had appeared above the horizon, and only needed a little encouragement to come forward.

"Dear me!" said Annette, with a yawn, "I wish Stephen had come home last night. Sunday is bad enough, but Sunday without Stephen is dreadful!"

The sisters were honestly fond and proud of their young, handsome brother.

"I wonder what the poor boy is doing with himself. Flashford-on-Sea must be very dull just at this season."

"Everywhere is dull. I hate Sunday!" Annette said vindictively.

"I should have liked to go abroad for Easter," Louise said plaintively. "It's absurd how papa can never afford to let us do anything we want to do. But I don't hate Sunday, Annette, and it is wrong to speak that way of it."

"You may find it amusing trotting off to church and arranging your attire to suit the occasion—ringing the changes in dainty pearl-greys and violets, deepening as you go, and composing a joyful and jubilant costume for Easter meanwhile. That kind of thing may suit you, I say, but it does not suit me; and if there's anything at all in religion, it is not what we wear at special seasons, nor does it consist in attending a great many services. No one on earth will convince me of that. Of course Mr. Whyte may tell you otherwise."

"Mr. Whyte never tells me anything that is not to my great advantage to know," Miss Wray replied, with dignity.

Annette laughed maliciously.

"Do you know, sister of mine, that you'd better look after Mr. Whyte? He goes very often to call on Mary Owens of an evening, Stephen says, and it is not to see old Owens, you may be sure. Mary is an heiress—Mary has four times as much money as you or I; and all her mother's fortune in her own right, so she can marry anyone she likes."

Miss Wray knitted her brows.

"I wish Stephen would marry Mary, if he is going to do so," she said.

"Stephen says he is not in love with Mary," remarks Annette sapiently. "I asked him. He says he looks upon her as a dear sister, and that she is very good, and he is very fond of her; and all that sort of thing."

"What nonsense!" Louise returned, with a sneer. "This amateur brotherhood ever comes to a bad end. It invariably ends in matrimony."

"That's not a bad end."

"Well, no; I did not mean that exactly. I mean that playing at being brother and sister, when people are not born in those relationships, never succeeds. The brother soon oversteps the brother's bounds, and finds himself the lover."

"Stephen is not one little bit in love with Mary," Annette said sagely.

"No," said Miss Wray; "it is sometimes the woman who suffers."

"There's a knock at the hall door," said Annette. "Now, Louise, if it is Mr. Whyte, give him to understand Mary and Stephen are engaged. You need not say it right out—but you know."

The door is flung open, and a gorgeous footman solemnly announces Mr. Hawthorne Whyte.

Mr. Whyte—soft and pathetic as his simple name—advanced and shook hands tenderly with the young ladies. He was like nothing in the world so much as a study in black and white. A deathly white face, framed by smooth black hair, worn rather long, and furthermore ornamented by the most brilliant beady black eyes ever seen, and his extremely correct costume carried out the idea of "black and white" to perfection.

Mr. Whyte was not happy in his choice of a subject when the weather had been discussed, the east wind condemned, and Stephen's absence explained.

"I have just come from visiting your cousin—Miss Owens," he said blandly.

Miss Wray frowned slightly, but the quicker-witted Annette saw the opportunity, and seized it.

"Miss Owens is not our cousin, Mr. Whyte," she said, with an innocent smile. "Her father and ours are partners, and we see a good deal of her, naturally." She paused, with an expressive glance at Louise, who instantly took up the running.

"We hope she may be a relation some day," Louise said sweetly, and shyly looking down at her long white fingers while she spoke.

"Indeed!" the young man said, with a slight start, not lost on Annette.

"We look on her already in the light of a dear sister," Louise continued.

"Is your brother engaged to her?" Mr. Hawthorne Whyte asked, with a rather forced smile.

"We don't put it that way yet," said Annette, thinking that perhaps he would congratulate Stephen or Mary. "But they have known each other all their lives."

"We hope they will be very happy," murmured Louise.

"I am sure I hope so, too," said Mr. Whyte limply.

Annette congratulated herself, and Louise told herself she had only spoken just in time. Very soon the visit begun so propitiously flagged, and Mr. Whyte arose, and took his hat and his departure.

And this was Stephen's home!

WEALTH AS A PROFESSION.

BY THE REV. E. J. HARDY, M.A.

Once heard an old physician of great eminence exclaim, when the word "philanthropist" was mentioned in his presence, "Don't speak of those cruel men; and deliver us from their tender mercies!" In the same spirit of righteous indignation a well-known philosopher writes:—"Fostering the good-for-nothing at the expense of the good, is an extreme cruelty. It is a deliberate storing-up of miseries for future generations. There is no greater curse to posterity than that of bequeathing them an increasing population of imbeciles and idlers and criminals. To aid the bad in multiplying is, in effect, the same as maliciously providing for our descendants a multitude of enemies. It may be doubted whether the maudlin philanthropy which, looking only at direct mitigations, persistently ignores indirect mischiefs, does not perpetrate a greater total of misery than the extremest selfishness inflicts. Refusing to consider the remote influences of his incontinent generosity, the thoughtless giver stands but a degree above the drunkard who thinks only of to-day's pleasure and ignores to-morrow's pain, or the spendthrift who seeks immediate delights at the cost of ultimate poverty. In one respect, indeed, he is worse; since, while getting the present pleasure produced in giving pleasure, he leaves the future miseries to be borne by others—escaping them himself."

But although thoughtless giving, either on the part of poor-law guardians or of rich individuals, is no charity at all, but a social crime, let us not jump to the conclusion that there is no way in which the rich can help the poor. The existence of maudlin philanthropy may be acknowledged while, on the other hand, we believe in the possibility of true charity.

Every gift of God is good, and we have no sympathy with the cant of disparaging riches, which is generally in the mouths either of those who have none themselves, or of those who desire to compound for greediness in making money by affecting to despise it when made. Money is a great power for good or for evil. In our present complicated social arrangements, however, the possession of large wealth by an earnest Christian is a great responsibility, and one of which we need not be envious. Indeed, we should all give to such men our sympathy and whatever help we can in their endeavours to perform the duties of stewardship "as ever in the Great Taskmaster's sight." "What are we to do with our money?" is now the question of serious-minded men of wealth. "Charities are so badly managed, and then political economists are down upon us if by mistake we help those who might have helped themselves. It is easy to talk against our extravagance; tell us rather how to spend our money as becomes Christians."

The fact is, riches must now be considered by all good men as a distinct profession, with responsibilities no less onerous than those of other professions. In the nature of things money tends continually to fall into the hands of a few large capitalists. Whether such men acknowledge it or not, they are really members of a new profession, the raison d'être of which is, that it should spend money for the greatest good—not some less good, producing remote bad consequences—of the greatest number.

This very difficult business, therefore, must be learned by studying social science, and otherwise with as much care as the professions of divinity, law, and medicine are learned. When the rich are willing in this way to train themselves for their high calling, and take for their motto, "With both hands earnestly," they may rest assured that He who is the Light of the World will reveal to them ways and means of benefiting His poor, that are in harmony with Christianised social science. Let them only remember that if one member of Christ's body suffer, all members must suffer with it, and that other Christian saying, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them."

Guided by such principles as these, rich people will endeavour, in giving relief, to combine the advantages of organisation and individuality. They will not trust their own unassisted judgment as to the merits of a case, fearing lest by yielding to the clamours of dirty sensational poverty they may wrong the retiring respectable poor. On the other hand, they will remember that no amount of machinery can dispense with the grasp of a brotherly hand, and a human heart speaking words of sympathy to those who are distressed in mind, body, or estate. How much might the rich do for the poor by enabling them, at whatever cost of patience and money, to become self-supporting; by rescuing from villa-builders a few plots of recreation ground; by starting benefit societies, libraries, and schools of cookery; by encouraging such pastimes as would enable "the masses" to soberly enjoy their holidays!

Something, too, may be learned from the words, "In quietness shall be your strength," for if the accumulation of capital be the only means of providing employment, he who, while owing no man anything, makes a fortune and invests it, does more for the poor than he who, urged by bustling philanthropy, gives away all that he receives to the neediest people about him. So true is it that prudence and thrift are perfectly compatible with the spirit of brotherly love.

The truly charitable are always thoughtful. They have learned the inestimable art of doing kindness in the kindest manner. A benevolent man—Dr. Wilson, of Bath—discovered a clergyman who, he was informed, was sick, poor, and had a numerous family. One evening he gave a friend fifty pounds, requesting him to deliver it in the most delicate manner, and as from an unknown person. The friend said, "I will wait upon him early in the morning."—"You will oblige me, sir, by calling directly. Think of what importance a good night's rest may be to that poor man."

On the principle that "charity to the soul is the soul of charity," we should try to improve people's moral nature rather than aim merely at making them more comfortable in their bodies. Surround people with every luxury, and they will be miserable still unless their hearts and wills are in harmony with the moral laws of the universe. Nero on his throne was far less happy than St. Paul, the aged prisoner of Jesus Christ. A faithful friend can often save much misery by gently reminding us of our failings. In his description of the work of charity a Christian writer includes "wholesome blame." By far the best way, then, of helping people is to make them capable of helping themselves and so of improving their surroundings.

Is it not strange that people should be so ready to help those who do not want help, and so brutally careless about those who do? Dinners are given to those whose health would be much improved if they ate less, while those who really want a dinner find a great difficulty in getting one. Many a poor invalid might be almost restored to strength by a few drives in the carriage of some rich lady who is ruining her health by not walking or taking any other kind of exercise.

It must be admitted, however, that people are getting far more kind and considerate than they used to be. We have heard of poor over-worked shop-girls being invited for a day to the country and given a good dinner; of poor clerks being so well befriended that they did not form vicious habits; of deeds of kindness done in the kindest possible way for those who formerly were better off than they afterwards became.

Lady John Manners gives the following instances of kindness that came under her notice: "In some houses I have seen the children, from the time they are old enough to dine at the luncheon-table, given a basket containing a china jar, in which they were allowed to place little portions for the sick, toothless, and bedridden poor. A simple pudding and a few vegetables or some fruit are a great treat to the poor. The children consider it a pleasure to pay these little visits; and if a few flowers are added occasionally, or a book or a newspaper, they will feel that they are doing what they can to comfort those who are in need. Some old toys, if given to a family of little ones, are great comforts to them and their parents, for they keep the children amused.

I know a gentleman who provides much enjoyment to his servants by giving them in turns tickets for the Zoological Gardens, letting them know a day or two before when they can go, in order that they may arrange to take a friend. I have heard of a great house where all the servants are allowed a fortnight's holiday in the year. Of course, arrangements are she would not shrink from giving words of good advice; and she would point out to parents the great difference there is between real kindness and weak indulgence."

It is said that, among the daily petitions which the late Lord Cairns was accustomed to offer, one was that, if he had omitted to do a kindness he made to facilitate their going at a time convenient to employers and to themselves. I remember a lady over fourscore years of age, whose sympathies were as deep, and whose interest was as great in young people, as if she had been a girl. If she thought a girl who was not rich needed a gown, she would send her one in the prettiest manner; would give little parties for those who she thought needed cheering, and would send her carriage to fetch those for whom she thought it would be inconvenient to come. She never lost an opportunity of doing a kindness to poor or rich, yet might have done, or had not done it in the kindest manner, he might be forgiven, and enabled to do better in the future. "Smiling on thy neighbour's face is charity," and truly there is often more real charity in a kind look or word, or in the suppression of an outburst of temper, than in the gift of a thousand pounds.

One of the truest kinds of charity, or rather justice, consists in paying people properly for the work they do for us. Some do not see this, and they stint their servants and other employes, and give so-called charitable gifts out of the money they have saved by oppressing the hireling. Of the same nature is the action of those who are always on the look-out for a "bargain." It would be well if the ladies who rejoice at their good or cheap bargains would reflect that it is because they will not give a proper price for the products of women's labour that thousands of their poorer sisters have to work eighteen hours out of the twenty-four in order to earn what will buy a crust of bread and a cup of tea. You have got some pieces of wearing apparel very cheap. Why? Because of the low remuneration of women's labour. If the working women are young and good-looking, they are almost starved into supplementing their wages in ways that the employers know and very often calculate on, whenever they pay wages unusually low; and thus it often comes to pass that the buyer may get cheap goods, and save for "charity" too, at the expense of women's lives. Surely it is an insult to God to offer money made out of the life-blood of our brothers and sisters on the altar of so-called "charity!"

According to Chrysostom, "to know the art of alms is greater than to be crowned with the diadem of kings; and yet to convert one soul is greater than to pour out ten thousand talents into the baskets of the poor." But though true charity warns us to try and improve the moral condition of the poor rather than destroy their independence and power of helping themselves, there is no reason why we should not give them useful and pretty things, which without our help would not be enjoyed. Photographs may be given of countries we have visited, books that we would read ourselves, an easy-chair or some other comfort for the aged and sickly. Of course blunders will be made at first, and our gifts may not be appreciated. We all know the story of a poor old woman of old times, who, getting her first gift of tea, and hearing that it should be boiled, put it in the pot and then ate the leaves, telling the giver afterwards that it was "nice enough," but "she could not say she liked it better than cabbage."

Above all, let us never forget that "it is more blessed to give than to receive." Our gratitude to God, who enables us to bestow, should far exceed anything we expect from those who take from us.

HOW GOD PRESERVED THE NEW TESTAMENT.

BY THE VERY REV. R. PAYNE SMITH, D.D., DEAN OF CANTERBURY.—FIRST PAPER.

WE have in the New Testament the words of our Lord and of His Apostles, and it is to them that we appeal in all matters of faith. They hold with us the first and highest place, and naturally we assume that they always held this position. As a matter of fact it is not so. For a long time the Old Testament was the Bible of the early Church, and only gradually did believers become conscious that there was a Christian Bible, and that they, too, had books which for them had the same plenary authority as the books of Moses and of the prophets for the Jews. In treating of this subject, "How God Preserved the Bible," it is important to show how believers were led by the Divine Providence to the conviction that the writings of the New Testament were to be guarded by them with the most earnest care.

The Church had existed for twenty years before any book of the New Testament was written. For nearly a century afterwards the faith was propagated by those who had themselves been eye-witnesses of our Lord's ministry, or by such as had been taught by them. Both the facts and doctrines of Christianity were well known and believed on the authority of the living words of Apostles and Evangelists. Yet the need of documents was soon felt, and many took in hand to draw up narratives of what was fully believed on the authority of eye-witnesses still living. And the words of St. Luke bear witness to the kind of teaching on which the early Christians depended. For he says that he wrote his Gospel that Theophilus "might know the certainty of the things which he had been taught by word of mouth" (chap. i. 4: see margin, Revised Version). It was only as the eye-witnesses were gradually removed by death, and the number of those who had personally heard them, and had stored up their teaching in their memories, gradually diminished, that certain of these narratives and other authoritative writings took the place of the oral testimony of the Apostles and Apostolic men.

Yet, when in the fourth century the Church became free to act for itself, it found this great task of settling the Canon of New Testament Scriptures virtually accomplished. There were a few books concerning which doubt was entertained. These are the Epistle to the Hebrews, that of St. James, the second of St. Peter, the second and third of St. John, the Epistle of Jude, and the Apocalypse. As regards the rest, the Church in its general councils did but give synodical authority to what had been practically decided long before. As early as the second century we have in the Muratorian Canon a list of the Books of the New Testament as then received, and it is identical with our own, except that it omits the Epistle to the Hebrews, that of St. James, and both those of St. Peter. Even, too, thus early a distinction was clearly drawn between genuine Apostolic writings and works of secondary authority, an Apocalypse of St. Peter and the Shepherd of Hermas being noted as unfit, in the opinion of many, to be read in the Church. It is thus plain that believers were rapidly feeling their way towards the formation of a Canon of New Testament Scriptures, and that what the Church did in the fourth century, at the Council of Carthage, A.D. 397, and elsewhere, was to give public authority to those many "books of which there had never been any doubt in the Church," and to examine and sift the evidence for those which had not been universally received.

There is, however, a statement of St. Peter too important to be left unnoticed. In it he places St. Paul's Epistles on a level with the Scriptures of the Old Testament. "Men wrest," he says, "our beloved brother Paul's Epistles, as they do also the other Scriptures, unto their own destruction." The words occur, indeed, in the Second Epistle (chap. iii. 16), concerning the authenticity of which there were doubts in the early Church. Many modern scholars also feel a difficulty in believing that St. Peter would, during St. Paul's lifetime, place his writings on a level with those of the prophets. Yet the evidence for the Epistle was such that it was accepted in the Synods which had to deal with the subject, though not placed on a level with the First Epistle. But be this as it may, certainly at a very early date St. Paul's Epistles were regarded as Scriptures.

But at first the use of the New Testament Scriptures was for help in holy living. The early Christians generally cherished the expectation of Christ's early Advent, and it was long before they understood how great a work the Church had to do in and for the world before it would be fit for the Master's re-appearing. And this thought of Christ's immediate coming made men indifferent to controversy, and in earnest only about practice. In the Tractate lately discovered, called "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," written immediately after their days, and giving a summary of their doctrine, we find proof manifest how entirely the one thing valued was a godly life. But gradually other needs arose, and it was found that God had in the New Testament fully provided for them; and the result was that its authority in matters of doctrine became as fully recognised as had been its power in aiding men in the struggle after holiness.

And thus in the first century there is a constant reference to the facts of the New Testament, and the quotation often of its very words, for the ends of the Christian life, and yet in a very general way, and with little particularity about the book quoted from, or the name of the writer. But in the second century a very different state of things gradually came about, chiefly as the result of the Gnostic controversy. For controversy requires some authority to which appeal can be made. It may be right reason, or written law, or historic testimony or proof adduced by some science, which is invoked to settle the matter in dispute. For Christians, whose high claim it is that they live under a revealed religion, the appeal can be only to inspired words. And it was the Gnostics who by misusing them made believers aware how high was the authority of the Apostolic writings. For the Gnostic leaders arranged, first of all, a Gospel for themselves culled from the Church's Gospels; and next an "Apostolicon," drawn from the writings of St. Paul, whom alone they deemed worthy of notice. And this they did because the books were confessedly of high authority, but without intending to submit to them their own judgment; for these works covered but a small part of their speculations. But when writings, which previously had been used as aids for personal holiness, were thus pressed into the service of a wild philosophy, orthodox Christians were forced to consider what was the true position of their holy records, and what was the nature of their authority, and what books had this authority, and what fell short of it. The practical decision was that only such books as had Apostolic authority were to be regarded as inspired. In the fourth century the Church synodically affirmed the same; but there were books which claimed to have been written by Apostles, but which had never had more than a local acceptance; and several of these books were also admitted into the Canon.

We have seen that the Muratorian Canon acknowledges almost all the books contained in our New Testament. It is so called because it is found in a fragment discovered by Muratori in the Ambrosian Library at Milan. There is also a most interesting statement made by Tertullian at the end of the same (the second) century. He is discussing this very question—so interesting then, and so happily settled for us in the Sixth Article: that "nothing is to be required as necessary to salvation unless it can be proved by Holy Writ." Now Tertullian was in the face of a controversy which carried its speculations far beyond the limits of inspired teaching. The Gnostics, as we have seen, accepted some parts of Holy Scripture; they rejected other parts. They taught, moreover, theories which went far beyond anything warranted in the Bible. The whole question of authority thus arose. To what was the appeal to be made both for acceptance and for rejection? For help in holy living you may quote a hymn, or a passage from a sermon, or from a favourite author; but in controversy you can appeal only to that which binds your opponent as well as yourself. In the fourth century the controversies waged were about the interpretation of the Scriptures—Arians, Nestorians, Monophysites, Eutychians, all alike appealed to it. It was in the controversy with the Gnostics that Christians felt their way to the conclusion that they were bound to hold neither more nor less than that for which they had the warrant of Holy Writ.

Tertullian at this early date includes something more: for he appeals to Apostolic custom and practice, as well as Apostolic writing. But for us Apostolic custom has passed into oblivion. For Apostolic practice we have valuable testimony in the history of the primitive Church; yet is the verdict often uncertain because the testimony is obscure. But Apostolic writing is as clear and as exact now as at the first. Tertullian's words, addressed to one looking for the authority which must decide in matters of controversy, are, "Go through the Apostolic churches, in which the very seats in which Apostles sat still letters were still used for reading; but that they were carefully preserved and highly valued is very probable. Critics assume that they were written on the cheapest material, papyrus; yet, to say nothing of papyrus rolls from Egypt, we have leaves of an uncial manuscript written on papyrus as old as the fifth century ("Codex Porfirianus"). But papyrus is never named in the New Testament, while charta, paper, is mentioned in 2 John 12. And charta, paper proper, was so good and sound that it hold their old place of honour; where, too, their own authentic letters are read, bringing back the very sound of their voice, and recalling each one's features. If Achaia is nearest to you, there is Corinth: if you are in the neighbourhood of Macedonia, you have Philippi, you have Thessalonica. If you can travel into Asia, you have Ephesus; if you dwell in Italy, you have Rome" ("De Praes. Her.," c. 36). Now Tertullian is generally thought guilty of exaggeration in saying that the autographs of St. Paul's Epistles were still preserved in the cities to which they were addressed. And we must own that he lived in Africa, too far away for his testimony to be conclusive. Perhaps he was wrong in saying that the original would stand long wear and tear. St. Paul mentions parchments (2 Tim. iv. 13) as well as books. The parchments would be the more precious documents, such as Old Testament Scriptures and memorials of our Lord's life, possibly St. Luke's Gospel. But was it not reasonable, then, that when he ordered his Epistles to be sent from church to church, that they might be read to the brethren (Col. iv. 16), he provided for the possibility of this large use of them by having them written on parchment? As he employed a scribe to write them, it is gratuitous to suppose that he used only the meanest writing material; but even so they would quickly be valued as things most precious, and when they became worn they would be copied and the originals carefully preserved, not merely as relics, but also for the collation of copies, so rapidly multiplied that the Epistles of St. Paul were in the course of a few years known throughout the West.

But the main point is that Tertullian knew of no higher authority to which to appeal than the writings of an Apostle. In the next century a further advance is made. For immediately at its close, in A.D. 303, the Diocletian persecution arose, and this was directed not so much against the persons of Christians, as against their books. The books of the New Testament were so identified with Christianity that the Emperor and his council concluded that if they could destroy the Christian Scriptures they would destroy also the religion based upon them. And so the order went forth that from the Euphrates to the Atlantic, from the Cataracts of the Nile to Britain, Christians should be compelled to surrender their holy books under penalty of imprisonment, torture, slavery, and death. And many feeble creatures obeyed, and were branded by the rest as traditores—that is, men who gave up their Bibles were looked upon as guilty of the same crime as the traitor Judas, who betrayed his Lord. And when the persecution was over, when some of these traitors after public penance were readmitted into communion, the Donatists broke out into open schism, and alleged that the crime was one past forgiveness. Great indeed must have been the value set upon the Scriptures in those days, when thus men could place them upon a level with the person of Christ. And it is interesting to find that the Donatists received the same books of the New Testament as ourselves, excepting the Epistle to the Hebrews. But another unexpected result of this persecution was that a sharp line of distinction was drawn between the books that were canonical and those that were not so. The Epistles of Clement and Barnabas, the Shepherd of Hermas, and similar works, were read in church for instruction of life, and are even found in Biblical manuscripts; but a man was not deemed a traitor for surrendering these. The act was not approved, but it was visited by no ecclesiastical censure; and it seems as if sometimes such books were placed in the way of the Emperor's emissaries, and surrendered after decent resistance, while the copies of the Gospels were carefully hidden away.

To sum up this part of our subject, we find at first no controversy in the Church, but an eager expectation of the Second Advent, and a devout and earnest care for a holy life. In those days the Gospels and Apostolic writings formed only a part of the Christian heritage, and an almost equally important place was held by institutions founded by Apostles, by Apostolic practices (comp. 1 Cor. xi. 16), and by the living memory of their words, and of the words of Christ narrated by them. But in course of time controversy arose, and the attempt was made to blend Christianity with Oriental philosophies, and believers were thereby compelled to look to their foundations, and were Divinely led to the conclusion that they must accept no doctrines, however specious, for which Apostolic authority could not be found. And this appreciation of the value of their holy books so grew during the many trials of the Church in the third century, that the heathen world now identified Christianity with the writings of the New Testament, and supposed that by destroying them they would obliterate also the religion of Christ.

And thus we have seen how the providence of God gradually led the Church to the conviction that they had in their sacred books a treasure of inestimable worth. And it had been made all the dearer to them by the attempt to rob them of it by force. We shall next see how this treasure was made sure—first by means of manuscripts, and secondly by its translation into other tongues.

HOW DICK MANAGED IT.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SYLVIA MORETON'S PROBATION," ETC.

"Effie had settled herself cosily, a child on either side."—p. 26.

I.

"EFFIE, I am afraid you don't find that book so interesting as I did; but I think we ought to read everything we can about Australia; and Edmund told us of it, too!" There was a tone of mild reproach in Mrs. Karton's last words.

"It's a dull, stupid book, mother!" said Effie decidedly. "As far as I've gone, there's nothing interesting, except that account of the dreadful accident to a sheep-farmer, and really I was thinking I shouldn't mind if we were to sail to-morrow; I might have some chance of getting a little practice in the bush!" and she threw down her book impatiently. Turning to her brother, who was busy with his Latin dictionary, she continued, "I followed an omnibus all down the street this afternoon, because one of the wheels wobbled so. If it had come off, there would have been some splendid cases—it was crowded, inside and out. As I was hurrying along I just felt the handle of my sunshade, to see if I could break the stick to use as extemporised splints, you know, and snap it went in a moment. Wasn't it provoking? And then I met Clara Gower. She had a sprain, divided artery, and nearly a fractured collar-bone, only that a doctor unfortunately came in just as she found her bandages. She hasn't much method; and it was to aggravate me, I'm sure, she told me that Ellen Roberts' cook had a 'really magnificent scald'—emptied a kettle of boiling water over her arm—and Ellen dresses it and everything. Before we heard of the St. John's Ambulance classes, Dick, you were always hurting yourself; and since I've taken my certificate, you have only had that miserable cut on your forehead!" and Effie evidently considered that fate and her brother had been extremely unkind.

"I'm awfully sorry, Euphemia," said Dick, putting his pen behind his ear. "You know, I wanted you to be at our cricket-match last Saturday; Jack Symonds' thumb was broken by a cricket-ball, and——"

"Do stop, Dick!" exclaimed Effie. "How could I come, when Aunt Anne had sent for me?"

"Children," said their mother, with a perceptible shiver, "I cannot let you talk about accidents in that heartless way—it makes me quite cold!"

"But you don't understand, mother," said Effie. "We don't wish people to hurt themselves, of course; at least, if they do, it is hard that a qualified person should be out of the way just when she's wanted; I might as well never have passed the examination, if my knowledge is to be of no use to me!" with a heavy sigh. "If Clara hadn't been on the spot when that artery was cut through, for instance, it might have been quite serious. Nobody else had an idea, she told me."

"You could do it all twice as well as that bungling Clara," said Dick. "I'd rather trust myself to our butcher." Effie's brow cleared; she was flattered by Dick's interest and appreciation, and when he added,

"Look here, Euphemia! I'll make all our fellows promise to give you the first chance next time anything happens; there's a bicycle-race this week, and another cricket-match coming off, and my chum, Charlie Preston, is a most unlucky fellow"—Effie felt as if she could have hugged him, but wisely refrained, and offered instead to help him with his English composition.

A present from Aunt Anne of an exceedingly pretty sunshade opportunely arrived next afternoon, convincing Effie Karton that there was still some brightness in this disappointing world, and she and Mrs. Karton sat in serious consultation as to whether this gift had not made a new hat an absolute necessity.

"Is that Dick?" said Effie, taking off her thimble. "How quietly he has come in!"

The door was opened about two inches, and a sepulchral voice said, "Euphemia, you're wanted!"

Effie was in the hall in a moment.

"A bicycle accident," said Dick, glancing with infinite satisfaction at a deplorable figure, smirched with mud, and hastily binding a handkerchief round a bleeding hand.

"Your cuts shall have attention at once: sit down in the drawing-room, please," said Effie, as she flew to her "ambulance" drawer, whilst Dick introduced her case as Charlie Preston's brother.

"I must apologise for coming so unceremoniously," said their visitor. "But I have just had an awkward tumble, and your son took compassion on me and brought me in."

"Oh, quite right: I am afraid you are a great deal hurt; your forehead is bleeding terribly," murmured Mrs. Karton a little faintly, sinking rather suddenly in the nearest chair. Just then Effie came in, carrying a basin with cold water, several bandages, a case of plaster, scissors, etc.; she took in the situation at a glance.

"Mother, I'll turn your chair round till I've removed the traces of the accident. There, now you won't see anything."

"My daughter, Mr. Preston," said Mrs. Karton; "you will excuse it, I'm sure, if I seem a little impolite."

"I'm only sorry to put you to so much trouble and inconvenience," said Mr. Preston, addressing the back of Mrs. Karton's chair.

"You needn't think it's any trouble to Euphemia; she would rather see those cuts—" began Dick, when he was stopped by a stern glance, and a request to hold the basin.

"I am fully qualified to render first aid," said Effie, untying the tightly knotted handkerchief.

"So your brother has been telling me," replied Mr. Preston. "I have most implicit confidence."

It was quite as well that Mrs. Karton could not see the wound.

"Arterial hæmorrhage," said Effie to herself—"I must apply the tourniquet;" quickly taking it from the table, with the necessary bandages. "This will stop the excessive bleeding," she explained meanwhile to her patient, who bowed, and closed his eyes, his lips twitching convulsively.

"Let me give it another screw!" said Dick eagerly.

He was watching the proceedings with the deepest interest. "Look out, Euphemia! he's going to faint; whatever shall we do?—I know; irritate the back of the throat with the forefinger, or tickle the nostrils with a feather—no, that was in cases of poisoning or drowning, I forget which."

Mr. Preston made some inarticulate sound. Effie just glanced at him sharply, and sent Dick off for a glass of cold water.

"There is really nothing to alarm yourself about," she remarked quietly. "An ordinary attack of bleeding at the nose would be almost as bad. Will you put your hand up?—so—thank you, that is exactly the right position. You feel better now, I hope?" she went on, a little more amicably.

"Oh, yes, thank you; it was only momentary," he replied, closing his eyes again.

"I will bring you some sal volatile," said kind Mrs. Karton.

"Don't move for a minute, mother," said Effie. "Dick shall take away the sponge and water directly."

Then she finished binding the wounded hand very deftly and quickly, and arranged the sling; Dick made a very good assistant, and obeyed orders to the letter.

"Now for your forehead," said Effie. "Ah, that's only a graze, but there is a good deal of mud, which makes it look worse than it is. I must cut away a little of your hair—the scissors, Dick."

Mr. Preston laughed, more than the remark required, Effie thought.

She sponged and plastered carefully, and said reassuringly, "It will not leave more than the slightest scar, and scarcely shows even now."

"It is the neatest job I ever saw," said Dick, looking at the case with genuine satisfaction. "I hope you'll get something to do next Saturday."

"I have been hastening our meat tea," said Mrs. Karton. "I'm sure you must have some nourishment before you attempt to go home."

"You are really too kind," said Mr. Preston.

"Effie dear," continued her mother, "if you dress quickly, you will just be in time for the six o'clock train. Aunt Anne is expecting you."

"You'll pass the school, Euphemia," said Dick; "I'll scribble a note, and you can leave it for Charlie—I know he hasn't gone yet; he had some lines to write—then he'll come on here, and have tea with us, mother."

"Yes, certainly," said Mrs. Karton. "I had been thinking someone ought to go home with Mr. Preston in case the faintness should come on again."

Mr. Preston at this remark caught Dick's eye, which had a rather quizzical expression, and hastily turning to Miss Karton, said he was ashamed to give so much trouble.

"Not at all," said Effie. "I am very glad to have been useful." She stopped at the door to say, "If the bleeding should begin again—I don't think it will—you can call in your medical man."

"I am sure that will be quite unnecessary," said Mr. Preston politely.

Dick handed his sister a very untidy note. "Mind you say when you give it in that Preston's brother has had an accident, and he's wanted directly; old Gregson's so awfully crabby to-day."

II.

WHEN Effie came home the next afternoon, she found her mother eagerly watching for her.

"Oh, Effie!" she cried, "I am sorry you could not have been back sooner! I sent Dick out twice to see if you were coming. Mrs. Preston called to thank "Dick uttered only one word."—p. 27.

"Charlie will be rather waxy about the bicycle, sir," turning to Mr. Preston. "He's entered for the race next week, and it's the best machine out."

"I'll come with you and see the damage," replied Mr. Preston, rising without any trace of the faintness which had made Mrs. Karton so anxious.

Effie left them in deep consultation, as she passed through the hall. "I wonder if I shall meet Clara?" she thought. "Of course a dislocated collar-bone would have made it perfect, but one can't have everything! It will be nice to tell Aunt Anne about it all to-night. Dick is the sweetest boy in the world!"

us for our kindness to her son; he could not come himself; he was too busy."

"The cut is going on satisfactorily, I hope?" inquired Effie.

"Oh yes, dear, perfectly," replied her mother. "Just put your hat down on the sofa; I want to tell you about it all. We had such a pleasant, friendly talk, and the coincidences are quite wonderful. She lost her husband within a month of your poor father's death. Her youngest son is just Dick's age, as you know, and the eldest—our Mr. Preston—is exactly a week older than Edmund! She has one daughter—that's the only difference: married, and living in India: so she understands what it is to have the seas rolling between oneself and a child! She is very proud of her son; she says he is so steady and hard-working, and has just passed some most difficult examinations."

"In what, mother?" interrupted Effie, interested at once.

"I'm sorry, love, I didn't inquire: Civil Service, no doubt. Of course, I didn't breathe or hint any surprise; but did you think he looked particularly clever? Very good, but so plain, poor fellow! Certainly, his wounds and cuts did not improve him, and his coat was so torn—did you notice?"

"He must be rather a duffer," remarked Dick, "to try to ride Charlie's bicycle. He had called for him at school, and Mops was kept in, as he generally is, so he was riding up and down the street, waiting for him. Mrs. Preston doesn't think much of the ambulance classes, Euphemia."

"Oh, dear! I meant to have told Dick not to mention that," said Mrs. Karton. "She was most kind and grateful; and you know, Effie, at first I did not quite like you to join them: it seemed intruding a little in the sphere of the properly qualified medical profession."

"Well, mother, and I am properly qualified, and did not undertake one iota more than I had a perfect right to do," said Effie, flushing up—it was a very warm afternoon. "There is not a doctor within a mile of this house; and would Mrs. Preston have wished the hæmorrhage from that divided artery to have gone on till her son had been taken to Gloster Street; and then most likely the doctor would have been out—a fainting subject, too!"

"Mops thought I was pretending when I said something about that, Euphemia," put in Dick. "You wouldn't catch him fainting; he's wonderfully plucky."

"You must not have such a false impression of Mrs. Preston, Effie; you are too hasty. I liked her so much. I feel as if we had found a friend, and before she left I promised we would all spend Saturday afternoon with her. She has taken a farm-house about fifteen miles out of town, chiefly for the sake of her Indian grandchildren—two dear little girls, whom her daughter has put under her care; there is a large rambling garden. I thought you would have been so pleased, Effie, and you don't look so in the least! I am just pining for a breath of country air, and Dick is delighted to go, but you care for nothing but classes and disagreeable bandages," and Mrs. Karton's pretty eyes were quite moist with vexation.

"I dare say I shall enjoy it, mother," said Effie. "I only mean it's a pity people will be so old-fashioned and frumpy. If her son is so remarkably clever, he ought to have enlightened Mrs. Preston a little, that's all! It won't be so bad, perhaps. I'll leave Mrs. Preston to her ignorance, and have a walk with Dick and the little girls."

"You needn't expect me to go with you," said Dick loftily. "Charlie's got a new terrier."

"I may as well order my hat to-morrow," said Effie absently. "The sateen will do very well; I've only worn it once. What is the matter, Dick?"

Her brother was laughing, and then checking himself, in a very significant way.

"Oh, nothing particular," was the answer, and the curly head went down again into the Latin grammar.

"Don't be silly, Dick; you may as well tell me," said Effie crossly.

"Well, then," said Dick, "I asked Mops what his brother is, and he's a doctor—just taken his M.D. There!"

Effie's cheeks were crimson.

"And I was explaining the use of the tourniquet!" she thought; but in a moment she had recovered herself.

"If he's fifty times a doctor, he couldn't have bound up his own hand," she said calmly, "and he couldn't deny that I am perfectly competent. I don't believe," she continued, rising, and taking up her gloves and hat, "I do not believe that he could have done it better himself."

Dick secretly quite agreed with her.

III.

WHERE can one find a more luxurious couch than a partly demolished straw-stack?

Effie had settled herself very cosily, a child on either side—it was such a dreamy, hot afternoon that her conscience even had gone to sleep, and did not inform her that she looked, for once, a thoroughly indolent girl.

"There's Uncle Bramley," cried little Elsie, at last. "I did want to hear the end."

"I was sent to tell you tea is ready," said Dr. Preston, "but it seems a shame to go in," sinking down into the straw, and taking one of his small nieces on his knee.

"I'd much rather stay here," said Elsie; "Miss Karton is telling us such a beautiful story of a poor little boy who broke his leg."

Effie felt her cheeks growing hot, though Dr. Preston was gravity itself.

"I like her stories much better than yours, Uncle Bramley," said Maggie candidly; "yours are fairy tales, and rather silly, but she tells about real people."

"But uncle's are very nice, too," said Elsie, kissing him shyly; "and the fairies are really alive, you know, only they are too small for us to see; I should like to hear them ringing the lily-bells on midsummer night."

Just then the boys came up, the terrier sniffing for possible rats.

"Here, children," said Uncle Charlie benevolently, "I've brought you some cherries."

"Rather numerous foreign bodies, Charlie," remarked his brother, as the capacious pockets were turned inside out.

"Why, Euphemia," said Dick, after a prolonged stare, "you are just like that picture of Ophelia, with flowers and grasses stuck about your hair; what a fright you look!"

Effie laughed merrily.

"Oh, we did it," said Elsie; "I think it is lovely."

Ample justice was done to Mrs. Preston's bountiful tea, especially to her home-made sponge-cakes.

"It was such a comfort to have your own eggs," as Mrs. Karton said.

How sorry they all were when the sober pony appeared, and the visit was over!

"My dear," Effie heard Mrs. Preston say to her mother, "I will come and see you whenever I go to Bramley's rooms; I like to pop in there unexpectedly, and make sure he is comfortable."

"What is to be done with this newspaper parcel, Charlie?" asked Dr. Preston.

"It is rather a large bottle," said Charlie apologetically; "but the toad takes up so much room; I couldn't get you a frog. The efts are at the top, and there are two spiders in pill-boxes. I don't think anything will get out, and Dick will soon put it back if it does."

Effie accepted the offering gratefully, and without a shudder.

"Well, Bramley," said his mother, as they strolled together in the garden, "your accident has brought us some very pleasant acquaintances."

"What do you think of the 'qualified lady,' mother?" asked Bramley.

"She is not pretty, and certainly has nothing of the coquette about her," was the reply. "How proud Mrs. Karton is of Edmund! You would suppose that he was the most clever, handsome young man that ever existed. Perhaps it is a natural infatuation, poor thing!"

"Very natural, mother," said Bramley, with a smile.

IV.

ONE wild October evening, Effie was pacing the little drawing-room. "Dick not home yet!" she was thinking; "oh, my darling! I'm sure something dreadful has happened. Why did we let him go out fishing with Charlie? The banks are so slippery——" She heard a cautious ring, and was at the door in a moment. "Dr. Preston!" she exclaimed, seizing his arm, "oh, have you brought him home?"

"Yes; I've carried him all the way. You expected him, then?"

Effie shuddered, and covered her face, tottering back into the hall.

"You are not afraid of him, surely—poor fellow!" said Bramley.

"Oh! was everything done for him?" she groaned.

Dr. Preston dragged in some heavy, resisting body, and closed the door, as the wind moaned, and a melancholy howl answered it, like an echo. Mrs. Karton and Aunt Anne ran into the hall.

"Dr. Preston!" exclaimed the former in astonishment. "What a dreadful dog! Oh, what is the matter with Effie? It has bitten her, and you are afraid to tell me!"

"Hush!" said Aunt Anne. "Effie has far too much good sense to be really frightened. Show me the place, love."

"Oh, Dr. Preston! not an Italian iron!" implored terrified Mrs. Karton.

Dr. Preston rubbed up his hair, which generally had a startled appearance. The hideous terrier, released, went up to Effie, and began sniffing in a friendly sort of way.

"I should as soon think of biting," Dr. Preston began, looking helplessly at the group of ladies. "I don't know in the least what is the matter with Miss Karton. I obeyed Dick's orders to the letter. He said his sister was expecting Snap, and would break the news of his arrival, as you don't like dogs," turning to Mrs. Karton.

Effie was looking at him in utter bewilderment. "Dick!" she gasped.

"He is all right, and will stay to-night at my mother's. I can't say Charlie's clothes are an exact fit. Of course, he got wet through in this rain."

"Oh!—I thought—he had fallen in the river," sighed Effie.

Bramley burst into an uncontrollable fit of laughing. Poor Effie rose to her full height, and went slowly back to the drawing-room, closely followed by Dick's new possession, and, after a moment's hesitation, by his late master.

"I do hope you will forgive us both," said Dr. Preston, stroking his moustache, whilst his laughing eyes betrayed him.

"You do not really mind whether I do or not," said Effie severely. "You make a joke of everything. You couldn't understand how much I love Dick."

There was a short silence, then—"I have not given you Dick's message yet. His love, and you would find two dog-biscuits on his Latin dictionary. You were to be sure and break them up, but not soak them on any account."

Effie smiled, and gave Snap a kiss.

"You said the other day that I was always successful," remarked Dr. Preston, apparently addressing the fender; "and yet just the one thing I care for more than all the world I cannot get."

That moment Mrs. Karton appeared at the door.

"You must be almost famished, Dr. Preston," she said. "Do come and have some supper"—for these barbarous people really ate and enjoyed that meal.

Now Dick was a clever boy, and had great powers of discrimination, so next day Effie repeated Dr. Preston's remark.

"He is much nicer than he used to be, and I should really like to know that he has his wish; but what can it be, Dick?"

"I believe I know what he wants," said Dick, with a nod of intense sagacity. "Lend me your ear, Euphemia, and I'll tell you."

Dick uttered only one word, but its effect was magical. His sister's face crimsoned, and her look of consternation was delightful.

"Oh, Dick! How could you imagine such a thing? It's impossible!" she cried.

"Well, it does seem funny," Dick allowed candidly. "But then he is rather a duffer in some ways. I shall be late for school. I heard him tell mother he should call this afternoon. Don't keep so red—he'll think you've got apoplexy, or something."

"Dick," said Bramley Preston that evening, with his happy, boyish smile, "I'm the one man in the world who has everything he wants."

WILLIAM BROWN, BOY MARTYR.

THE MARTYR'S TREE, BRENTWOOD (where Brown was executed).

THE sky is dark, although it is midday;
But in the open space of Brentwood town
Red, leaping flames about the faggots play, Waiting for William Brown;

Only a boy, a "heretic" though a boy,
Brought to his home while all the heavens are dim,
Brought here to die with courage—nay, with joy;
Good people, pray for him.

Cold is the sky, and all those faces cold,
And all is cold save where the faggots be;
And the boy says—he is but twelve years old—
"Good people, pray for me."

There stands a man with children of his own;
There stands a mother, her babe is at her breast;
Brothers and sisters stand about the town—
These all hear his request.

The father turns his scornful head away,
The mother tighter holds her infant fair,

Brothers and sisters laugh as if in play,
But no one prays a prayer.

Yet one rude voice responds, while darken down
The murky heavens as if it were not day,
"I'll pray no more for thee, boy William Brown, Than for a dog I'd pray."

Then the boy William Brown lifts up his eyes,
From pitiless men, from fires of agony,
And says, before dark faces and dark skies,
"Son of God, shine on me!"

At once the sun shines through the thick, black clouds,
Full on the face of William Brown, whose sight
Is fain to look away, not from the crowds,
But from the dazzling light.

The sky is rent, the brightness of God's Throne
Pierces the darkness with a sudden joy;
Ye need not pray—the need of prayer is gone
For him, the martyr boy.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME

THE CAPTIVITY AND RESTORATION OF JUDAH.

STORIES FROM JEREMIAH, DANIEL, EZRA, NEHEMIAH, ESTHER.

NO. 1. JEREMIAH'S CALL.

To read—Jeremiah i.

INTRODUCTION. This course of lessons to be upon the Captivity and Restoration of the kingdom of Judah. Teacher must remind children how at death of Solomon the nation was divided into two parts—kingdom of Judah (two tribes)—under Rehoboam—kingdom of Israel (ten tribes)—under Jeroboam. How all the kings of Israel turned out badly—worshipped idols—till that kingdom was destroyed, B.C. 721, in reign of Hoshea. Many kings of Judah also bad, but some good. Last good king—Josiah—killed in battle with Egyptians. After him four kings only—each reigned short time—really vassals of king of Babylon. At this period prophet Jeremiah raised up.

I. HIS CALL. (1—6.) Had been dark days in Judah—wickedness flourished—idolatry everywhere—kings setting shocking example. Yet God never left without a witness—some bright spot always. One help to this would be cities of the priests. Priests not all to live at Jerusalem—scattered about country in separate villages—there they would offer up sacrifices—teach people to fear God. One of these villages—Anathoth—in tribe of Benjamin. Here Jeremiah born—brought up—taught, like Samuel, to fear God. Lived in five reigns, beginning with good King Josiah, till captivity of Judah in reign of Zedekiah, B.C. 606.

God's voice now comes to him. How?

Perhaps in visions of night—as to Samuel. (1 Sam. iii. 10.)

Perhaps in still small voice—as to Elijah. (1 Kings xix. 12.)

Perhaps by Urim and Thummim on breastplate.

God's message. God formed him for his work, as He did St. Paul. (Acts ix. 15, 16.)

God sanctified, i.e. set him apart. (Isa. xliii. 3.)

God ordained, i.e. appointed him as prophet.

Why does he hesitate? Is young, diffident for so great work.

Shows proper humility. Therefore is encouraged.

II. HIS WORK. (7—10.) (a) To declare God's will to the people.

(b) To travel long journeys—even as far as river Euphrates (xliii. 5).

(c) To prophesy punishment to Judah for their sins (verse 10).

Need not be afraid—is not to speak his own words, but God's—and is assured of God's protection.

III. HIS SIGNS. (11—19.) Outward and visible signs that his message is from God.

(a) Almond-tree—first to bud in the year—token of speedy fulfilment of the prophecy.

(b) Seething pot (i.e. boiling) toward north—from whence—i.e. Babylon—judgment should come.

Also signs to encourage him. He should be like—

(a) A defended city—unable to be taken by enemies.

(b) An iron pillar—against kings of Judah who might harass him.

(c) Brazen walls—against princes.

Thus his call, message, protection—all alike from God.

LESSONS. 1. Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?

2. If God be for us, who can be against us?

NO. 2. JEREMIAH'S MESSAGE.

To read—Jeremiah xxii.

KINGS in Judah hereditary, as with us, but at this unsettled time others than eldest son sometimes reigned; thus, after Josiah, Shallum, a younger son, put on throne by the people (2 Kings xxii. 30)—he takes name of Jehoahaz; in three months taken prisoner by king of Egypt. Is succeeded by elder brother, Eliakim—name changed to Jehoiakim—reigns eleven years. Is succeeded by his son Coniah or Jehoiachin—reigns one month, and then carried captive to Babylon.

This chapter gives Jeremiah's prophecies against all three.

I. GENERAL PROPHECIES. (1—9.) Jeremiah to go to the king—as Elijah did to Ahab, prophet of Judah to Jeroboam (1 Kings xliii. 1). Moses to Pharaoh—and rebuke him for his sin. What does this show?

1. God is no respecter of persons.

2. Warning always precedes judgment.

See the duties of kings as set forth in these verses:—

(a) To carry out the laws justly.

(b) To protect the oppressed.

(c) To take care of fatherless, widows, etc.

If this done, kings shall prosper and kingdom last.

If not done, judgment shall follow, viz.:—

(a) King's palace shall be destroyed—built by Solomon at great cost.

(b) Cedars of Lebanon shall be cut down. (See Isa. xxxvii. 24.)

(c) Cities become desolate.

(d) People become by-word among other nations.

All because of forsaking God.

II. PROPHECY TO SHALLUM. (10—12.) Not to weep for Josiah—he died before this misery—his end was happy, being taken from the evil to come (Isa. lvii. 1), but weep for this king. Is to be an exile—die in foreign land—far away from home. Literally fulfilled, as he was taken prisoner by Pharaoh and died in Egypt. (2 Kings xxiii. 34.) So Christ told women of Jerusalem not to weep for Him, but for themselves. (St. Luke xxiii. 28.)

III. PROPHECY TO JEHOIAKIM. (13—19.) What was his special wrong-doing?

(a) Unfair dealing with work-people. (See James v. 4.)

(b) Luxurious living in very troubled times.

(c) Neglecting the poor and needy.

Thus failed in duty to God and man.

His judgment—to die unlamented and to have dishonoured grave.

IV. PROPHECY TO CONIAH. (20—30.) Son of Jehoiakim. Notice:—

(a) Had had warning, but disregarded it (21).

(b) Shall now be sent into captivity (25).

(c) Shall never return to his own land (26).

(d) His seed shall become extinct (30).

LESSONS. 1. God notices all wrong-doing.

2. Iniquity shall surely be punished.

3. Punishments often come in this life.

4. Yet may return, repent, and be forgiven.

NO. 3. CAPTIVITY FORETOLD.

To read—Jeremiah xcv. 1—14; xcvi. 8—16.

So far have had general warnings of Jeremiah against Jerusalem and its kings for their iniquity. Now have definite prophecy as to the time and place and agents of the captivity. Judah has been warned again and again in vain—now the punishment is at hand.

I. CAUSE OF THE JUDGMENT. (1—7.) Note the time—first year of Nebuchadnezzar's long reign. Assyrian empire had fallen—Babylonian takes its place. In this year came God's word about this great king of Babylon. Why is Judah condemned? Because—

(a) Jeremiah has told them God's word early and late, but in vain.

(b) God has sent all His prophets to those who would not listen to Jeremiah.

What was the nature of the warnings?

(a) Turn from evil ways.

(b) Turn from other gods.

(c) Do not provoke God to anger.

Notice the words "rising early and sending them"—only found in this book. Show God's eager longing to win them back—to do all possible.

II. NATURE OF THE JUDGMENT. (8—14.)

(a) A heathen king to be sent against them—would be employed as God's servant to carry out His work.

(b) Destruction would be complete—whole land to be destroyed.

(c) All joy, and even ordinary occupations, would cease. No wedding feast, no songs or cheerful country noises be heard.

(d) People to be in bondage seventy years.

But after that the kingdom of Babylon would be punished. Jeremiah prophesied against it also (l. li.), and all came to pass.

III. PROPHET IN DANGER. (xxvi. 8—16.) Jeremiah been very brave—told all God's words fearlessly—like Samuel, kept none back. (1 Sam. iii. 18.) What was the result?

(a) A great gathering in Jerusalem to discuss the matter.

(b) A division—priests and prophets against him; princes and people on his side.

(c) An appeal from Jeremiah to the princes (12).

Notice Jeremiah's conduct—his perfect calmness—places himself in their hands—his declaring his mission as from God—his call to them to repent—his prophecy of woe if they kill him.

Result—he wins over the princes and people—his life is saved (16—24).

LESSONS. 1. Boldness in doing right. Jeremiah was doing God's work, and was protected by Him.

2. Trust in God's care. "Who is he that shall harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good?"

NO. 4. THE RECHABITES.

To read—Jeremiah xxxv.

In all dark scenes of this time (reign of Jehoiakim), one bright picture stands out—picture of a family leading simple, temperate lives—fearing God in midst of ungodly people.

I. WHO THEY WERE. (1 Chron. ii. 55.) Kenites first mentioned in Gen. xv. 18, as among old inhabitants of Canaan. After Israelites settled in Canaan Kenites joined them—settled down among them—probably learned from them to fear God. Hear no more till reign of Jehu—he made friends with Jehonadab, their chief (2 Kings x. 15). Now have come to live in Jerusalem (11).

II. HOW THEY LIVED. (1—11.) What was Jeremiah told to do? This giving them wine would be a test of their obedience. What rules had Jonadab laid down for them?

1. Temperance—To drink no wine.

2. Simplicity—To dwell in tents.

3. Frugality—To have no houses or vineyards.

Thus lived like Arabs—in tents—driving flocks and herds—no settled habitation. But since invasions of Chaldeans, obliged to come to Jerusalem for safety.

What was promised them? To dwell long in the land (7). Abundantly fulfilled. Remained obedient to ancestor's command—steadfast under Jeremiah's trial—were owned and blessed by God.

III. WHAT THEY TAUGHT. (12—19.) 1. Obedience. Several hundred years passed since received father's commands—yet still kept them. They obeyed earthly parent—Jews disobeyed heavenly Father.

2. Faithfulness under temptation. Seemed a small thing to drink a little wine. Some might say, Where is the harm? But they were forbidden to do so, and kept the command. Contrast with disobedient prophet. (1 Kings xiii. 19.) How can we copy the Rechabites?

God is our Father (St. Matt. vi. 10)—has given us commandment.

Told to keep our bodies in soberness (1 Cor. vi. 19).

Told not to set our thoughts on earthly things (Col. iii. 1).

Told to live as pilgrims on earth (Heb. xiii. 14). Have we kept these commandments?

Then may expect God's blessing on earth (Ps. cxxxviii. 1—2) and eternal happiness.

THE BISHOP OF LIVERPOOL AND HIS WORK.

AN INTERVIEW.—BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

BERCROMBY SQUARE, Liverpool, may be said, in a Tennysonian phrase, to be "half within and half without, but full of dealings with" the great city on the Mersey. It is free from the rough rush of life by the river-side; it has not the hurry of Lime Street, nor the fevered pulses that stir near the Exchange; but it is comparatively quiet, it is retired, dignified, and decorous; the very place for the residence of a Bishop. In it resides the Bishop of Liverpool. The dwelling is a stately one, deserving the title of Palace. It is a house intended years ago—in the days when statesmen declared that the Southern States "had made a nation"—as a reception-house for those of the "nation" who came to the port which is the chief centre of its export trade. The collapse of the "nation" put the mansion in Abercromby Square into the market, and it was bought by the Bishopric Committee, and thus devoted to its present use. There is, then, this singularity attached to the residences of two recently formed bishoprics: in the case of Liverpool the Palace was destined for another and a less noble use, and in the case of Newcastle, Benwell Tower—an old mansion near the Tyne—was a gift to the bishopric by a Quaker.

The Palace, Abercromby Square, Liverpool, is fitted magnificently internally. From the hall, on either side, handsome reception and drawing-rooms are reached—the dining-room is also on the same level—and a splendid staircase leads upwards. On the first floor is the Bishop's study, lined with volumes on three of its four sides—many of the books being those "darling folios" Charles Lamb loved. Dr. Ryle tells you he likes "an upper room;" and the quiet here, the glance out from the window into the open square, with its few green trees, justifies that liking. Here in his study, or in the reception-room below it, much of his time is passed. He has an office in the heart of Liverpool, where once a week he devotes two hours to interviews with all who may wish to see him. His correspondence is heavy, from all parts of England and often from the colonies, and needing in reply an average of more than thirty letters daily; that task and others of like nature occupy from two to three hours after breakfast. From three to four days weekly there are engagements to attend committees, to address meetings, to fold confirmations, or to consecrate churches or churchyards. It is a proof of the growth of the Church in the diocese that since it was formed the Bishop has consecrated twenty new churches.

There is no "Dean and Chapter" at Liverpool, but the old parish church of St. Peter's is used as a cathedral, and there is a cathedral service daily, with a good choir; the Sunday afternoon service being taken by the Bishop or one of twenty-four honorary canons. There are now two archdeacons in the diocese (Liverpool and Warrington), and ten rural deans, both these numbers having been increased since the bishopric was established. There are 500 lay helpers and forty-one lay readers enrolled by the Bishop.

In an easy conversational manner Dr. Ryle gives most of these facts. Of the Bishop of Liverpool personally it may be said that he is tall, fully built, of imposing presence; his face is suffused with colour, his beard falls on his breast, and a full, rich voice gives dignity to his words. John Charles Ryle, D.D., is the eldest son of the late John Ryle, M.P.; he was born in 1816 near Macclesfield, and was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford. At Oxford he obtained the Craven University Scholarship, and was in the first class in the final classical schools, side by side with the late Dean Stanley. He was also well known as a leading cricketer in the Oxford eleven. In 1841 his father's banks at Manchester and Macclesfield failed, which prevented his going into Parliament, as it was expected he would, and he became a clergyman, first at Winchester, and afterwards for thirty-five years at Helmingham and Stradbroke in Suffolk. He was then appointed Dean of Salisbury, and finally Bishop of Liverpool in 1880. Dr. Ryle is the writer of many theological works, and of over 200 widely circulated tracts. The Bishop has five children—three sons and two daughters. It is a fact of some interest that Dean Stanley was born near the birthplace of the Bishop of Liverpool; but though contemporaries, their scholastic and university training was at different centres, and they belonged to different schools of thought in the Church.

Dr. Ryle shows in his dining-room a portrait of his grandfather, John Ryle (a personal friend and follower of John Wesley), by whom the fortunes of the family were laid. A large portrait of the Bishop himself, taken in his robes of consecration, and one at an early period of life, are also hung in the same room. In his study he retains a view of his birthplace—Park House, near Macclesfield; a map of the diocese is over the fireplace, and on the landing is a curious little engraving of Liverpool two centuries ago. There are other indications of the liking retained for the memories of old, and for the scenes of the present; and there is a pair of pretty pictures —miniature likenesses of good Queen Bess and of Mary, Queen of Scots, the gift of a relative—which attract attention in one of the reception-rooms.

Of his work and his sphere of labour Dr. Ryle talks freely. He says that his diocese of Liverpool is one having rather remarkable peculiarities. With a population roundly numbering 1,200,000, it has a small area comparatively. It includes Liverpool, the second city of the Empire, with its 700,000 people; the watering-place of Southport, with some 40,000 persons; Wigan, with 120,000 people within three miles of its market-place; the partly manufacturing town of Warrington; St. Helens, dependent chiefly on chemicals and glass, and having the largest plate-glass works in the world; and Widnes, a mass of chemical works. In the diocese there is an immense number of Roman Catholics—more, perhaps, than in any other. Lancashire is one of the strongholds of that form of faith, and many of the older families have professed it through many generations; and, in addition to this, there is large and continued immigration of a lower order of Roman Catholics. Coming in numbers from Ireland, they find work at the docks and elsewhere, and generally stay in or near the city. Again, the diocese has a large number of Welsh inhabitants—a number estimated by the Bishop of Liverpool at 80,000, some of whom cannot understand with readiness any other language than their own. There are also large numbers of Presbyterians, many wealthy merchants being Scotchmen; and thus Episcopacy has not the predominance of wealthy adherents it has in some dioceses.

Seven years ago the diocese was cut off from that of Chester, the endowment was raised, the house bought, and Dr. Ryle was placed in it as the first Bishop of Liverpool. Dr. Ryle was offered the choice of residence in or out of the city, and he chose the former; in his own words, because he "thought it better to live amongst the people." And thus for ten months of the year he is a dweller in the city on the Mersey, going in and out amongst its people, mixing with them in their gatherings, social and philanthropic, and at their command in all that concerns the good of his great diocese. He is one of the few bishops thus resident in a great city—the Bishops of London, of Manchester, and of Newcastle adopting the same rule. His work is lightened, it is true, by the network of railways through the diocese, but something of its extent has already been hinted at. But with a limited number of churches—there are only 200 incumbencies in the diocese, and to the 200 incumbents there are 140 curates—and with a continually growing population, it will be seen that it must be a struggle to keep the Church abreast of the advancing population. Fifty years ago thirty-six churches and about seventy clergymen sufficed for Liverpool itself; now there are ninety churches and 185 clergy. Concurrent with that increase, there has been an increase in other methods of attaching the people to the Church, and of endeavouring to carry Christian philanthropy to the people. Liverpool has a grand School Board, and its Churchmen have rendered it all possible aid, whilst they carry on a number of efficient Church day-schools. There is an agency, the use of which is indicated by its title—"A Sheltering Home"—of which the Bishop speaks most highly, and which is carried on by Mrs. Birt (sister to Miss Annie Macpherson), and both in the number relieved and in the proportion "turning out well" there are encouraging results. In the city there are four large general hospitals, as well as six or seven special ones for cancer, ailments of the eye, children, etc. There are diocesan societies—one for church-building, one for the augmentation of small livings, another for church aid (giving grants to enable curates to be employed), and a fourth for educational purposes. Jointly with the diocese of Manchester there are kept up schools for daughters of the clergy at Warrington, and a Training College for Schoolmistresses. There is a powerful Scripture Readers' Society; and other kindred institutions, all of which claim the sympathy, time, and aid of the Bishop. There is also a Bible Women's Society, for employing women to visit their own sex, at home and in mothers' meetings—of which society Mrs. Ryle is fittingly President.

The Bishop recognises most fully the manner in which, by public bodies and by private beneficence, the wants of the people are being met in Liverpool. The Corporation spends its thousands in a wise and liberal manner, the three large parks being well kept up; and the Walker Art Gallery, the fine Library of Sir William Brown, and other similar institutions, speak of great private liberality. The great difficulty of the diocese is the common one of intemperance, but even in that the Bishop speaks with hope, for the committals of Liverpool have been brought down from 22,000 yearly to 17,000, though the population is growing. Drunkenness amongst women seems to increase, and that increase is by some attributed to the "grocers' licences," but, regretting the increase,

Dr. Ryle does not express any opinion as to the cause. Of the powerful local branch of the Church of England Temperance Society the Bishop is the President. As to infidelity, there must be some looked for in so large a population, but it is not believed to prevail to any great extent.

The prospects of the diocese are not so easily defined as they might be if the terrible trade depression had passed away. The people are more bound up in business; they have less money to devote to Church purposes, less to give away. Their liberality in other times is unbounded. Voluntary contributions founded the bishopric at a cost of nearly £100,000; a year or so afterwards a similar sum was spent on the University, and within four years another hundred thousand was contributed for rebuilding the Royal Infirmary. Again, by a widow lady, Mrs. Charles Turner, £20,000 was given to form a pension fund for aged and invalided clergymen in the diocese of Liverpool, the Bishop, the two archdeacons, and two laymen being the trustees. In conversation with the Bishop, the lady asked whether such a fund would be useful, and, on being assured that it would, she devoted to it the large endowment named. From the late Mr. Groves Dr. Ryle received also the large amount of £10,000 in one sum, for building churches, so that he has reason to speak with knowledge of the liberality of some of his people.

In the midst of this large population, with comparatively few wealthy supporters, with the resident noblemen of its own faith numbered literally on the fingers of one hand, and with a striking absence of adherents who are wealthy landowners, the Church in the diocese of Liverpool has struggled on and advanced in seven busy and eventful years.

In the great and varied diocese the Bishop renders constant, if changing, service. Regularly the stream of emigration is flowing from the Mersey, and Dr. Ryle is found frequently in the year addressing those leaving this land in the "liners" from Liverpool. The training ships in the port are visited by him, and he takes a lively interest in the Sailors' Homes. He ordains thirty to forty deacons yearly; he confirmed over 6,300 persons last year. When the Mayor and Corporation attend a special service, he is often found to be the appointed preacher, and the latest of such sermons (in commemoration of the Jubilee, on the passage, "For kings, and for all that are in authority") is striking in its appropriateness and simplicity. This year he preached also the "Spital Sermon" before the Lord Mayor of London, and in the same month one on the "Rights and Duties of Lay Churchmen." Of his style in preaching it may be added that in his little work on "Simplicity in Preaching" he says, "I honestly confess I do not think I have preached two sermons in my life without divisions. I find it of the utmost importance to make people understand, remember, and carry away what I say, and I am certain that divisions help me to do so. . . . I often read the sermons of Mr. Spurgeon. I like to gather hints about preaching from all quarters." He advises in all sermons, simplicity, directness of style, the use of short sentences, and the employment of plenty of anecdotes and illustrations.

Beyond the work, religious and philanthropic, directly falling on the Bishop, there is much more: distinguished men come to the Mersey, and he is called upon to give dignity to the feast; scientific associations gather, and he is often found needed; and he has had to "drink a little of the cup" of displeasure which follows any attempt to set ecclesiastical law in motion. Dr. Ryle is not often found in Parliament; he does not deem it needful for him to meddle much in general politics, but, as Chaplain of the House of Lords, he attended for eighteen months, and occasionally attends. He finds time to read much—he reads not fewer than three daily papers, magazines and reviews many, and he has the art of rapid reading of books, which Lord Macaulay possessed—in his own phrase, he is speedily able to get at "the brains of a book." He does not now write much—the varied work of a Bishop has checked the flow of works from Dr. Ryle's once prolific pen. This, then, in these modern days is the exemplification in the See of great ports factories, works and mines, of that "good work" which Timothy associated with "the office of a Bishop."

GOD'S CARE IN SMALL THINGS.

(ST. MATTHEW x. 29-31.)

BY THE REV. HARRY JONES, M.A., PREBENDARY OF ST. PAUL'S.

O doubt, before true science came, men learnt much about God's operations. Their sound went out into all lands, and their words into the ends of the world. But they were His grander ways which chiefly attracted attention. "The heavens," says David, "declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth His handy-work. He maketh the clouds His chariot, and walketh upon the wings of the wind." Thus, too, Job's littleness and ignorance bow down in the presence of the Lord. "Hast thou," he is asked, "entered into the springs of the sea? Hast thou perceived the breadth of the earth? Canst thou lift up thy voice to the clouds?"

Here, as elsewhere in most of the Old Testament, the imagery is of a very visible kind. The Hebrew prophets and poets walk in a world whose wonders are august and gigantic: wonders before which, man, with his hand full of little doings and wants, is sometimes tempted to shrink back with a sense of being overlooked. To us, however, the wonders of nature are not seen only in the cloud, the mountain, the lightning, and the storm. Another world has been revealed to us by modern science. We have learnt to correct our notions of great and small. Size or magnitude is of little account in the scientific revelation. We dare not use the term "the world of insignificance" in speaking of what is there revealed to us. It is profoundly significant. It is not merely that we see (with exclamations of delight) new beauty in the flake of snow, or in the feathers on the wing of the moth which snaps unheeded in the flame of our candle; but in the atoms of creation, in the material germs of good and evil, we perceive that fresh light may be shed upon the truths which interest us most deeply, and are mixed up with the very beginning of creation.

Now, there is wonderful magnifying power in the lenses of the Gospel of Christ. This shows us God's concern in what we have been tempted to call the common or lesser things of life. It reveals to us the true importance of what is close by, but which, without its magnifying power, we should naturally overlook. It shows us, in part at least, as we are able to bear it or take in the sight, the connection which exists between the least and the greatest in the economy of God, and the relation between the highest and the lowest in His Household and Kingdom. I think that this may be first seen in the foundation on which the Gospel of Christ is built: I mean what is called the Incarnation. The idea of the great God revealing Himself and His mind to man through One who does not make His appearance in the world with full-grown authority and power, but enters it as we all do, as an infant, and then increases in wisdom and stature, is a divinely original declaration, so to speak, of the kinship between the least and the greatest in His Kingdom.

We see this, too, in the "mode" of the ministry of Jesus. He does not display His wisdom and perform His works before potentates and kings and senates. He is not like Solomon, who was waited on by the Queen of Sheba. He is not like Moses, who does his wonders in the land of Egypt upon Pharaoh and all his host. But though charged with a wider mission to mankind, and set to do the will of God as it had never been done before, He at once mixes in the—to men—unnoticeable and common-place crowd around Him, ready indeed to sit in the Pharisee's house, but also to eat and drink with publicans and sinners.

The whole course of Christ's ministry, if it teaches us anything of the way of God, tells us how truly He concerns Himself with what we call the common lot of mankind. It brings up into sight that which would be otherwise overlooked as too small to be noticed. Christianity shows us God's great power and laws working in these small things just as much as in the greater. In the Gospel of Christ, God chooses the weak things of the world to confound the strong, and things that are not to bring to naught things that are: i.e., God is seen to show His concern in those which are commonly of small account. This appears, as I have said, in the lowliness of His entrance into the world, and in the mode of the ministry of Christ, in His mixing with men and things of no great note in the world.

It appears, moreover, again and again in His words, and in the use which He makes of them. They are not grandiloquent, stupendous, or far-fetched. He uses the simplest, most domestic illustrations, and talks about the most homely matters. And He does this after the most plain and direct fashion. As to the pure all things are pure, so to Him there is nothing common or unclean, in itself. And as we see in Him one revealing the will and mind of God, this again shows us God's concern in the smaller matters of life. We learn that there is nothing beneath His notice, but that whether we eat or drink, or whatever we do, we are in close relationship with God. "All things are naked and opened unto the eyes of Him with whom we have to do." I am tired of hearing people draw distinctions between spiritual and earthly things, as if there were a set or group of matters which you could not expect God to care for or busy Himself about, like a king immersed in affairs of state, in holding councils, consulting with his ministers, reviewing his army, and giving grand entertainments at his court. We might think many things beneath such a king's dignity. We might think him bound to keep up his state in public, though he might be human enough in hours of royal retirement. Now God, so to speak, knows no such grand publicity, no such divine privacy. He knows no royal state procedure. All is as one to Him. He shines with equal warmth and light on the dustheap and on the throne. He equally paints the colours in the long-lived jewels of a crown which are the heirlooms of a dynasty, and in the rainbow which hangs for a minute in the summer shower.

And so also in what we call the spiritual world. He knows no separate set of duties. All works and operations come equally under His hand, whether we pretend to distinguish between them, and define them as material or mental, secular or religious, natural or sacred. He helps the wren to build its mossy nest in the deep silence of a wood, and He opens the lips of the prophet to reveal His will to mankind. He gives knowledge in the strenuous law court, the laboratory, the college, and the noisy market. All good gifts come from Him; instinct and reason, wisdom, understanding, and counsel; and they need to be used in any work that has to be done, if it is done rightly. There is no world of insignificance in the spiritual kingdom any more than there is in the world of nature. As there is a God at all, He must be concerned in every part and kind of life and work.

One great fault of religious people is the connecting or associating of God too exclusively with religion, as if He were too good and too particular to care much for the contests of the world. What God does not care for, what He hates, to use Scripture language, is falseness, cruelty, selfishness, intemperance, whether in the world or the Church, whether in earthly business or religious devotion, whether in small things or great; but all the lesser matters and motives which go to make up the round of an ordinary honest life are known to and cared for by Him, without whom not a sparrow falls to the ground, and who numbers all the hairs of our heads. If there is anything we need to realise, it is the infinite and minute nearness of ourselves and our ways to God. We are ever in His presence. There is no moment of the most changeable life, no action of the dullest drudge who toils mechanically through his daily labour, no paltry wish, no trivial loss, no childish gratification of vanity, no hidden triumph over self, no peevish whim or gnawing secret, no selfish appropriation of little comforts nor unseen generosity, no secret concession to or victory over the spirit of sloth, but must be known to an all-seeing God. "All things are naked and opened unto the eyes of Him with whom we have to do."

And what use should we make of this? Of what consequence is it to us? Some may be ready to think, since He knows all, since we cannot conceal from Him any of our actions or motives, some of which we feel to be questionable or very small, surely we must be despised or despicable in His sight. But thus we argue from men to God. We think if even our friends were to know us as constantly and intimately as we know ourselves, we should sometimes sink in their estimation. How must it be with the Perfect One, who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity? But the great virtue and glory of the Gospel is in the mystery that the Word became flesh and dwelt among us; that our relationship to Him is revealed in the Christ. It is in our nearness to God that our salvation is found. This is the foundation of our hope. The worst, or one of the most hurtful things to be feared for a Church, is that it should conduct itself towards God as One who is a long way off from man in all senses of the word—unlike him, distant from him, needing to be approached as from afar, like a king to whom an embassy is sent. Or if we can fancy that prayer flashes to Him in an instant, we think a prayer to be something like a telegraphic message, which takes no count of distance or time, but which nevertheless does enable us to converse with a person who is a long way off. So we are sometimes tempted to think of God as One who needs ambassadors and special spiritual processes that we may have communion with Him. And some might be, as it were, shocked at the suggestion that He is really close by, and minutely, immediately cognisant of ourselves and all things about us.

"Nevertheless," says Christ, "even the very hairs of your head are all numbered." And what is the lesson which He draws from this? "Fear not, therefore," says He. It is not the idea of nearness to God, but that of separation from Him, that we should dread. We need not shrink from the thought of His knowing our hearts, and everything about us and our circumstances; that is, we need not shrink if in our consciences we wish to do well. If, however frail and faulty we may seem to ourselves, we would really wish to rise higher and live better, we may find our greatest comfort in the thought that God is at hand and knows our heart. For He is a Father who loves His children, and would have them turn to Himself, that so they may have divine strength and happiness of soul. But then they must lean upon Him, and not upon themselves and what they can do. They can find true happiness only in the desire to do His will, and in ceasing to plan and scheme for their own comfort and peace. If we can turn to God thus, we find Him to be a Father who understands His children. We might, perhaps, have great difficulty in explaining ourselves to any friend, however near and dear—for the nearest and dearest have much that is earthly mixed up with that which is divine in them, and cannot get rid of their relation to the world of men, which judges imperfectly. We cannot satisfy our souls in any court of human inquiry, or touch the true ground of peace in any human confession. Genuine, unquestionable justice and love are not to be found among fellow-men—only rough imitations or weak mixtures of them. Thus, foiled and disappointed, despising human praise, resenting human blame, we turn for sympathy to God, and to God in Christ, who shows Him to be loving and near. Thus we throw ourselves into our Father's arms, "casting all our care upon Him, for He careth for us." "Even the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear not, therefore." We fear Him not, because He is so near. I do not believe that any are kept from that which is really sin by the thought that God sees them and knows them thoroughly, and so is sure to punish. But I believe that the true cheer and strength of life comes from the thought of His nearness to and knowledge of us, and that we may thus turn to Him without explanation or fear of being misunderstood.

Only we should turn to Him more utterly. As we can realise Him as our Father, knowing us through and through, and yet, in spite of what He sees in our hearts and lives, loving us with a mighty, eternal love, we find peace to our souls, and the strongest motive and help to a purer, truer, more unselfish life. This is the Gospel of the Christ who came not to destroy, but to save. And the way to use and find the power of that Gospel is to give up all thought of serving and saving ourselves, and to trust in Him. So we do not perish, but have everlasting life. So we are touched with the sacred contagion of His Spirit whose meat was to do the will of His Father—our Father—which is in heaven. For there can be no true union with the Christ and God without the bearing of the Cross in our hearts, without the yielding of self, and the taking in of something other than self, even the will of God, who willeth not the death of a sinner.

"WANTED, A GOVERNESS."

CHAPTER I.

"It was good, it was kind, in the Wise One above,
To fling destiny's veil o'er the face of our years;
That we dread not the blow that shall strike at our love,
And expect not the beams that shall dry up our tears."

WHO can tell what a day will bring forth! Yesterday I was quite despondent because I had nearly exhausted my funds, and all my efforts to procure suitable employment had proved fruitless. To-day I am in an excellent situation as governess in the family of a retired tradesman. And I suppose, before very long, I shall feel quite at home in this large, handsome room which now looks so unfamiliar to me.

At half-past ten o'clock this morning I called at a lawyer's office, in answer to an advertisement, and had an interview with the advertiser, Mr. J. Bloomfield, of — Square, Kensington. I started with expectations considerably sobered by the remembrance of past failures. But fortunately I was first in the field; and, as Mr. Bloomfield seemed to take it almost for granted that I was competent to undertake the education of his little niece, and as he happened to be personally acquainted with the writer of one of my testimonials, I was, to my great joy, engaged on most liberal terms, before any other applicants made their appearance.

He seemed greatly relieved to get the matter arranged so quickly. And as he had some time to spare, he gave me a short history of my future pupil. It appears that his youngest and favourite sister married a man named Giffard, of good family but bad habits; that she went with her husband to India, where she soon after died of a low fever; and that Mr. Bloomfield had heard nothing of her husband or any of his family until yesterday, when he received a letter from a lawyer in F—, announcing the death of old Mr. Giffard, and enclosing one which that gentleman had written during his illness. In this letter Mr. Giffard states that he has brought up a little girl, the daughter of his son and Mr. Bloomfield's sister. He confesses that, from motives of sinful pride, he has hitherto kept the fact of her existence a secret from her mother's family. He says that, finding himself poor and on the point of death, he throws himself on Mr. Bloomfield's generosity, and trusts that he will forgive the past, and provide a home for the child, at any rate until she is able to take care of herself.

Mr. Bloomfield's intention was to start for F— by the next train, and bring the little girl back with him in the evening; and I promised to be at his house to receive her on her arrival.

I have been waiting here now for more than half an hour, and I begin to wish that someone would come and invite me to take off my bonnet and cloak, for they are rather too warm to wear by the fire.

Surely they will be here soon! Perhaps the mistress of the house does not care to introduce herself to me—or perhaps she has not yet finished dressing for dinner. I wonder what she is like? Mr. Bloomfield told me that his wife had been dead some years, and spoke of writing a note to someone named Julia, who appears to be his housekeeper, but I have no idea how old she is, or how nearly she is related to him. Of one thing I am quite certain—that if she is only half as good-natured and easily pleased as Mr. Bloomfield, I shall find this a very comfortable home.

I can hear someone coming at last. The door opens, and a young lady sweeps slowly down the room and greets me haughtily.

She supposes I am the lady Mr. Bloomfield mentioned in his note this morning. She could not read the name very well, but believes it was intended for Scott?

Yes, it was intended for Scott.

As Mr. Bloomfield is expected every minute, she thinks I would like to wait till he comes, before going up-stairs to take my bonnet off.

On my assenting to this she stands looking intently into the fire, and seems to forget my existence completely.

So this is Julia! Surely she is not Mr. Bloomfield's daughter? He is a stout, commonplace-looking man, with rather light hair, and a pleasant but by no means handsome face; while she is thin and dark, and gives me the impression at first sight of being strangely brilliant and un-English looking. She does not appear to me to be handsome; yet I have a feeling that this opinion is the result of error of judgment on my part, rather than any defect in her face. She is wearing a long brown velvet gown, which is plainly made, and hangs in straight, heavy folds. There is rich lace at the neck and sleeves, and the firelight gleams on more jewellery than should be worn by so young a girl. I wonder if it is that which makes her look so brilliant? No! for at the sound of wheels at the door she turns round, and I see that it is principally owing to her dark hair and complexion, and a certain angry flash in her large dark eyes. I am afraid we shall not get on very well together, for, unless I am much mistaken, she has something of the tigress in her nature.

After a minute's bustle in the hall, Mr. Bloomfield comes in, accompanied by a pale, fair girl of about fifteen or sixteen years of age, who looks the very picture of sullen apathy. There is no expression of sorrow in her face, no pleasure at meeting us, nor even any curiosity as to what we may say or do—nothing but blank indifference.

"Here we are at last! and we are glad enough to get home, aren't we, Maggie?" says Mr. Bloomfield, in a cheery voice, putting his arm round her to draw her towards the fire.

Ever since the morning, I have been prepared to be very kind to this motherless child; but, noticing that she shrinks from Mr. Bloomfield's touch with a scarcely perceptible look of disgust, I instantly infer that she has been imbued with some of her grandfather's pride. This banishes my pity, and I receive her almost as coldly as Julia does.

"She is tired and cold, I know. You must take her up-stairs and make her feel at home, Julia; and Miss Scott too. I am sure they must both want their dinner," says Mr. Bloomfield, seating himself in a great arm-chair, and warming his hands at the fire.

"I will show you up-stairs now," says Julia, in a constrained voice to me; and turning to Mr. Bloomfield, as we reach the door, adds,

"I have ordered dinner to be ready in half an hour, uncle."

So Julia is Mr. Bloomfield's niece. I am glad she is not his daughter; it would have seemed so unnatural.

She leads, the way up a broad staircase, shows us into our rooms, says that she will send a servant with some warm water, and goes down again. I know now what it is that spoils her face: it is her mouth, which is too small for the rest of her features, and a way she has of closing it tightly after every sentence.

Being left to myself, I take a survey of my room. It is moderately large, and there is a door of communication between it and Maggie's. Everything in it is of the most expensive and substantial kind, but all those little things so essential to the comfort of a bed-room are absent. Evidently there has been no womanly care bestowed upon it.

A maid presently brings me some warm water, and I discover that my trunks have not yet been brought up-stairs, so I send her back for the smallest of them, and proceed to make a hasty toilet.

On going to Maggie's room, to see if I can help her in any way, I find, to my great astonishment, that she is in bed.

"My dear, do you feel very tired?" I ask, sitting down by the side of her.

"No, thank you."

"Don't you want any dinner after your long journey?"

"No, thank you."

"You don't feel ill, do you?"

"No, thank you."

"Then what induced you to go to bed without saying good-night to anybody?"

"I don't know. Was I wrong? I thought we had come up to bed. Shall I get up again?"

I suppose my voice expressed the displeasure that I felt, for she sits up in bed and looks at me in a perplexed, anxious way. She is either very, very stupid or very ill, and it is plainly my business to find out at once which it is. I am afraid she must be ill, for, now that her hat is off, I can see that she has a well-shaped head, and, however confused and strange her manner may be, her face is not the face of an idiot.

"Sitting in a great chintz-covered chair."—p. 41

"Never mind," I say soothingly. "Stay in bed now you are there. I will bid them good-night for you, and then bring you something to eat. What would you like best?"

"Oh, I don't want anything, thank you: only to stay here," she answers wearily.

So I bid her good-night and go down-stairs and tell Mr. Bloomfield that I am afraid she is really ill; her hands and forehead are so hot, and her pulse beats so quickly. But he is tired and sleepy after the journey, and too thoroughly enjoying the comforts of his arm-chair and the prospect of dinner to look on the dark side of anything.

"Poor child! she is quite worn out," he says; "send her up something to eat. She'll be all right in the morning—after a good night's rest."

And I am obliged to be contented with this arrangement, though I feel rather doubtful about the "good night's rest."

"You never saw such a queer old place as Mr. Giffard has been living in," says Mr. Bloomfield, at dinner. "They tell me that it is part of the ruins of a monastery. It has been fitted up with ordinary doors and windows, and seems quite snug and comfortable inside. I don't think I ever saw walls so thick before: they must be capital to keep the cold out in the winter."

"Why is it that no such walls are built in these days?" I ask. "Do you think it is because we are not able to make them so thick and strong, or because we will not? One would think, to look at some of the houses they build now, that men are at last convinced that the end of the world is at hand, and consider it a waste of time to make anything that will outlast their own day."

Mr. Bloomfield laughs.

"What was the cause of Mr. Giffard's death?" inquires Julia.

"A fit," answers Mr. Bloomfield. "He was quite well till one day about a fortnight ago, when he was suddenly taken in a fit. It seems that he has been a wonderful man for his age, hale and upright, and with all his faculties unimpaired. The old servant tells me that he could read without his spectacles up to the very last, and he used to spend half his time poring over a lot of musty old books."

"His sudden death must have been a great shock to his granddaughter," I remark, thinking of her strange manner.

"Yes, poor child!" says Mr. Bloomfield, compassionately. "But she takes it better than I expected. I was afraid she would make a trouble of coming away, but she didn't even cry about it. She has been wonderfully quiet all along, the maid tells me. I couldn't get her to talk much on the journey; I suppose she was too tired."

"Did they keep only one servant?" asks Julia, with some contempt in her voice.

"That is all. They lived in a very quiet way. I dare say one was quite as much as they wanted, or could afford. I have left her in charge of the house for a few days, till I have time to go and settle the old gentleman's affairs. I am glad I wrote yesterday, so that Maggie was all ready to come away; it is a dismal place for her to have been left in."

After dinner we go into the drawing-room. Mr. Bloomfield settles himself in an easy-chair by the fire, and is soon asleep. Julia begins to read, and I sit and long for bed-time. I am thoroughly tired with packing up and making arrangements for leaving home, and so much has happened since the morning that the day seems to have been unnaturally long. I wonder whether I really shall find this a comfortable home? After all, it is trying to live always with strange people in strange houses. The walls are not household walls; there are no memories connected with the pictures; and it requires an effort to take an interest in the growth of the shrubs and the fortunes of the inmates. One is apt to grow selfish under such circumstances. Then, too, it is almost impossible for strangers to sympathise with me in my various moods. I can scarcely expect my employers to look sad because Jack's baby is dead, or because Charlie is out of a situation. They may be rejoicing over some piece of good fortune whilst I am in the depths of despair. Our lives flow on side by side, though our interests are as wide apart as the poles. Who can expect to be quite happy under such circumstances?

"Would not you like to go to bed?" asks Julia, breaking in on my reverie with her hard, ungracious voice.

"I am rather tired, but——" I hesitate, and look towards Mr. Bloomfield.

"Never mind him," she says carelessly. "He won't be awake for another hour. I'll tell him you were tired and went to bed."

"Thank you. Well, if you are sure he will not think it rude——"

"Yes, I am quite sure."

"Then I will bid you good-night."

"Good-night," she answers, and before I reach the door is absorbed in her book again.

I find Maggie asleep. She has tossed the bedclothes into great confusion; her long, fair hair lies in tumbled heaps upon the pillow, and her cheeks are hot and flushed. Poor child! I had no idea she was so pretty! Her long lashes have veiled her apathetic eyes, and the rigid lines of her face have relaxed into soft curves. My heart goes out to her with a bound. She too has come amongst strangers, and if I, who have trodden the world alone these sixteen years, find it somewhat hard, how much harder it must be for her, with her new heartache.

So I smooth the bedclothes and pillow, and the kiss that I leave on her forehead is altogether loving.

"Here we are at last!"—p. 38.

CHAPTER II.

"So silently we seemed to speak,
So slowly moved about,
As we had lent her half our powers
To eke her living out."

AT midnight I am awakened by strange sounds in the next room, and going hastily in I find Maggie sitting up in bed, talking and gesticulating with wide-open, frightened eyes.

I make her lie down, and try to soothe her, but she springs up again and startles me with a fresh burst of incoherence. Then I ring the bell violently, and in a few minutes the servants arrive, followed by Mr. Bloomfield, only half awake.

But he is all active sympathy in an instant; sends one girl for his boots, another for his hat, buttons his great-coat over his dressing-gown, and goes himself to fetch the doctor—a sight to be long remembered, and remembered with a smile.

The doctor pronounces Maggie to be in a dangerous fever, occasioned by some great mental shock. And when the world rises the next morning, Mr. Bloomfield's household is in a state of restless anxiety, with but one centre of action and interest—the sick-room.

Mr. Bloomfield wants to hire a nurse for her, but I am confident in my own powers of nursing, and will not hear of such a thing.

The days that follow are strangely unsettled: they have no proper beginnings nor endings; there is no such thing as a dinner-hour; and the maids do each other's work cheerfully, and run on errands at all hours of the day without a murmur. In the first two days I become more intimate with the family than I should have done in two months in the ordinary course of things.

Mr. Bloomfield comes up incessantly to make inquiries, and if he were not so very anxious I should sometimes feel quite impatient with him, the suggestions he makes are so absurd. Everything that money and attention can do is done, yet Maggie continues to get worse. The doctor orders her hair to be cut off, and the long, bright locks (of which her mother would have been so proud) are laid away in a drawer.

It is very pitiful, when everything has been done, to stand and watch the restless movements of her shorn little head, and listen to her disjointed wanderings.

"Alone!" she says, in an awe-stricken whisper that it chills one's blood to hear. "Alone! in this wide, unknown world; no human soul to speak to my soul through human lips!" Then she seems to listen intently for a few minutes, and goes on in a more natural tone: "Can't you hear the rush of their wings? Why, there must be hundreds of them! Nonsense! it isn't the wind amongst the trees. Why, I can hear the very sweep of their garments. And, oh!" (with a little cry) "there is my mother rattling the window, trying to come to me."

I put fresh ice on her forehead, and she is out in the fields with her grandfather, babbling of spring beauties.

"Poor little lamb!" says Mr. Bloomfield, who has been sitting by the bed-side, holding one of her hands in his, and looking intensely miserable. "She makes me think so of her poor mother. Ah! dear, dear, we none of us know what a day will bring forth!" he adds mournfully, and goes away with cautious, heavy steps.

One afternoon, when the illness has almost reached its crisis, Julia comes in, bringing a bouquet of the most exquisite hothouse flowers, which she must have been some distance to buy. She walks eagerly to the bed-side, but on finding that Maggie is too ill to notice them, falls on her knees and bursts into a passion of weeping, her whole frame shaking with convulsive sobs.

"What is the matter?" I ask, going round to her, and drawing her away from the bed, lest she should disturb my patient.

"I am so miserable!" she moans. "I hated her! Poor little thing! What had she done to me that I should have hated her with such a deadly hatred! And now she is going to die, and I shall feel as if my hate had killed her!"

"My dear Julia, you must not give way like this!" I whisper. "It certainly was very wicked to feel so bitterly towards a poor little girl whom you had scarcely seen. But I would not distress myself so much about it now, if I were you. After all, it has done no real harm to anyone but yourself."

But Julia will not be comforted; it is distressing to see the violence of her grief; and she is fast making herself ill, and upsetting my nerves, which are already sufficiently tried. So at last, by dint of persuasion and entreaty, I get her into her own room, and leave her to sob herself to sleep, if she is so disposed. Who would have thought that my "young tigress" had so soft a heart!

If Maggie should recover from this illness, she will find herself surrounded with warm friends. Even Julia's unreasoning hatred, which would have been so trying to encounter, has vanished at the sight of her helpless sufferings.

The next day we have a consultation of doctors; and though Mr. Bloomfield will not tell us what they say, we read in his face that there is but little hope. So we are hourly expecting an unwelcome guest, and we wait for his coming with sad hearts and hushed voices.

CHAPTER III.

"Delicately pure, and marvellously fair."

THE grim visitor did but cast his shadow over us, as he passed on his way. And the young life that had drooped in the gloom of his presence gradually revived; and we breathed freely again, for we knew that the danger was past.

As soon as our patient began to recover, Julia went to pay a long-deferred visit to the sea-side, so I have been Maggie's chief companion. At first we were very careful not to say anything that would be likely to remind her of her loss; but she introduced the subject herself, and seems to like talking of it. She speaks very affectionately of her grandfather—says he was the kindest, the wisest, and the best of men; and cries a little, softly, to herself, to think that he had so few comforts in his old age. But on the whole she is very cheerful. She seems to be fond, too, of the old house at F—, in spite of its dismalness. And in the long conversations we have together I see glimpses of a strangely dreamy, mournful life—lonely wanderings about the country, hours spent in a great empty church listening to the organ, games of chess with her grandfather, and, for the rest, books, books, books. Reading must have been her chief enjoyment, for there is no mention made of any young friends, or of any gaieties whatever. Childish as her appearance is, we learn that she is eighteen, her eighteenth birthday having passed unheeded during her illness. Her luggage was not unpacked until she was able to sit up, and then we laughed together at the incongruous things that the old servant had packed up. As I expected, her wardrobe is very plain and scanty, but of course Mr. Bloomfield will soon supply that deficiency.

She is sitting in a great chintz-covered arm-chair, in a room next to her own, and looks exactly like a little figure out of a stained glass window. Though, now I come to think of it, the saints in stained-glass windows are stiff, awkward things, without much beauty, so I should say that she looks as a little saint in a window ought to look. The pale blue dressing-gown that I made for her harmonises well with her delicate complexion, and the short rings of her fair hair do duty as a halo. There may be a little more brown in it than one usually sees in the halo of a saint, but that is an advantage rather than the reverse.

During the period of her unconsciousness she has won a place in the hearts of all the household. And now that her soul has come back from the land of dreams and spirits, and looks intelligently at us out of her blue eyes, and speaks rationally to us from her thin lips, she is not likely to lose her hold on our affections. She is so gentle, so anxious to avoid giving trouble, so grateful for any little kindness, that the sick-room is still the centre of attraction in the house.

We have had a fresh visitor to-day—Hilton Bloomfield, Mr. Bloomfield's only son. I met him several times on the stairs when Maggie was ill, but had no idea who he was until the first day I dined with the family; and then I was surprised to find that he had been living in the house nearly all the time.

He is a well-built young man, of medium height, with brown hair, grey eyes, and a refined, intelligent face. His manners are quiet and gentlemanly, and I hear that he is a barrister—at present a briefless one, but I don't think that distresses him much. We have become such good friends that this morning I inquired how it was that he had never been to see my patient.

"Why should I?" he asked with unusual warmth.

"Oh! of course there is no reason why you should," I answered, "except that it seems natural to take an interest in such a dangerous case."

"I did take an interest in it," he replied. "But I am not a doctor! What good could I have done? I was told that a strange little girl was dying in a room up-stairs, and my father invited me several times to go and look at her. I hate that morbid sort of thing! Besides, it's enough to add new horrors to death to think that strangers are going to witness one's dying agonies! Now that she is getting well, and can take a pleasure in speaking to anyone, I shall come up-stairs and see her."

So he has been here nearly all the afternoon, amusing us with descriptions of entertainments that he has been to lately; and has promised to take Maggie to all kinds of places when she is well enough to go.

Now that he is gone, she is unusually talkative, and begins telling me for the first time about her father. Remembering what I have heard of him from Mr. Bloomfield, I am considerably astonished at her description. She has been supplied (principally by the old servant, for it seems that her grandfather seldom mentioned him) with an outline of a tall, handsome man, of agreeable manners and a generous temperament, and has been allowed to fill in this outline from her own imagination, quite unaided by any knowledge of the real characters of men. The result of course is—a kind of demi-god.

It is not my business to undeceive her, even if I had any wish to do so. Give the same faint outline to a hundred ignorant, innocent girls, and I believe ninety-nine of them will produce just such imaginary heroes, differing, of course, in style and intensity, but all alike in representing demi-gods.

THE DIVINE CALL.

TO-DAY, to-morrow, evermore,
Through cheerless nights without a star,
Not asking whither or how far,
Rejoicing, though the way be sore,
Take up thy cross,
And follow Me!

Though some there be that scorn thy choice,
And tempting voices bid thee stay,
To-day, while it is called to-day,
If thou wilt hearken to My voice,
Take up thy cross,
And follow Me!

I cannot promise wealth or ease,
Fame, pleasure, length of days, esteem;
These things are vainer than they seem—

If thou canst turn from all of these,
Take up thy cross,
And follow Me!

I promise only perfect peace,
Sweet peace that lives through years of strife,
Immortal hope, immortal life,
And rest when all these wanderings cease:
Take up thy cross,
And follow Me!

My yoke is easy, put it on!
My burden very light to bear;
Who shareth this My crown shall share—
On earth the cross, in heaven the crown:
Take up thy cross,
And follow Me!

ANGELS' WINGS AND VOICES.

MESSAGES OF JOY, WARNING, AND JUDGMENT DELIVERED BY ANGELS.

BY THE REV. T. M. MORRIS, IPSWICH.

I.—A MESSAGE TO A MAN GREATLY BELOVED.

"Yea, whilst I was speaking in prayer, even the man Gabriel, whom I had seen in the vision at the beginning, being caused to fly swiftly, touched me about the time of the evening oblation."—DANIEL ix. 21.

ANGELS have both wings and voices. If we see them, we are nearly sure to hear them. As winged messengers we watch them as they speed forth in their swift and willing services of love and obedience; and theirs is not a silent, voiceless ministry; at the same time that our eyes are gladdened with the brightness of their presence, our ears are filled with the music of their speech or song. Allusions to the bright appearances and marvellous sayings and doings of angels crowd the pages of Scripture. Is it not strange that we should think so little of that wonderful ministry concerning which God says so much?

If we turn to sacred Scripture—our only source of information—we find that we are told something very considerable concerning those good and holy angels who have kept their first estate, and who are described as "ministering spirits sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation."

These wonderful beings are distinguished by many different names, which indicate certain grades or orders which exist among them, or certain peculiarities in their natures or occupations. They are, however, all of them Angels—messengers, those who are sent forth on God's errands—those who maintain intercourse between God and His creatures. When Jacob in the vision of the night looked upon the mystic ladder which connected heaven and earth, he saw it thronged with ascending and descending angels.

These wise and powerful, holy and happy beings, while they probably account heaven their true and proper home, do not always abide there. They are sent forth on God's gracious errands, they visit earth with heavenly messages; they are all ministering spirits, and their ministry seems to consist very largely in the services which they variously render to the redeemed Church. They are described as habitually standing before God, as those who are ever ready to engage actively in His service; and they are continually sent forth on special ministries—sometimes one is sent, sometimes another, sometimes a whole company or cohort, but always those who are suitable and sufficient for that particular work to which they are appointed.

God has on many occasions employed angels to communicate to His people revelations of His will; it was so on the occasion here referred to. Daniel represents himself as being in great perplexity: he is both confused and troubled as he considers the course and movement of events; he sees not whither they are tending, and he cannot forecast the final issue and result. God deals with His servant (the man greatly beloved) by the ministry of an angel—the angel Gabriel, who again and again comes to him and imparts instruction and strength and comfort. Swift and willing was the service rendered; and, on one occasion, certainly, while the words of prayer were yet on the lips of Daniel, the angel Gabriel was at his side with the answer to prayer.

Daniel at first receives a communication from a nameless angel, who is referred to merely as one of the angels that appeared attending the Ancient of Days in His glory. He then has a further vision, after which there stood before him the appearance as of a man, and this time Gabriel was made known to him as the minister of interpretation. After this we see Daniel in prayer, and that which seems especially to have moved him to prayer was that he understood by the books—the prophecies of Jeremiah—that seventy years were fixed for the continuance of the desolations of Jerusalem, and these years, according to Daniel's reckoning, were now running out; and he set his face to seek God by prayer and supplications, with fasting and sackcloth and ashes.

This prayer was answered—was answered at once, and answered in a very remarkable way; while the answer itself is the most wonderful and complete of all the Messianic prophecies of the Old Testament.

While Daniel was speaking and praying, while he was yet on his knees, the answer came (it was at the time of the evening oblation)—and the answer came by a special messenger, an angel whom he saw standing by his side, and he at once recognised him as the angel Gabriel, whom he had seen before. The angel touches him, to remind him of his presence, and call his attention to the Divine and heavenly message with which he was burdened, and with which he had been caused to fly so swiftly that he was there with the answer to Daniel's prayer before Daniel had ceased praying. And he gives him the assurance that this message has come to him, and come thus to him as to one greatly beloved.

The message which came to Daniel in a way so wonderful was received by him and placed on record, and, whatever interpretation he may have put upon these words, we who read them in a light which he did not enjoy cannot but admire the way in which many of the more distinguishing features of our Divine Redeemer's work are set forth with a clearness and distinctness that we look for in vain in any other Old Testament prophecy.

God is as willing as ever to answer the prayers of His people; intercourse between heaven and earth is not suspended; angelic ministrations have not ceased; around the Eternal Throne there still stand thousands upon thousands of bright and happy spirits, who are ready ever to fly swiftly on errands of love and mercy, carrying messages of strength and comfort to God's greatly beloved ones—prayer has lost nothing of its potency.

"This passionate sigh which, half begun,
I stifle back, may reach and stir the plumes
Of God's calm angel standing in the sun."

Were our eyes opened, we might see (what Daniel saw) how even while we are yet speaking—God hears.

II.—TIDINGS OF GREAT JOY.

"And the angel said unto them, Fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy."—ST. LUKE ii. 10.

INASMUCH as the angel Gabriel was employed in making so remarkable a communication concerning the coming Messiah, hundreds of years before His actual appearance among men, we are scarcely surprised when we meet with him again at the time of the Advent, or to find that the angels had to play so important and prominent a part in connection with it. We may well suppose that they who willingly minister to the heirs of salvation, account it their highest honour to minister to Him who is the Author of Salvation.

In the New Testament we first meet with the angel Gabriel appearing to Zacharias as he was executing the priest's office before God. Zacharias was in the sanctuary, burning incense before the Lord, while the people were praying without. As he was thus engaged he saw an angel standing on the right side of the altar, and when he saw him he was troubled, and fear fell upon him; but the angel said, "Fear not, Zacharias: for thy prayer is heard; and thy wife Elisabeth shall bear thee a son, and thou shalt call his name John." Now, whatever reference there may be here to any personal desire previously cherished and expressed by Zacharias, we cannot but believe that his supreme desire was for the advent of the promised Messiah, and the announcement of the angel, which comes as an answer to prayer, evidently covers the larger and the more limited request. He receives the twofold assurance that the Messiah Himself shall appear in his days, and that he shall become, in his old age, the father of a son who shall be the immediate forerunner of the Lord's Anointed, and make straight His way before Him.

Zacharias cannot bring himself at once to receive the astonishing announcement; the news seems to be too good to be true, and he asks for some confirmatory sign; and the angel, answering, said to him, "I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of God; and am sent to speak unto thee, and to show thee these glad tidings." The announcement of the angel's name would carry the thoughts of Zacharias back to the time when this same angel appeared to Daniel with that wonderful prophecy which was now on the point of fulfilment.

Some months after this, the same angel Gabriel was sent from God unto a city of Galilee, named Nazareth, to make to a virgin named Mary a much more wonderful announcement than that which he had made to Zacharias in the Temple—the announcement of the miraculous conception of our Lord by the power of the Holy Ghost.

And now we pass on to the most wonderful event of all—that great mystery of godliness, God manifested in the flesh—the birth of the Lord Jesus, for whose advent preparations had been made extending through ages and generations, and of whose nearly approaching manifestation angelic pre-intimations had been given to Zacharias and Mary.

Everything fell out according to the Word of the Lord, and Jesus was born, not only in the fulness of the times, but, being of the house and lineage of David, He was born in the city of David, which is called Bethlehem. And we see Him, whom all the angels of God are commanded to worship, wrapped in swaddling clothes, and laid in a manger, because there was no room for Him in the inn.

But this great event, though it secures for itself so little of the regard of men, is not to be passed over in silence. There is to be a Divine and heavenly announcement of the fact, an angelic celebration of the Advent. The birth of Christ seems to have created no stir, to have awakened no interest in Bethlehem itself; but outside the village there were some shepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flocks by night, and to these humble men the first preacher of the Gospel appeared in the form of an angel, and the glory of the Lord—that manifestation of glory so often alluded to in the Old Testament—shone round about them, and they were sore afraid.

Their thoughts at the time were probably not travelling beyond, or soaring above, the limited and humble sphere of life and duty in which they were called to move, when suddenly this glory of the Lord shone around them—they found themselves all at once in an atmosphere of celestial light and splendour, and there, standing before them, or in their midst, they see one who has the appearance of an angel, and they are sore afraid. The very first words of the angel are, "Fear not. Behold! I am an angel—a special messenger of God. I am sent forth on this errand of mercy. I bring you good tidings of great joy—that unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord; and this is not only tidings of great joy to you, but tidings of great joy to all people."

So soon as the angel—not improbably Gabriel—had made this announcement, "Suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God, and saying, Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth and goodwill towards men." The vision of angels then faded from the view of these shepherds, and the voices which had proclaimed these wonderful tidings died away into silence, and the shepherds were left with no company but that of the sheep they tended. But they did not put the whole matter on one side as a bright and beautiful dream. They were so impressed by the visions which they had seen, and the voices they had listened to, that they determined to go to Bethlehem at once; and they went and found, as all true inquirers will find, the Saviour whom they sought.

Angels have been sent forth on many different errands, but never on such an errand as this; many have been the messages of love and mercy which they have carried, but none to be compared with the glad tidings of great joy; and never was such music heard as the music of that angelic song. We cannot recall the vision—the music of the Christmas anthem cannot be reproduced—but all that is of chief value we retain. The words of that angelic announcement, and the burden of that angelic song, we have with us to this day.

III.—AN ANNOUNCEMENT OF UNEXPECTED DELIVERANCE.

"And, behold, the angel of the Lord came upon him, and a light shined in the prison: and he smote Peter on the side, and raised him up, saying, Arise up quickly. And his chains fell off from his hands."—ACTS xii. 7.

WE have seen how God employs angels in communicating His will to His own people; we have many instances in which He employs an angelic ministry for the effectuation of His gracious purposes concerning them. God sends forth His angels that they may exercise their skill and power for the defence or deliverance of those intrusted to their care. He gives His angels charge concerning them; and many of the most remarkable of the angelic interpositions of which we read in God's Word, are those in which we see these wonderful beings using their great power for the protection or rescue of those who seemed otherwise doomed to destruction. Without referring to particular instances, the Psalmist celebrates the fact that "the angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear Him, and delivereth them." And we have reason to suppose that by the ministry of angels the Lord doth in an especial manner protect us from the power and malice of our spiritual foes. Happy are we to have an angelic guard set for our defence. We know not what havoc our enemies would work, did not these watchers from the Holy One disappoint them.

We have here a very remarkable illustration of the way in which God can assist His servants in the apparently unequal conflict in which they are engaged.

We see a great trouble—or, rather, a whole troop of troubles come upon the infant Church: there is famine and poverty, and then bitter and malignant persecution. The Apostle James is murdered, and Peter is imprisoned. We have just a new breaking out of the old quarrel between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent, and, however sharp the conflict, we ought not to doubt the issue.

Peter seems very weak, compared with his enemies, who have prisons, and chains, and fetters, and weapons of war, and all the resources of the world at their disposal; but then Peter is under the care of One who can at any moment send His angel to deliver him. Peter's enemies seem very powerful, but they are not nearly so powerful as they seem. They are strong enough to kill the Apostle James, and put Peter in prison, and keep him there under four quaternions of soldiers; but there their power ceases; after that there is little more that they can do. They cannot prevent the prayers of the saints entering into the ears of the Lord God of Sabaoth. They cannot destroy the peace of Peter, or prevent God giving His beloved sleep. Though they deprive Peter of his personal liberty, they cannot hinder the access of God's angels, and they cannot prevent or delay his emancipation when God determines to set him free.

We see here that there is nothing in all the world so mighty as prayer. On the one side we have the persecuting power of the world, on the other the almighty power of God, which the Church is able to summon to its assistance. On the one side there is all the might of Herod—there is the prison with its strong and massive walls and iron gates, and there in immediate charge of the prisoner are four quaternions of soldiers—while on the other side there are a few despised Christians, who have no material resources to fall back upon, but who believe in the power of prayer and the faithfulness of God. They pray on day after day, but there is no sign of any answer to prayer; and now, on the night before the day on which Herod proposes to bring Peter forth for execution, they meet again for prayer. And here do we see what has been often seen—that man's extremity is God's opportunity; God chooses His own time and His own way for doing His own work.

On that distressful night we see Peter in prison, quietly sleeping. With a peaceful and clear conscience does he sleep, and under the ever-watchful care of the God whom he serves. As he is lying there asleep—without fear and without expectation—behold, the angel of the Lord touches him, awakes him out of sleep, bids him arise, put on his sandals and his clothes, and follow him. Free from the chains which had bound him. Peter renders obedience to the angelic command, and, following the angel, he passes by the sleeping guards, and through the great iron gate, which opened to them of its own accord, out into the city; and being separated from the prison by the length of one street, forthwith the angel departed from him. The whole thing appears like a dream, and it is only when he is left alone there in the open street, and he begins to recognise the familiar objects around him, that he realises what has taken place.

Having considered what he should do, he determines to go straightway to the house of Mary, the mother of John, where, though he knew it not, the disciples were at that very time assembled for prayer on his account. Having arrived at the house, he knocks at the door, and a young serving-maid named Rhoda comes to hearken, to find out who was there; and when she recognised the voice of Peter, she opened not the door for gladness, but ran in and told how Peter stood before the gate; but they refused at first to accept her testimony. But Peter continued knocking, and when they had opened the door and saw him they were astonished.

Have we not here an unexpected deliverance? Peter certainly did not expect it, nor did those disciples who were praying that the Lord would appear for Peter. There were probably many degrees of faith in that little company. Some were expecting little; others, more; but no one was expecting this. They were surprised, not so much that God had answered prayer, but that He so answered prayer—so completely, so gloriously.

IV.—ERRANDS OF JUDGMENT.

"For the Lord will pass through to smite the Egyptians: and when He seeth the blood upon the lintel, and on the two side posts, the Lord will pass over the door, and will not suffer the destroyer to come in unto your houses to smite you."—Exodus xii. 23.

GOD sustains relations to His foes as well as His friends. He has dealings not only with those who do His will, and walk in the ways of His commandments, but also with those who are perverse and rebellious; and He employs the ministry of angels quite as freely of those who love and trust Him. Indeed, the defence and rescue of His friends imply the discomfiture and overthrow of those who set themselves against them and seek their injury and destruction.

Scripture teaches nothing more plainly than that angels are sent forth from heaven—when the occasion demands—as messengers of the Divine vengeance, and to punish the sins of man. Some have maintained that the different executions of judgment referred to in God's Word were effected by the instrumentality of evil spirits; but while it must be admitted that in certain instances they have been permitted to exercise their malign influence, nothing can be more evident than that God has ordinarily, and for the most part, employed good angels in this service. They are in perfect sympathy with the Most High, hating what He hates, and having their anger and indignation kindled by what awakens His; and there is nothing more befitting than that these holy angels should speed forth to inflict the just judgments of God upon those who resist and defy Him. Those who destroyed the guilty Cities of the Plain were unquestionably good angels. As such they were received and entertained by Lot; and with reference to their solemn errand they say, "The Lord hath sent us to destroy Sodom." That was evidently a good angel whom God sent unto Jerusalem to destroy it, and to whom, after seventy thousand men of Israel had fallen, the Lord said, "It is enough; stay now thine hand;" for he was employed—as a wicked spirit certainly would not have been—to indicate the site of the future Temple.

We all know by whom the army of Sennacherib was laid low, when

"The Angel of Death spread his wings on the blast,
And breathed in the face of the foe as he passed;
And the eyes of the sleepers waxed deadly and chill,
And their hearts but once heaved and for ever grew still."

We are distinctly told that this was none other than "the angel of the Lord."

In the New Testament, to refer but to one instance: in the account given of Herod's miserable end we read, "And immediately the angel of the Lord smote him, because he gave not God the glory."

Perhaps the most remarkable example of angelic interposition for purposes of judgment was that which occurred in connection with the exodus of Israel from Egypt. It would at first appear on reading the narrative that the destruction wrought on that memorable night was the result of the immediate visitation of the Lord—it is throughout spoken of as the very act of God—so thoroughly does God identify Himself with the slaying of the firstborn, by which stroke of judgment the last bond of Israel's captivity was broken, and the long-enslaved people were led forth as those whom the Lord Himself had redeemed. But while the act of deliverance is thus ascribed to God, so that He might have all the honour of it, it would seem that God laid low the firstborn of Egypt, not by the immediate exercise of His own almighty power, but by the employment of the destroyer—the destroying angel—an angel of the Lord who was commissioned to do this very work; and so completely and swiftly was the work of destruction done, that not one of Egypt's firstborn escaped. In that midnight hour the stroke of judgment fell with terrible impartiality, and "Pharaoh rose up in the night, he and all his servants, and all the Egyptians, and there was a great cry in Egypt; for there was not a house where there was not one dead."

But on that night of terror and confusion there were some who were safe; the word given to the destroying angel was, "Touch not Mine anointed—do them no harm;" and wherever the protecting blood could be seen sprinkled on lintel and side-posts, there absolute security was enjoyed—into these houses the Lord did not suffer the destroyer to enter. Israel's deliverance is thus linked with Egypt's discomfiture, and while a great and bitter cry of mourning and lamentation rises up in every Egyptian house over the slain firstborn, there is joy in all the houses of Israel, for the long-promised, long-delayed hour of redemption has come.

If we pass on to the book of the Apocalypse we everywhere meet with the angels—unloosing the seals, and emptying the vials, speeding on errands of mystery and mercy and judgment. Yes, the angels have their work to do, even to the end. In the solemnities of the Resurrection Day and final Judgment they are described as playing a great and important part. As they welcomed the Lord Jesus at His first Advent, so will they attend Him at His second Advent—His final and glorious appearing. "He shall come in His glory, and all His holy angels with Him," "and He shall send His angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together His elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." They are to take part in the great work of discrimination and separation to which we look forward. And when all is over, and the righteous are gathered into the Kingdom of their Father, we shall hear "the voice of many angels round about the throne and the living creatures and the elders: and the number of them is ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands; saying with a loud voice, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing."

BY THE REV. FREDERICK LANGBRIDGE, B.A., AUTHOR OF "SONGS IN SUNSHINE," "GASLIGHT AND STARS," ETC.

BLOSSOMS, bright blossoms,
Rosy, gold, and white;
Blossoms, sweet blossoms,
Feasting sense and sight;
Grown in order'd gardens gay,
Springing up beside the way—
Roses for the beauty's breast;
Buttercups for children blest;
Oh, a darker life were ours
Had the earth no gentle flow'rs!

Blossoms, bright blossoms,
White, and only white;
Blossoms, sweet blossoms,
Breathing pure delight;
Beautiful in regal halls,
Just as fair in cottage walls—
Peace and hope, and truth and love,
Wildings from the bow'rs above;
Oh, a weary world were ours
Had the heart no gentle flow'rs!

HOW TO KEEP OUR YOUTHS.

BY THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF MEATH, CHAIRMAN OF THE COUNCIL OF THE YOUNG MEN'S FRIENDLY SOCIETY.

DO not suppose that anyone who has had experience in Church work will deny that it is not always an easy task for a minister to retain elder scholars in communion with the Church. Between the ages of thirteen and twenty a serious defection is continually taking place in the ranks of the young recruits whom he has brought up, and who at one time he hoped would take the place of the older members of his congregation, as the latter dropped out of the race of life. Gradually, one by one, he may have seen the former fall away from the early promise of their youth, until his heart grew sick, and he began to ask himself whether when the older members of the congregation were gone a sufficient number of the younger generation would be left to form a congregation.

These fears were of course ill-founded, and as time advanced a sufficient remnant of the younger flock remained true to their Church; but still there was enough foundation for these dismal forebodings to cause him to think seriously how he might draw tighter the bonds of affection between the younger members of the flock and the Church of Christ.

He probably came to consider what were the reasons of these lamentable defections from the ranks of the Church, and what were the remedies to be applied. Amongst the principal causes, he probably found the following:—

1. Class custom.
2. Fear of ridicule.
3. Fear of being considered singular or hypocritical.
4. Indifferentism.
5. Fear that the profession of religion would be a barrier to an enjoyment of the pleasures of life.
6. The anti-religious pressure of employment or companions.
7. Want of some organisation which could give support to the religiously disposed.

He then probably looked to the principle of association for the means of counteracting the disintegrating influences to which I have referred.

He thought associations would supply the support so greatly needed to enable class customs or ridicule to be boldly faced, and he perhaps applied for assistance to the Young Men's Friendly Society, or the Girls' Friendly Society, or to both societies, for the means to enable him to unite his younger members in some bond of union, which should give them the courage to be obtained from the consciousness of acting in concert with others.

Perhaps, after some delay, a branch of either or of both associations was formed in his parish, and without further thought he set forward once more on his task of parochial duties with a light heart, feeling that all was now well, and that he would shortly have the pleasure of seeing his church crowded with young men and women, the grown-up Sunday-school scholars of former days. If so, it is possible that his hopes were shattered, and that no such result took place as that which he had fondly anticipated. The Communion Service still remained neglected, or only attended by the aged and the infirm. A reaction then will, in all likelihood, have taken place in his mind; he will have blamed—very unjustly—the societies which, in his opinion, had misled him, and which had failed to do that which they had never undertaken to accomplish without exertion upon his part.

Societies and organisations are lifeless abstractions, unless animated by a living spirit. If that spirit be not evoked, the best societies are but an empty name. Work must be accomplished by the agency of human hands, hearts, and intellects. Let our imaginary clergyman ask himself whether he instilled this life into the dry bones of the organisation; and if he did not, let him not then be astonished if the bones are still dry, and likely to remain so to the end of the chapter.

To be of use, the Girls' Friendly Society or the Young Men's Friendly Society, or, indeed, any society for the benefit of men and women, must thoroughly saturate the minds of its members with the spirit of brotherly love, and of practical Christian kindness one towards another and towards all mankind. It must give them work to do. It must prove to them that the happiest man even on this earth is he who renounces for the sake of another, and not he who passes his life in the endeavour to get the better of his neighbours.

It must show them that work for others is the most ennobling of all pursuits, and that it is possible for the very poorest and the very busiest to do some little act of kindness to his fellow-man.

It must furnish them with opportunities of being useful to others, and show them that their organisation is a means of accomplishing this, and is a blessing to themselves and to others.

Each member should be made to feel that it is a privilege to belong to the society, and that dismissal from its ranks would be a disgrace. To establish such an esprit de corps, the society should have some local habitation, where meetings may periodically take place, and where associates and members may feel themselves to be really at home. However small may be the house or room, it should be the exclusive property of the society, and should be used for no other purpose.

Once a feeling of pride in the society has been established, it will be comparatively easy for a clergyman or associate to make this esprit de corps instrumental in raising the moral and religious tone of the young men and women of the parish. The members must be shown how to undertake some work for others, and must not be permitted to remain satisfied with working only for themselves.

Custom and fashion have often been pressed into the service of the devil; may not they sometimes be made to do duty in furtherance of wholesome moral objects? The associates should take their members into counsel, get to know them personally, and, if possible, occasionally invite those whom they have under their more especial charge to visit them of an evening for a pleasant chat or for reading. Such friendly intercourse would be productive of immense social good in a parish, by bringing all classes more closely together, and by giving the associates an opportunity of making their influence for good felt by the young men and women commended to their care. Many would be the opportunities which might then be seized of giving to young men and women wholesome advice, encouragement, praise, or rebuke—advice which, under such circumstances, would be listened to much more patiently than if uttered by one who had never come into actual friendly social intercourse with them. These associations should be made instruments for supplying the members with means of instruction and recreation. Classes of all kinds should be held, to suit their requirements; their amusements should not be forgotten; temperance and thrift should be inculcated; and they should be encouraged to perfect themselves of an evening in the theory of the profession which they put in practice in the day. If these associations were always to make themselves useful to the members: if, indeed, they could always establish their position as being important aids to the young in the battle of life, the Church would find—as many a minister has already found—that such societies as these were well fitted to exercise a decided influence for good, by the retention of elder scholars in communion with the Church.

GIPSY'S BABY.

A STORY FOR OTHER PEOPLE'S CHILDREN.

EVER since Mollie had been born, three years ago, she had been Gipsy's Baby. The child of four had staggered about under the weight of the big, bony baby, that seemed to do nothing but cry from morning to night, never pacified except when Gipsy rocked it in her arms, or sat with it on the doorstep in the alley, while Jimmy, who was then two years old, dragged at her ragged skirts.

Poor little Gipsy! She had never known what it was to be a child—save in the way of receiving blows which she was not big enough to parry or return. She had never been beyond Blindpen Alley, where the tall, tumble-down houses, garnished with clothes-lines, whereon various rags were always fluttering, allowed but a narrow strip of sky to be seen, or the long, narrow slum into which the alley debouched.

She had never run amongst buttercups in the green fields, nor dipped her bruised feet into a stream. She had never seen the sun set nor the moon rise—never made a daisy-chain. She did not know there were such things as daisies or streams. She did not know that life was, or could be, anything better than listening to the complaints of an invalid mother and the oaths of a drunken father, washing rags and nursing babies. Her lot was to go half-clad and half-starved, learning nothing but sin and misery, and knowing no end to it but to be put at last in a dark, deep hole, the very thought of which made her shudder. Yet Gipsy had a large, warm heart, that no evil surroundings had as yet cramped. She loved her mother and Jimmy, though the love she felt for them was as nothing to the love she bore her baby. She was never satisfied except when Mollie was in her arms. She never knew joy but when the pinched mouth parted in a weird smile, or when the fretful features relaxed in restful sleep. The baby took the place in Gipsy's heart that a doll takes in that of a happier child, only never was doll loved as this child loved her ailing, puny sister.

A year after Mollie's birth the mother died of decline and semi-starvation. The drunken father only appeared at long intervals in the wretched attic which was "home" to his children. When he did appear, it was apparently only for the purpose of beating them, swearing at them, and seizing the few pence they might have. The more seldom he came and the sooner he left, the better Gipsy was pleased. She did not, however, think his conduct strange. She thought that fathers always drank, and always beat their wives and children. But she was afraid for her darling, on whom his heavy hand never yet had fallen.

Mrs. Cutter, the landlady, who lived down-stairs, was a good-natured woman, and did not turn the children adrift even when they were behind with the rent. She put them in the way of earning a few pence by the sale of matches and newspapers. She would also look after Mollie when it rained, and Gipsy had to trudge out alone—her little heart full of all sorts of formless fears and anxieties until she had her baby safe in her own arms again.

One wet evening—the evening of her seventh birthday—Gipsy caught a severe cold on her chest, and was not able to sell matches, nor to go out to do odd jobs for the neighbours, for a whole fortnight. It was November, and very cold, but the children could not afford to have a fire. With Mollie nestling close to her for warmth, Gipsy huddled under the rags on their wretched bed, shivering and coughing, drinking eagerly the water the landlady brought her, or the rarer cup of hot tea, but too ill to eat, too weak to get up.

Jimmy brought in a few coppers every night, which sufficed to buy bread for Mollie and himself, and every day Gipsy declared she should be better.

While she still lay helpless, towards the close of one dull, cheerless day, she heard the well-known sound of her father's unsteady steps coming up the stairs.

"Mollie!" she cried hoarsely, with instinctive fear. "Come here, quick!"

For Mollie was crawling weakly about the floor, in the way of danger.

Before the child could reach the bed, James Dyott stumbled over her. Raising his heavily booted foot, with an oath, he kicked her aside, unheeding the shriek she uttered.

Inbued with sudden strength, Gipsy sprang out of bed and caught her baby in her arms, soothing its moans and cries by every tender word she could coin.

"Have yer no brass?" said the father, taking no notice of the scene, and searching the room in vain.

"No, we ain't none; and I'm ill; and oh! how could yer do it?" wailed Gipsy, striving in vain to soothe her poor little sister.

"Look sharp and get well, then, for I'm coming 'ome next week—yer'll be glad of that, I bet!" laughing coarsely; "and I'll have no lazy wagabones here! yer'll have to earn yer living, well or ill; and that 'ere kid"—with another oath—"shall go to the 'Ouse; I'll be plagued with her no longer, a ugly little owl!"

Gipsy broke into a cry of such bitter agony that even the brutal father was startled by it.

"Well, I'm off now!" he said hastily, slouching out of the room as he spoke; "and mind you've some brass for me next time I come!"

"Oh, my baby! my baby!" moaned Gipsy, rocking the child in her arms, while their tears mingled together; "he'll send yer away from me! Oh, what'll I do? There isn't no one to 'elp us nohow!"

After the kick her father had given her, Mollie Dyott grew slowly worse. She never crawled about the floor now, but lay motionless on the bed, only whining occasionally to be taken up and nursed on Gipsy's knee.

Mrs. Cutter shook her head when she heard the latter's story, and said she "doubted but Dyott had done it this time."

"You'd best take her to the workhouse," she advised Gipsy; "they'd give her proper 'ention there."

"Would they let me nurse her?" answered Gipsy, considering the question.

"Why, no; I don't say as they would."

"Then Mollie shan't go!" declared the child resolutely, clasping her treasure more closely to her; "nobody shan't take her from me!"

"God will," said the woman to herself, shaking her head again.

A few days later Gipsy wrapped Mollie in an old shawl, and took her into the street beyond the alley; for the sun was shining, and Mrs. Cutter said it would do the little invalid good to get out a bit.

In the street a crowd of people—some laughing, some listening—was gathered round a man in black clothes, who was speaking to them, and Gipsy joined them to see "what was up," as she phrased it.

Soon it dawned on her that the man was telling his audience of somebody who could cure sick people and make them well again. She pressed nearer, all anxiety now to hear.

"Come to Him!" the man was saying, in clear tones that were touched with pity for the misery around him. "Come to the dear Lord Jesus! He will not send you away. The poorest, the most ignorant, the most sinful of you, can come close to Him. Are you sick? He can heal you. Are you miserable? He can comfort you. Are you wicked? He will teach you to be good. And you children too! He calls you to Him. 'Suffer the little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven'—that's what He says. He loves little children. He loves you all. He waits to save and bless you. Come to Him!"

"Oh, sir, where does He live?" shrieked Gipsy, her eyes shining, her cheeks flushing scarlet—could it be possible He would help her?

Just then a great dray came down the street, and a policeman pushed the throng aside.

"Here, you move on! clear out of this!" he said, laying a rough hand on Gipsy's shoulder; and, terribly frightened, Gipsy ran home as fast as she could.

"Jimmy," she said, telling her brother the wonderful story that night, "I wish I knew where that kind man as loves children lives! He could make Mollie well and strong, and mebbe He'd 'elp us agen father too, if we ast Him! I must go; I must go and find Him somehows! Where d'yer think He'll likely be?"

"I dunno," said Jimmy stolidly; "I never heerd on Him. In a big 'ouse," he suggested as an after-thought; "mebbe in the Queen's pallis! They wouldn't let you in there, Gip!"

"I'll find Him somehow!" declared Gipsy boldly; "and when Mollie's well, we'll all go away, Jimmy, where father can't never find us, and Mollie'll 'elp us to earn somethink. Oh, I'll find Him, never you fear!"

And Gipsy looked so bright that even Mollie essayed a smile as she sucked her thumb, and Jimmy beat a triumphal march on an old pot which was his drum.

The next afternoon the sun struggled out through the mist again. Gipsy made herself and her baby as tidy as she could, and started off on her quest with grave, intensely resolute face, and heart beating high with hope. Never for a moment did the child doubt that she should find Him whom she sought. She pressed on, looking for a house big and grand enough for so great and good a man. It was Sunday, but the day had no meaning for Gipsy, and now she was too engrossed by her own thoughts even to notice the well-dressed people who were passing to and fro.

At length she paused opposite a large church, whose bells had just ceased ringing, and surveyed it questioningly.

There was a flight of broad steps leading to massive doors. There were coloured windows, and a tower with a clock in it. Could this be His house? It was a large, grand-looking place.

"What's that 'ere—d' yer know?" she asked a boy near.

"Christ's Church," he answered shortly.

"Christ's Church! Who's Christ?"

"Why, Jesus—the Lord Jesus Christ."

"It's His house!" she gasped, all the colour leaving her face now.

"Yes, I s'pose so! Don't you go to school, that you're such a dummy?" with contempt.

"What's He like?" she asked in an awed whisper; "for I'm a-going to speak to Him."

"Oh, ain't you a dummy! Why, o' course I never seen Him, except in a picter, in a gownd and—and a——"

Gipsy stopped to hear no more. Perhaps Jesus was not often to be seen—she must lose no time.

Hurrying up the steps, she went into the church, straining Mollie more tightly to her heart, that beat so fast she could hardly breathe.

Inside were tall pillars that upheld an arched roof, wide aisles, subdued light, a sense of space, of quietude—all strange and awe-inspiring to the girl, who had never been in a place of worship before.

Softly she stole up the aisle, and there, at the further end of the church, stood a young man with outstretched hands, and what looked like the "gownd" of the picture in Gipsy's eyes. He was talking to and smiling kindly on a group of children who sat near, listening to him.

A rush of indescribable feelings came over Gipsy's ignorant soul, full of the latent, beautiful faith of childhood—feelings of mingled awe, wonder, and rapture, a strange, sweet certainty of help and safety.

She had found Jesus! All was well now.

Right up the aisle she came, looking neither to right nor left—up to the very feet of the astonished minister, and held her baby out to him with both arms.

"He said you'd cure people as was sick," she cried breathlessly, her eyes like two stars in her white face. "He said you loved little children, and called 'em to you, and—and—I've been a-looking for you—cause my Mollie's sick; and oh, Jesus! you'll make her well, and 'elp us to get away from father, won't yer?"

Some of the youthful congregation began to titter, but tears were in the minister's eyes as he laid his hand very gently on Gipsy's head.

"My dear child," he said; then paused, as if there was something in his throat that hindered his speaking.

"Oh, sir!" cried Gipsy, breaking into sobs, "he said as you was good and kind; and you'll cure my baby quick, won't yer?"

"Come with me," said the minister, recovering his voice; and taking Mollie from her sister's arms, he carried her into the vestry, where a bright fire was burning. "Sit down, my child," he went on, bringing a comfortable chair to the blaze, "and get warm, both of you. When I have finished with the children, I will come and speak to you."

Very soon he returned, and sitting down by Gipsy's side, he told her very simply and tenderly that he was only a servant of the dear Lord Jesus, but that Jesus was indeed with Gipsy—looking upon her, listening to her—though she could not see Him.

At first Gipsy's disappointment was intense, but soon she was listening with renewed eagerness to all that Mr. Somers told her. After all, it was true that there was such a Man as the Lord Jesus, who did love and call little children to Him, who could cure sick people, and make wicked ones good!

Some day she would see Him, Mr. Somers said, and live for ever with Him. Meanwhile, He would teach her to love and serve Him.

"I do love Him," asserted Gipsy, with conviction, "cause He's so kind. I know He'll cure my baby, too."

Mr. Somers thought of those gracious words of old—"According to your faith be it unto you"—and said "Amen!"

Gipsy is a grown-up woman now, with little children of her own, who are never weary of hearing how mother went to look for Jesus, and found Him. They like to hear how Gipsy went back to the old attic full of joy, to find her father—alas!—laid dying on the bed, and Jimmy playing his drum as if it were quite a festive occasion; they never can be persuaded to feel any sorrow for the man who kicked poor Mollie! They like to hear how Mr. Somers found the orphans a happy home with a kind old widow, who cared for them as if they had been her own children; how Gipsy and Jimmy went to school, and learned to be useful, industrious members of society; but most of all, they like to hear how the Lord Jesus cured Gipsy's Baby, through the instrumentality of a skilful doctor, a friend of Mr. Somers', who worked amongst the poor in the same loving, self-sacrificing spirit.

"Ah! that was a blessed day for me, when I found the Lord, and asked Him to cure my Mollie!"

This is always the way Gipsy finishes her story, and as surely as she does this, her youngest child turns gravely to the plump, merry-faced auntie whom they all love so dearly, and says, with ever-renewed wonder—

"So, you were mother's baby once!"

"Yes!" says Aunt Mollie, with a fond smile at Gipsy.

ON PUTTING ONE'S NOSE TO THE GRINDSTONE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOSHUA PADGETTS."

YOU will observe, O wise and judicious reader, that the title of this paper is "On Putting One's Nose to the Grindstone," not "On Having One's Nose Put." And in this distinction lies the main virtue of the whole thing, for it is manifestly a different thing to do an act of one's own will and to do it on compulsion.

Have you ever tried the former? Have you ever suffered the latter? Probably both. I will deal with the former in the first place. You can scarcely remember the first application in your own case. You were a little boy at school, and the lessons were your abomination; yet, because there were sundry objectionable features in your life unless you learnt those lessons, you did learn them, believing that the learning of them, disagreeable though it was, was less disagreeable than the other thing. So you put your nose to the grindstone. But you did not keep it there any longer than you were obliged. It was an unwilling act, yet your own act, to do it at all. Still you must admit that as you grew older there grew with you a greater adaptability to circumstances, and the work you before-time hated became more and more endurable.

Now just the same experience may be had with the actual grindstone of the smithy. When the rough blade is laid upon it first there is a tendency to fly off, but after a little while, when the unevenness has been reduced, the blade becomes more manageable.

When schoolboy days were over you were started again in a line that was new to you. Old habits had to be broken and new ones formed. Instead of the cricket bat, you handled the pen (and made a pretence of handling the razor), and in place of kicking the football you kicked your master's desk. You didn't like it—one seldom does; still, you knew it had to be done, and like a sensible fellow you did it. After a little time you got so well used to your new duties that the wish to evade them became almost eliminated—it was the scythe and the grindstone again. Perhaps your next great move in life was the "setting up" for yourself. For a time there was comparative freedom in this, and the mere fact that you could do as you liked made you more willing to do as you ought. But by-and-by the novelty wore off, and you began to give yourself too many holidays. At the end of the year, when you balanced your accounts, you found things were hardly so rosy as they appeared, and then you resolved to make a new endeavour to put your nose to the grindstone.

Nor did you regret it. Business began to come in to your office, and ready money was more plentiful in your coffers. Then, what more natural than that you should seek for a partner to share with you the sweets of a successful life? (She has, I know, always stated that to her fell the sour, and to you the sweets. But never mind!) Then you married, and a new set of habits had to be formed. No more idling in the evenings at your club. (I am taking it for granted that you are one of the right sort.) No more bachelors' parties at Richmond or Greenwich. You groaned in your spirit at the bride you had set to your own mouth; but still you had the sense to see that your old life would not do, and after some hesitation you put your nose to the grindstone, and were altogether a better man for it. Nevertheless, you have sometimes felt that it was irksome to have to consider another's tastes and wishes; and there have been times when you have sighed again for the flesh-pots of Egypt! Don't blush, and don't deny it. Better men than you have made the same mistake. The grindstone hadn't taken all the "rough" off!

At the present moment you are willing to admit that life has gone very well for you. You have had your sorrows—who has not?—and your inconveniences have sometimes protruded themselves rather too plainly on your notice; but, taking it all round, you have exceedingly little to grumble at. Wait a moment, now—audi alteram partem—is there "nothing to grumble at" on the other side? Have you been quite so thoughtful as you might have been? When the grindstone was particularly active, was yours the nose that took the principal part? What about that long sickness of little Nanny's, when the poor wife was worn out with want of sleep and nourishment? What was your part? Oh, yes—of course!—you were anxious; everyone knows that. You carried the look of a worried man in your face. When you turned into your club at night to find a little relief from your sorrow you smoked an extra cigar out of the very heaviness of your heart. You behaved like a man—uncommonly! You were very kind, though, in your way. You took home with you every day some luxury or other—often at great cost—and you never counted the cost. And when the little one was able to be moved you insisted on taking wife and children to Brighton or Bournemouth, for you were very tired of seeing the pale faces in your home. Now, candidly, do you think that your nose was at the grindstone all this time? You do! Well, then, I'll be equally candid with you, and tell you that I don't. It was the poor wife and mother who had to bear the constant anguish of waiting. It was she who lived in hourly dread of the advent of the last enemy. Hers were the ears that listened all night for sounds from the sick-room. Her feet were the busy ambassadors that waited at the Court of Death. No, no, my friend! You may be a good sort of man in your way, but you don't take the cake here.

There are some men who persistently carry out the title of my paper, and who yet never make much of a mark in the world. They rise early, and late take rest, and eat the bread of carefulness, but their success is not commensurate with their efforts. You see, it all depends how it is done, as Tommy Atkins said when he tried to milk a cow. He worked at it as hard as he could, but hardly a spoonful of milk could he extract, while when Kate, the charming girl who carried the milking-pail, came along, Dame Durden herself would have been delighted with her performance; and yet Kate did not work half so hard as Tommy. It is just the same with the scythe at the smithy. If the grinder holds it badly it will be badly ground, hollowed out here and ripped up there, and the more grinding that is done the more will bad workmanship be obvious to the onlooker. Then again, some people apply their noses to the stone by fits and starts. This is a course which is invariably a failure. Farmer Jones had a very eccentric servant-man—most people thought him crazed—and one day, during a press of work, he was told off to churn. So at it he went with a will for two or three minutes; then he sat down to rest awhile. Presently he started up and recommenced churning; then he rested again. He kept at it like this all day, and late at night Mrs. Jones inquired how much butter had been turned out, when the blunder was exposed, and the whole business had to be gone through again on more reasonable lines. Yet this is much the way in which many men endeavour to "churn the world's cream." First work, then play—everything by turns and nothing long—no steady application of the energy in one particular direction, and failure, of course, to finish.

But it is time that I said something about the second part of my subject—the having one's nose put to the grindstone.

You see that donkey yonder, drawing a load of coal up the hill, and you say to yourself, "There's another nose putting itself to the grindstone." Nothing of the sort—the nose, in this instance, is not putting itself, but being put! The driver carries a goad, and whenever that donkey flags in his efforts that goad and that donkey come into close personal contact. The creature will do no more than he is obliged to do—because he is a donkey. And there are many human donkeys like him—men who will do nothing until adverse fate goads them, and then they will do only so much as fate compels them to do. This is making our life a labour and a sorrow. The willing cheerfulness that meets every storm of life with renewed energy is lost here in sullen indifference, and the capacity for enjoyment is completely destroyed in the desire of selfish ease. But many of us ignore the goad altogether. "You don't know what a lot of work I've done this last month or two," said the mole to the bat. "I've moved several hundredweights of soil, made several miles of tunnels, and formed a thousand hillocks, while you have been flitting lazily through the air, when you haven't been fast asleep in your nest!" Precisely! But, then, the goad of hunger pushed him on to all this work, or he would have slept more than the bat. "Bless us all!" said the pigeon, "I flew nearly a hundred miles in one day—what do you think of that?" But she forgot to mention that the reason of her long flight was the fact—an awkward one, no doubt—that she was being pursued by a hawk. So it often happens that men boast of the work they do, as though it were labour cheerfully undertaken from a mere dislike of idleness, while all the time they have been urged on to the work by the most pressing necessity, and the exertion for which they claim credit was merely Nature's effort at self-preservation.

At the same time, there are plenty of people who openly admit that their noses are being put to the grindstone, and, while they admit it, they do not forget to complain, loudly and emphatically, that such is the case. But is it, after all, so unhappy a circumstance that man should thus be used? The scythe at the smithy might object, if it could, to the process of being ground, but of what inconceivably more usefulness is it capable after this operation than before? And men are but human scythes, in a way. The grinding is necessary to take off the roughness, and to put on a keen edge, and if they do get hurt a little in the process, they are so much more valuable afterwards that they need not mind. Character is a matter not of disposition only, but also of circumstance, and the grindstone is a very material factor in the formation of sterling character. At the same time it is well to remember that it will take the gilt off the gingerbread.

NOTEWORTHY CHURCH ROOFS.

THE roof is mentioned a dozen times or more in Scripture; but it is nearly always the flat housetop that is meant, that is still in common use in the East, on which people can pleasantly take the air. It was on the roof spread with the stalks of flax that Rahab hid the two men whom Joshua had sent to Jericho to search the country. And in Gaza three thousand men and women were on the roof when Samson took hold of the two middle pillars on which the house was borne up, and destroyed them all. Again, David was walking on the flat roof of the king's house when he saw the beautiful Bathsheba. And it was upon the roofs of their houses that the children of Israel made themselves booths, as well as in their courts and streets, on their return from captivity. When, however, we read of the order to overlay the roof of the Temple with gold, we must conclude it was of a form on which the rich covering would be seen.

But it is to the splendid specimens of carpenters' work forming the roofs of our own buildings in olden times that we would now draw attention.

For nearly two thousand years there have been carpenters at work in England, as well as masons. Except in the instances where large buildings have been vaulted with stone groining, the clever masons of old times, indeed, were always followed by carpenters as skilful as themselves. When the click of the masons' tools ceased, the sharp tap of the carpenters' hammers, and the rasping sound of their saws, and the smooth rush of their planes, began. But the very first churches were made entirely by carpenters. The old chroniclers tell us that the Saxon evangelists on the island of Lindisfarne built their church there of wood, and thatched it with reeds. It was not till the Danes had burnt it, and it had been abandoned for two centuries, that it was rebuilt in stone, after the Norman Conquest. There is a specimen of one of these small ancient timber churches still standing at Greensted, in Essex: very small, very hoary, and very pathetic. We may see that the carpenters took the trunks of trees and split them in two, and then placed the rounded surfaces of the outsides close together, side by side, to form a wall, leaving the semicircular parts to be the exterior of the fabric, and the smooth faces to form the interior wall-surface. The roof of this relic is, however, of later workmanship.

The roof of Westminster Hall is one of the masterpieces of English carpentry. The width of its span, the "pride" of its height, the nobility of the mighty "principals" resting so gracefully on their stalwart corbels, the richness of the open tracery-work in the spandrels and other compartments, all unite to give it a splendour that we must admire to-day as much as those who first looked up to it must have done. The perfection we here see at a glance was only reached gradually, in the course of years of development. The rigid triangle of the simplest form of roof in meaner edifices was softened and strengthened and coaxed and curved, cut away here and diverted there, upraised, and spread out, time after time, and enrichments added, and support given by fresh means in new places, till this luxury of construction was eventually reached. As becomed, great names were given to the grand timbers that performed the most important parts, or stood the greatest thrusts, in these structures—no less, indeed, than king-posts and queen-posts; and the slates that eventually covered them were called ladies, countesses, and duchesses.

Our church roofs have not such a wide span as Westminster Hall, though some of them have very fine proportions. South Creak Church, Norfolk, has a fine timber roof. In this example of medieval carpentry the centre of the massive beam that ordinarily spanned the whole distance between the opposite walls is cut out, and the two ends of it projecting from the walls are supported by curved brackets springing from the caps of columns on the walls below. Each of these shortened beams is carved in the likeness of an angel, and supports a queen-post which rises from it to the principal beam above it. Where the ridge and the ribs cross the principals there are carved rosettes, and the edges of most of the timbers are notched to represent castellated work. Instead, therefore, of a series of beams striding from one side of the edifice to the other, with king-posts in the centre of each rising to the ridge, this roof is open to its utmost height, and enriched with rows of winged figures on both sides.

There is still richer work at New Walsingham Church, in the same county. The serene beauty of the roof of the aisle in that edifice is not less than captivating. As, on account of the slope of the roof, one side of the aisle is higher than the other, there is a considerable difference in the size of the spandrels that fill up the interspaces of the curved timbers that span the width at regular intervals. On the side adjoining the nave the open-traceried spandril is more than three times the size of that on the other side; hence, there is space for an open circle or rose, with six cusped divisions in it, whereas on the lower side there is but room for a small quatrefoil. There are no angels with close-folded wings, as at South Creak. Indeed, they would serve no purpose, for there are no great beams to uphold. But beautiful foliage, all disposed with geometrical precision, is spread out on a flat surface, as though intended as a banquet for the eye. Spars and rafters, softened at the edges with many mouldings, crossing and re-crossing, leave square panels between them. Their points of intersection are enriched with quatrefoiled ornaments, and radiating from these are arrangements of rosettes and trefoils, the whole forming a recurring set of geometrical figures, almost as flowery as a parterre; and for diversity, occasionally, where the rafters touch the side wall, and elsewhere, and there is space but for half-squares, the central ornament is changed to a cinquefoil.

The roof of Knapton Church, too, in the same county, has two tiers of hammer-beams beautifully carved. Tradition, clinging to it as limpets and seaweeds cling to old piers in the sea close by, avers that this roof was constructed out of the timbers of a ship wrecked on the adjacent coast. It is also thought it was raised as a thanksgiving by a pious soul saved from shipwreck.

There is a wonderful roof in a mortuary chapel, or chantry, in the south aisle of St. Mary's Church, Bury St. Edmunds. Those who devised it must have had the firmament of the "Pentateuch" in their hearts. After they had raised the great timbers and set them firmly in their high places, they made the spaces between the rafters as blue as the sky, and then they studded this deep blue ground with countless stars that had raised rays made of lead, and central mirrors, made of convex glass backed with pitch, that flashed back every gleam from every taper that reached them.

Well-wooded Warwickshire is rich in ancient timber roofs, as witnesses quaint and bright Coventry, with its "three tall spires," the frameworks of which are but continuations of the triumph of the roof-carpenter's skill. The bowery cider counties are full, too, of examples. Sunny, balmy Surrey, Sussex, and Kent tempt us to wander down their bewitching lanes in search of their retired village churches, holding out to our minds, as it were, the certainty that we shall be sure to alight upon some appealing bit of ancient work—if not an elaborately carved roof, perhaps a spirelet covered with split oak shingles scorching in the sun, or a timber-framed porch hooded in a perforated barge-board, casting fanciful shadows on the neighbouring tombstones and deep green grass, as delightful to look at. But as we approach the border-lands examples get scarcer. In the north aisle of St. Peter's Church, Ruthin, Denbighshire, however, there is an extremely rich example. No fewer than five hundred devices may be counted among the sumptuous enrichments of the ancient timbers forming the roof. The roof of the nave is scarcely so elaborately treated, but it is also exceedingly handsome.

The old parish church of Morpeth still possesses the timber roof put on the nave by carpenters who learnt their business in the days when Edward IV. was king, or ever the descendants of the Welsh gentleman, Owen Tiddor, came to the throne. This venerable edifice stands in a green churchyard, thickly planted with yews and other evergreens, about half a mile out of the town. It has a nave with north and south aisles, a chancel with a north aisle, a fine tower, and a porch, and a two-storeyed sacristy, which last may have been occupied at some time as a hermitage. In both jambs of the chancel arch are narrow slits, or openings, through which the nave can be seen; and in the sacristy is another opening rising from the ground, for which no one can account. Over the nave is spread the fifteenth-century roof, as indicated, which is divided into plain rectangular compartments by the intersection of the timbers, and covered with lead. In this part of the country in these old times the constant incursions of our Scottish neighbours—by way of reciprocity, probably—precluded the use of costly woodwork is extremely rare in the north.

There is a church roof that is a puzzle to all who look upon it. It is that of the chancel of Kirk Newton Church, in Northumberland, in the district where our great green pyramids, the Cheviots, divide England from Scotland. This is the locality concerning which the Venerable Bede wrote:—"Paulinus coming with the King and Queen into a manor, or house of the King's, called Ad-Gebring, abode with them thirty-six days, employed wholly in catechising and baptising, during which time he did nothing from morning till night but instruct the people resorting to him in the saving word of Christ; and being thus instructed, he baptised them to the forgiveness of their sins in the river Glen, which was hard by;" and for testimony of the fact of the greater population of the hill-ornamentation in a material so soon set on fire. And, as mentioned, ancient down to us is a nave of the date of Charles II., and a chancel with the curious roof mentioned. It is a plain stone vault, with the spring of its arch commencing only two feet and nine inches from the ground. Out of the nave opens a similar vault at right angles with it, only smaller. Antiquaries, with their heads full of Paulinus and his grandly successful mission, cling to a belief in the possibility that this small, plain, solemn, vaulted chancel may have been the scene of his labours, or of those of his immediate followers in the ministry, and that a rude carving of the Magi is a relic of his times. Others have concluded that when the original building lay overthrown and open to the winds, this vault was made as a place of security, and was but the base of a tower. In alterations and repairs made within the last quarter of a century this low stone-vaulted chancel, with its humble entrance, like that of a cellar door, is carefully preserved.

tops and hill-sides in those old times compared with their desolation to-day, the ancient fortlets and hut circles all round bear abundant witness. In the heart of a small plain in this wild and stern country stands the Church of St. Gregory. As century after century went by, battle after battle was fought, and then the district was left to its heathery solitude, its gorges, its streams, and its clouds; and the little church was left to moulder and decay. We learn it was in a very dilapidated condition in 1669, and it was probably then put in repair; for what has been handed

ON PROMOTING THE PRESENT AND FUTURE WELFARE OF OUR SERVANTS.

BY LADY JOHN MANNERS,

VICE-PATRON OF THE ORDER OF HONOURABLE SERVICE.

In the midst of the preparations for the celebration of the Emperor of Germany's birthday, the Empress, who is ever watchful for opportunities of encouraging every enterprise undertaken to promote the welfare and true happiness of others, found time to send me a gracious message expressing her interest in the Order of Honourable Service.

Her Imperial Majesty sent word that the plan she had adopted of giving a gold cross to every servant who had been at her present post forty years, had borne good fruit in Germany and Prussia, and she earnestly trusted that the movement set on foot by the Editor of THE QUIVER would be equally appreciated.

The idea has been most warmly received in England. The Editor of the Morning Post was good enough to insert a letter from me on the subject, and other papers also manifested their interest. The Editor of THE QUIVER, up to July 25th, had received over eight thousand three hundred letters on the subject; while I, though I have nothing to do with the distribution of Bibles and medals, received several letters containing such interesting, touching accounts of fidelity and devotion on the part of servants, that I only grieve it is not possible to record them in the pages of this magazine.

I think if we all could endeavour in our families to realise the German expression "house-fathers" and "house-mothers," we should find far more happiness in our domestic life. The number of cases brought to light by the Order of Honourable Service, of servants who have remained fifty, forty, thirty, and twenty years in the same family, effectually disposes of the allegation that servants nowadays are not what they used to be. Still, I fear that service is not now regarded as such a desirable career for respectable persons as it formerly was,

Perhaps the more hurried conditions of modern life, when it seems that people of all classes live at high pressure, prevent the master and mistress from taking the sustained interest in their servants that would call forth corresponding kindly feelings in their minds. When young people first enter service, consideration as to their bodily health and their mental welfare should be exercised; it must be remembered that they require recreation, and opportunities of seeing their friends. Our affections must be cultivated as well as other parts of our characters; and I fear that the latter years of servants are sometimes very dreary, from their having lost keen interest in their relations and friends. In some houses it is customary to allow each servant a fortnight's holiday during the year, and experience proves that this is very refreshing to them, and that they return to their duties with renewed vigour of mind and body after the change. It may sometimes happen that servants have no home to stay at in these cases. By a little forethought and consideration it may be possible to arrange for their accompanying the family on some little expedition; or rooms might be taken for them in a pleasant neighbourhood.

Occasionally a few words of kind advice and sympathy would be much valued, and such words might make all the difference in the future life of young servants; and I am sure there are times in the lives of everyone, old as well as young, when the heart is easily touched by sympathetic kindness.

In very large establishments, where a good deal of entertaining goes on, the lives of the under-servants particularly are often very hard. For instance, if the ordinary dinner-hour is eight or half-past eight, how very late it must be before the kitchen-maids can get to bed! They must be up early in the morning. I am afraid sometimes we rather overlook the necessity of having good sleeping accommodation for our servants, and perhaps we expect a little too much from them. It sometimes happens that places let for shooting are quite inadequate for the accommodation of large establishments, and instances have been known of overcrowding leading to very bad results. I have, however, known kind masters and mistresses who gave particular attention to this point, and, in some cases, iron houses have been constructed to prevent overcrowding. Sometimes attention to a minor detail will convert an unhealthy, cheerless sleeping-room into a wholesome one. For instance, a ventilator will make all the difference in a room without a fireplace, though it is always desirable to have a fireplace in every room.

Damp may be prevented by simple means, after consultation with people who understand the subject, and damp is also too often a source of ill-health to servants. We must remember health means fortune to them. And we ought to see they have opportunities for fresh air and exercise, and that at times of extra work they have assistance. It is sad to think that sometimes an excellent hard-working young servant's health may be ruined by overwork, or want of fresh air; or, in the case of men-servants, by exposure to bad weather without proper protection or wraps. I have been told that variety in fare is necessary for all of us, if we wish to keep our health, and plenty of vegetables should be supplied to all. Where it is possible to provide it, a liberal diet is essential for those who work hard. This puts me in mind of a story of a farmer who took a boy into his service. The first day he gave him bread and cheese; in the afternoon he went to see how the lad was getting on, and heard him singing, as he worked very leisurely—

'Bread and cheese:
Work at your ease.'

The second day the farmer gave him potato pie, and stepped round again to see how the lad got on. He was working faster, and singing—

"Potato pie:
Work accordingly."

The third day the farmer gave the boy beef and pudding, and on going to find out what he was about, he saw him working vigorously, while he sang—

"Beef and pudden:
Work like a good-un."

The rest of Sunday is invaluable to all, from the Sovereign and the statesman to the head of the humblest home, and to the servant. And it is most earnestly to be hoped that those who are in the responsible positions of employers will do all they possibly can to make Sunday a Day of Rest for all over whom they have influence, and to cause it to be understood that while Sunday is to be looked forward to as a happy day by master and mistress, children and servants, all unnecessary work is to be avoided on that day. Here a mistress and a cook may co-operate, and by preparing the dinners on Saturday, much Sunday work may be avoided. There are many households where it is found very difficult to have family prayers every morning; and if on Sundays there are not opportunities given for the members to attend a place of worship, by degrees the religious must become careless, and it is to be feared the careless become still more forgetful of things that belong unto our peace. There are now societies, adapted to various schools of thought, which offer reading-rooms and social intercourse for young men. The Young Men's Christian Association and the Young Men's Friendly Society are among these; while for young women there are the Young Women's Christian Association and the Girls' Friendly Society. I think if masters and mistresses realised the enormous benefits conferred by these societies on young people, they would encourage their servants to join, or at all events would not discourage their doing so.

I have so often advocated the great importance of providing interesting and improving books and periodicals for our servants, that I will not dwell on the subject now; but I am certain if we could provide them with healthful recreations they would greatly appreciate them. The late Lord Derby used to take delight in watching his servants play cricket. There is one point that those interested in the welfare of servants should bring before them—that is, the duty of thrift. No doubt a very large number of servants practise great self-denial in order to support parents, and in some cases even distant relations. In fact, I believe that extraordinary virtues exist among servants; I have heard of so many cases of almost heroic self-denial among quite young men and women. But where there is no particular motive for saving, it is to be feared that servants are no more free than other people from temptation to fritter away their money. Mr. Granville Baker, of Hardwicke Court, Gloucestershire, son of Mr. Barwick Baker, the well-known practical philanthropist, has published for distribution a report of the workings of Aids to Thrift. The pamphlet explains the system he pursues, and when I mention that through his encouragement his butler—who was a single man—saved nearly sixty pounds in three years, his groom forty-two pounds in four years, and his nursery-maid (out of wages ranging from eight pounds to fourteen pounds) saved thirty-eight pounds in nine years, it will be seen that the plan was successful. Mr. Baker used to mention the advantages of thrift to his servants, and generally found them very glad to be advised.

After making several inquiries, I found there is a General Domestic Servants' Benevolent Institution; the office is at 23, Sackville Street, Piccadilly. It was opened, as the report tells us, thirty years ago, for the purpose of enabling masters, mistresses, and servants to combine for the support of those servants who from no fault of their own might fall into distress. The funds are spent in apportioning pensions of fifteen or twenty pounds a year to deserving old servants, who have themselves been annual subscribers to the Institution, of sums varying, according to age, from three to ten shillings a year. There is a general registry for the servants who are subscribers.

It is melancholy to read that, owing to the general financial depression, there are distressing claims for pensions and temporary relief at present.

I read with pleasure that this society has in contemplation, when funds permit, to build an asylum. I trust, however, it will be called a college. We have Chelsea College, and other colleges where many retire, whose feelings might be wounded at the idea of entering an asylum. I do, however, believe that some institution of the kind would be an immense boon to servants. On retiring, I fear they are often very lonely, and many have little idea of household management. Life, for instance, in London lodgings is very expensive, even if only one room is hired; frequently a little advantage is taken of an inexperienced person by those with whom they lodge.

Moreover, it is not every family who can afford to pension retiring servants. And I am sure it must be a great sorrow to many a master and mistress to think that poverty and loneliness await their faithful servants.

Mrs. Eliot James has written a work in which I found much that is very useful. It is called "Our Servants: their Duties to Us, and Ours to Them." I learnt from those pages what incessant work and what multifarious duties many have to perform. There is also a charming little book by Lady Baker, written in that kind, sensible manner that characterises all her works: "The Responsibilities of Mistresses of Young Servants."

The same temptations beset people of all classes. Young men are tempted to exceed in drink, to bet, to gamble, to be idle; while young women have their own special temptations—to be fond of dress, perhaps of gossip, or of continually reading silly novels.

I cannot help feeling that we must be on our guard against putting stumbling-blocks in the way of the young. We ought to point out the blessings of temperance to them, and I do earnestly hope the day is coming when money will be universally given instead of beer, or that a rate of wages will be fixed without special mention being made of beer. I know that having taken the pledge has proved the greatest safeguard to young servants in families. I think it must be from a mistaken feeling of kindness that elder servants sometimes press the younger ones to drink; but a feeling is growing up that it is not right to urge those to do so who have taken a pledge, and I am thankful to say it often now happens that at servants' parties non-alcoholic beverages are provided for abstainers.

Coachmen are often sorely tried. I heard the other day that it sometimes happened in suburban places, where coachmen put up while entertainments are being given, that they are turned out about half-past eleven and have to wait till the entertainment is over. It is an incalculable benefit to them if arrangements can be made with a coffee-house for them to spend the evening in.

A well-known newspaper, good-naturedly commenting on the Order of Honourable Service, remarked that masters and mistresses whose servants lived very long with them ought to have medals bestowed on them. Undoubtedly, in every relation of society, there must be give and take, but the whole question of happiness in domestic life—real happiness, which is certainly not dependent on worldly prosperity—would be solved by acting up to the maxim, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself."

THE FLYING SKULL.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE OILED FEATHER," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

THERE are many monuments in Blaystone old church. It used to be the parish church once; but as a new town sprang up at the end of the parish another church was built, and the old edifice ceased to be the parish church any longer. But for all this it retained its place in the affections and respect of many, and was looked upon with all its old veneration by the original inhabitants, and those who dwelt immediately around its ancient walls.

Indeed, there were some who looked on the edifice recently erected as a new-fangled place—one spick-and-span new, no doubt, which might in time come to something, but which, under the most favourable circumstances, could not look grey and venerable for many a year, could never have monuments on its walls reaching back as far as five hundred years, and, above all, could never have one like that in their church—the monument called the "Flying Skull," because the marble tablet which narrated the birth and death of the deceased commemorated thereby was surmounted with this ghastly emblem of mortality—part, so to speak, of the ground-plan of Mr. John Soames, who once had been, but was now, so far at least as this world was concerned, no more.

It is very astonishing what men will be proud of when they have little in reality of which they might boast: if such a miserable thing as boasting could, under any circumstances, be allowed to such poor creatures as we are.

There were many in Blaystone who actually prided themselves in belonging to the church which possessed such a unique monument as the "Flying Skull." They used to take their visitor friends to see it; I am sorry to say they used often to look at it themselves when service was going on. Many of them could tell you exactly how many teeth it had, and which molars were wanting; and the parish doctor, if the truth were known, had often speculated as to whether those molars had yielded to the decay of nature, or to the persuasive force of some bygone dentist, with much palaver on his lips and something hidden in his hand.

On close examination of the skull, as the reader will learn by-and-by, the doctor's mind was set at rest; these molars, from the appearance of the marble, had died a natural death. But there was another tooth gone, a front one, which the doctor never could account for; nor was it likely that he should ever be able so to do, for it had been knocked out, the deceased having received a severe blow, with this result, at a comparatively early period of his life.

For this skull, be it known to you, good reader, was, so to speak, a photograph in marble of the original head-piece of John Soames of Blaystone Manor—that is all I can tell you about it at present; and I should not have told you that much, only it is essential to your understanding what I have hereafter to say.

But this matter of the teeth was by no means the chief noticeable feature about this skull. It was adorned at either side with wings—it was a "flying skull."

It was well known in the neighbourhood, for it was a matter of carefully preserved tradition, that the monument had been designed during his lifetime by the man whose name it bore; but what he could have meant by those wings, or by that irregularly toothed emblem of the original draft or substratum of his head, no one could even guess.

There were, no doubt, many sapient speculations in Blaystone, as there always are upon recondite subjects everywhere; the wisest, perhaps, of which was an old Irishwoman's, who said, "And shure he was a good man, and put it up there to frighten people when they think what they'll come to in the end." This was her most charitable view of the "Flying Skull;" but there were times when Biddy Cooney's liver troubled her, and when, in consequence, she took a morbid, and, I may say, even an uncharitable view of people and things; and on these occasions, until her views were ameliorated by Cockle's pills, she used to say, "Shure and 'tis goin' to fly away, good luck to it, to have a new face clapped upon its ugly bones. Sind me word when ye come back, me honey, and I'll call and pay me rispiots; and mind ye doesn't forgit yer whiskers; and if ye gets a choice, get yer nose ruled straight, and yer mouth wid a purty twist in it. I'll be bound ye'll be a purtier-lookin' lad than ever ye were before."

There the skull was, and not a word ever came forth from its lantern jaws to gratify the curiosity of the Blaystone gossips. The wings were not in size proportioned to the skull. If the living John Soames had essayed even a short flight with them, he would probably soon have had a fall which would have rattled every tooth out of his skull, and made its marble representative even a still more piteous spectacle than it was now. They were no larger than an ordinary pigeon's, but that was large enough to be emblematic—to mean "something"—whatever that "something" might be; and that was evidently the design of the deceased Mr. Soames.

How Mr. John Soames, who never troubled church much during his lifetime, came to get his monument and horrible post-mortem effigy in the honoured position in which it was, was, however, no mystery at all. There was a parochial charity, called "Soames' Gift." It was the interest of £200 which the testator left, on condition that his monument was placed in the very identical spot in which it had now stood for many a day. It was not far from that part of the church where of all others God's love and good-will and forgiveness were set forth. John Soames had become a very wicked and unforgiving man before he died; and he had felt a demoniacal kind of pleasure in putting his grinning skull, and all that was associated with it, in his mind at least, in that place where, of all others, it should not have been.

There it was, and it was the glory of more than one in Blaystone old church that the new parish church, with all its brass and grandeur, had not, and could not have, anything like their own dear old skull.

There was one person in Blaystone who took a much deeper interest in the Flying Skull than anyone else. This man was Jacob Soames the sexton. You will, of course, have observed, good reader, that the sexton, whose skull was still "padded out with flesh and blood," bore the same name as the man whose skull had no longer an existence on the earth, but might be said still to live vicariously in the horrible marble effigy in Blaystone church.

And if you had had the privilege of the acquaintance of John Soames when in the flesh, you would have been able to trace somewhat of a resemblance between him and Jacob of the same name.

Jacob the sexton was now an old, old man; he was seventy-five, but he was hale and strong, and bade fair to being able to dig other people's graves for the next ten years. His own thoughts certainly did not run upon going into the grave himself. And yet, to look at Jacob Soames' face, he ought to have died many years ago; and to know his history would be to make one sure of it. For the sexton had a brow deeply furrowed with thinking, and an abstracted air which showed that his thoughts were of a serious and puzzling character; such as, when long continued, generally wear men out.

Yes; Jacob Soames was, as he said himself, "always a-thinkin', and always a-thinkin' of the selfsame thing." "I've been a-guessin' of that blessed riddle these seventy-five year—ever since I was a baby, and I ain't no nearer the end of it than I was at the beginning, if there be any end to it at all. I wants to know," said Jacob, "what is the meaning of that 'ere skull not restin' in its grave like other skulls, unless they be turned up again quite unexpected when the ground is wanted for someone else. I wants to know where it's a-flyin' to. I wants to know why they didn't put on the monument as how he was a good father—an example to the parish, and mourned by what they calls a disconsolate widow and eight fatherless babes." True! John Soames was never married. Had he been, there would have been no "Flying Skull." "But what did that matter?"

said his namesake; "ain't there lots of lies on these here monuments? It would have been only one the more, and it wouldn't have hurt nobody. A lie's a lie, whether 'tis about eight small children and a disconsolate widow, or about no end of goodness which a man never had at all."

But, in truth, the last thing that would have entered the sexton's mind would have been the attributing any virtue of any kind to the deceased John Soames of Blaystone Manor.

Curiosity, and wonder, and mystification gathered round that gentleman's ghastly memorial in the mind of his contemplative namesake, but no kindly thought—and, indeed, according to the ordinary laws of men's thinking, Jacob Soames was not called upon to have any such thoughts, for it was owing to the diabolical thinkings, plottings, and plannings of that of which this marble effigy was an emblem, that he was a poor man, living the most part of his life in and about Blaystone churchyard, instead of enjoying himself at Blaystone Manor.

It was well for Jacob Soames that that cold skull had no ears which could hear, and that its lantern jaws had no muscles whereby they could snap, and that inside those broken teeth there was no tongue which could speak; otherwise Jacob would have received from John such a dose of horrors, more than once, as would have made him wish he had left that skull to its own meditations, whatever they might be.

That "Flying Skull" was the effigy of the true and original head-piece of Jacob Soames' uncle—his father's brother—the owner of Blaystone Manor, which, if John Soames had not made away with the property, ought to have come to his brother, as his natural heir, and to Jacob himself in turn as his father's heir again.

Jacob Soames, I am sorry to say, dealt much more in curses than in blessings; at least—for let us give him his due—not generally, but in everything connected with this horrible skull—this unnatural thing, outraging all nature; and that, in the very place where all was reduced to nature—the monumental place of the dead, where it was so often said that "man brought nothing into this world, and could carry nothing out."

Often did Jacob Soames hear those words. He dared not deny them, because they were in the Bible. But how was it? How could things be reconciled and squared? The parson said this over and over again in Jacob's hearing. In a private interview, the parson had told him that personally he believed every word of it—it was quite true. The sexton himself, in his capacity of undertaker, which line of business he worked with the sextonship, had never known anyone he coffined take anything away; and had he not from time to time turned up from old graves a wedding-ring, and other small trifles? plainly showing that, however much things were valued, they never went beyond this world, though no doubt their former owners would have taken them to another world if they could.

All this was conclusive to Jacob Soames' mind. His uncle had not taken the proceeds of the sale of Blaystone Manor with him. But where had he put them?—that was the question. His history was tolerably well known in the family. He had lived soberly and frugally to the end. He had left no will, so that no clue was to be got in that way. All that could be accounted for was the £200 he had settled on the poor of Blaystone; and it was quite clear he would not have let the destination even of so much be known had it not been that he wanted, so to speak, to insure his monument being put up in Blaystone Church—the monument, of that particular kind, and in that particular place.

When John Soames died, his brother, with whom he had been at deadly feud for many a year, naturally expected to come in for the estate. In fact, he made sure of it, as he knew it was entailed; and so he did not feel that, in the way of worldly wisdom, there was any necessity for him to make friends with his brother. A little Christian charity would perhaps in this respect have proved useful, as Christian principles generally do, even where purely worldly matters are concerned; but neither John nor his brother troubled their heads about such things, and so they continued their bitter enmity to life's end; and one of them, at any rate, carried his enmity out of this world into the next. And that enmity he enshrined in the horrible imperfectly toothed skull, which, wonderfully sculptured as it was, was both the pride and the horror of the good people of Blaystone.

Many a bitter speech did the old sexton address to the ghastly emblem of the ground plan of humanity which looked down upon him from its somewhat airy perch. "You know your own secret, whatever it is," said he, "and you keep it well. I'd give all I have in the world if those marble jaws of yours would speak—ay, even if they had nothing good to say. Anything would be better than nothing—to go on year after year as my father did, and as I've done, and as my son and his son will do, is more than flesh and blood can stand;" although, Jacob Soames, it had to stand it, nevertheless, and I doubt not would, if necessary, be able to stand it to the world's end.

But the skull spake nothing in reply. In vain was it cursed, in vain coaxed; even the rector had been asked to inquire from the bishop whether there was no way of dealing with its contumaciousness, for Jacob Soames had heard that there was something called Convocation, where all the bishops met, with the Archbishop at their head; could not the rector get them to do something? but everything remained just as it used to be—at least, so far as this dismal representative of the John Soames of former days was concerned. And so the Soames family—now represented by Jacob the sexton and his immediate belongings—continued poor; and the manor and manor-house of Blaystone remained in other hands.

But these hands were not the same as those into which Blaystone Manor passed at old John Soames' death. Nor had they been the same for any great length of time together. Somehow or other, no one kept the manor for any number of years—it was always changing hands; and this gave the place an evil reputation, though in itself it was a pleasant abode, and did not really deserve its bad name.

And all this only aggravated Jacob Soames the more. "You see," said the perplexed and angry man, "it all shows that there's a something wrong; 't is I as ought to be in Blaystone Manor—I and mine—put me there, and you'll soon find that once I'm in I shan't easily be got out—there won't be no more changings after that." But no one seemed inclined to put Jacob Soames into Blaystone Manor, and he could not get in himself; so he had to stay out, and comfort himself as best he could, by hurling maledictions against, and heaping them on, the representative of the man to whom he believed he owed all his woes.

CHAPTER II.

LONG years before the time of which we write, the real skull of John Soames, of Blaystone Manor, was fleshed after the fashion of ordinary men, i.e. men—but he it understood not handsome men—such men as by mere facedness win at times a woman's heart.

The flesh which clung to that skull was such as might have belonged to Pharaoh's lean kine. It was not very plentiful in quantity, and the quality did not make up for the deficiency. The ears which garished its sides were large; the teeth which adorned its jaws were irregular, and apparently at deadly feud amongst themselves; while the eyes which once filled the skull's now empty sockets were keen and piercing, but they had in them no shine of love. The cartilage—now gone—which in life was called a nose, and which once clung to the gap above the teeth, was sharp and aquiline; and the crop which grew on the top of all might have been called stubbly, without any action for libel justly lying against the man who said that so it was.

But though not cut out by nature for being a ladies' man, it must not be supposed for a moment that the owner of Blaystone Manor had no intention of becoming a married man. The very opposite was the case; but unfortunately, when he came to bring his ideas into practical operation, he found what appeared to be insuperable difficulties in the way.

The fact is, Mr. John Soames was so ill endowed by nature, that what are called the fair sex—though it is perfectly wonderful, and inexplicable, and bordering almost upon the marvellous, and I might almost say the horrible, what they will sometimes have—would not have him at any price. Nothing disconcerted by the rebuffs of one and two, he tried three and four, but he fared none the better; and so it might have been if he had tried forty-four, or even more.

And what made the matter worse was that his only brother was as good-looking and agreeable as he himself was ugly—and I am sorry to say ill-tempered too; so that he could not help drawing comparisons; and though he was inclined to give himself the benefit of any doubt which might by any possibility be supposed to exist, still he could not but see that there was an almost immeasurable distance between them.

And this fact came home to the owner of Blaystone Manor in a very disagreeable way.

This gentleman had no idea of leading a single life; on the other hand, he was rather an admirer of the "fair sex," and was quite prepared to join his fate with that of some lovely creature; if he could find one exactly to suit his taste, and—but it was a big "and"—and one whose taste he would suit in turn.

The combination of these two requisites, when reduced to practice, formed a considerable difficulty—the net result of which was that, Mr. John Soames remained a bachelor up to a comparatively advanced period of life—where he fancied he was not fancied; and where he was (shall I say?) fancied, he did not fancy; and so it came to pass that time passed on without there being any mistress for Blaystone.

"T is a long lane which has no turning," whether it be matrimonial or otherwise, though the matrimonial one, when once you get on it, is often remarkably short, ending with a stone wall against which people frequently knock their head; and at last there appeared on the scene a young lady with whom the Master of Blaystone was quite satisfied, and with whom he believed he had a reasonable chance.

This girl—for she was no more than a girl—was an orphan. "Good," said Mr. John Soames, "then she'll want a home. And she had no money. "Good," said he again, "then she'll be all the more ready to take mine;" and so the Master of Blaystone condescended to become a visitor at the village schoolmaster's house, where this young lady had her two little rooms, and he even drank tea there—for the schoolmaster's lodger boarded with his family.

Avron was this young lady's name—Amy Avron; and she was to be at Blaystone for three months, her doctor having sent her away from London, overworked as companion to a sick lady, and needing change of scene and air, and perfect rest.

I don't know, I'm sure, how it would have ended—indeed, I may say I don't know how it was going on, or whether it had begun at all—by "it" I mean a matrimonial affair.

Perhaps, good reader, you are shocked at the bare idea of there being even an inkling of such a thing at all; but your nursery education must have been very much neglected if you do not remember the true and interesting story of "Beauty and the Beast," and your observation must be strangely at fault if you have not, during your experience in life, met with "Beauty and the Beast" over and over again.

Only, alas! in these latter instances and in modern times the Beasts do not become transformed into beautiful princes, but they remain as they are—to put it very mildly, very unprepossessing; and the fair ones have to put up with them as they are, in pure and unadulterated ugliness, even to the end.

I shall not say what might have happened if no interrupter had come in the way of the master of Blaystone's suit. Women sometimes do wonderful things in the way of matrimony; in that department of human life the unexpected often comes to the front, and becomes the actual, almost before you know where you are.

This much I may say: Mr. Soames was on very good terms with himself in this matter, and believed that in it a great future lay before him. And so far as Amy Avron was concerned, she certainly was kind and good to Mr. Soames. She was grateful for the drives which were given her in the Blaystone pony chaise, and for the grapes which came from the Blaystone Manor hot-house, and for the flowers which came from the gardens of the same place; but I do not say that the idea ever entered her head that all these were Mr. John Soames himself, only in different forms, animal and vegetable, and that the end of them all, in the course of nature, was to be the taking of Mr. Soames for better or worse.

All, good reader, that it is necessary for you to know is that the gentleman of whom I am writing, so far as he himself was concerned, thought that he was getting on admirably, and would ere long be a married man.

"There is nothing so certain," the French say, "as the unexpected"; and nothing could have been more unexpected than the arrival at Blaystone Manor of its owner's half-brother and heir-presumptive, Henry. Henry Soames had not turned up at the manor for a long time, though no one ever knew when he would appear; for he had a room there, to which he used to come at odd times when he could leave his ordinary avocations, which generally kept him in London, engaged on artistic work. Art and poetry, these were Henry Soames' delight; and though neither of them, nor the music which so often goes with them, brought him in very much, still there was enough to live upon, and there was leisure to enjoy a little of country life.

Henry Soames was welcome to every covey of part-ridges on the Blaystone estate, provided he did not aim at the one little bird which his brother John had marked for himself. "May he spend his time, every hour of it, in fishing and shooting," said the owner of Blaystone, "and be so dead-beat when the day is over that he will want nothing but to go to bed and make one sleep of it until the next day."

I do not remember its being in my "Euclid" that "When two people love the same object they love one another." Euclid is too precise for any such proposition—at least, I think he is. Though not being fond of mathematics, and having suffered unutterable things of that professor of them in my youth, I am prepared to hear anyone who can bring forward any fallacy from his everlasting A B C, his angles obtuse, acute, and right; my chief remembrance of which is that I was very obtuse in taking them in, and that the mental sufferings they inflicted were very acute, and that I found it by no means easy to make his propositions come out right at the end.

Anyhow, when people like the same thing, and when they get to talking about it, and admiring it together, they get the chance of knowing each other's ideas, and liking one another, if other elements of liking be there.

Ill luck followed you, John Soames, as regards womankind, up to the very end. You did not care twopence about the Blaystone river; you could not talk of its deep star-mirroring pools, or of its silvery ripples, or of its soft murmurings and whisperings; you did not know that the water-lilies were the beds where fairies slept, or that the dark fir-grove along its side, with the sun glinting through its sombre foliage, and on its red and brown and orange bank, was all a picture of human life; and so were the withered cones, which lay upon the ground, too easily within reach, and the whispering music in the topmost branches—alas! not within reach at all. You, John Soames, would never have been able to wake with sad yet strangely dreamy thought the deep-toned vibrations which slumber in some human hearts. Woe betide that lover who crosses the track of a heart like that of Amy Avron, and whose only knowledge of Nature is that it is "a fact," and whose only belief concerning all beyond and above Nature is that it is "not a fact." Woe betide you to the bitter end when that track is crossed by one who sees where you see not, and hears where you hear not, and understands where you understand not; and these twain see and hear and understand together, and in so doing understand each other: when these things come to pass, the end is not far to seek. The threads of destiny are twining together—to the dullard who can climb no higher than acres and accounts, the crack of doom has come.

Alas! John Soames, you had no chance with Amy Avron after your brother Henry appeared upon the scene—if, indeed, you had the smallest before, whatever you yourself might have imagined, "the wish," as Shakespeare says, "being father to the thought." No, John Soames, you could not whisper words which fall so lightly on the heart that, like snowflakes, they are there without a footfall to say that they have come; you could not waken echoes at which the heart listens wonderingly, not knowing who spake the words, which, as it were from some far-distant world, they repeat. What did you know of wafting breezes through the heart, which wake its silent strings for the first time to Æolian sounds? Could you touch, and yet, save by a thrill, leave it doubtful whether one had been touched? Could you dart a beam of light and heat into the heart, and yet, save by the heart's knowing that somehow spring—and, quickly following, summer—had come, leave it unknown that a sun was riding in the heavens in its strength? These softer mysteries of love, with its dreamings and enchantments, and dissolving views from scene to scene, each vision brighter than before, were all unknown to such spells as could be conjured by a soul like yours. And yet, you had to win a heart which must be looked at from beneath a lengthened lash, and whispered to with a softness of the evening's breath.

And, alas for you, John Soames! all that you could not do, that your brother Henry could do; and that he did. And this finished your earthly career so far as womankind was concerned, for you became a woman-hater, and registered a solemn vow that with their sex you would never again have anything more to do.

It was a sad affair, that parting between the brothers. It was no case of weeping upon each other's shoulder, or grasping each other's hand, or giving one long, last look, such as those give who are never on earth to meet again. The parting was a violent one, and had its lasting commemoration in the "Flying Skull." For, it will be remembered, that piece of monumental sculpture had one tooth wanting in the front of the upper jaw; and that hole represented the place from which an incisor flew under the pressure of Henry Soames' fist.

In a word, the brothers parted in violent anger. The scene was a terrible one. Lashed to fury at finding himself rejected, John Soames not only said hard words to his brother, but followed them up with hard blows. And these blows would have soon made Amy Avron wonder who Henry Soames was when he next presented himself to her, had it not been that he was as lithe as a willow, and had been trained to use the gloves as well as the brush. It was a blow from one of those fists that sent the incisor away from John Soames' jaw, never to return there again.

But let Henry Soames have his due. Long time he defended himself with his trained skill against his brother's blind rage, and it was only in a moment of temporary exasperation that he struck out as he did. Henry Soames was horrified when he saw the blood flowing profusely from his brother's mouth—horrified when he saw that the tooth had flown too; and, opening his hand, he advanced with it outstretched for reconciliation. But his overture was met with an

to strike him when unprepared;
so, seeing there and made his exit as

shouted John Soames, in hopes his brother would hear the taunt and return to the fight; which it was just as well for him that he did not do, for if he had done so, and if a marble skull were to be put up on John Soames' monument in after years—a faithful representation of what that cranium would have appeared to a phrenologist's eye after a second edition of the fight—I am afraid it would have looked like an eccentric Jerusalem artichoke—knobby here, and there, and everywhere, without apparently any order or system or correlation of the parts at all.

The brothers never met again. I need scarcely say the elder did not appear at the younger's wedding, or propose the health of the bride and bridegroom, or return thanks for the bridesmaids, or go in for any of the amenities of that social season—very amusing to those who look on, but sometimes somewhat distressing to those who have hopelessly to flounder through their part of it, from the bridegroom himself down to that last dismal bore, who, when every imaginable person's health has been drunk, remembers to the sorrow of the company that someone has been forgotten, and, "in a few words," prepares to propose his health.

Indeed, for the matter of that, even if John Soames had been inclined to attend the wedding, either in the capacity of best man, or in any other character save a declarer of reasons why the two people chiefly concerned should not be joined together in holy matrimony, he would not have had much opportunity of distinguishing himself; for the little wedding was quite private—an art student who was befriended by Henry Soames being the best man, and a certain little bumble-bee looking woman, a Miss Chumpty, with whom Amy Avron once lodged, being the sole representatives of friends, and relations, and the public generally. The party returned from church to coffee and sandwiches, and to a seven-teen-and-sixpenny bride-cake, with half a crown extra for cherubs, and one shilling for a cornucopia, which answered the double purpose of making up the guinea and symbolising hoped-for future plenty. The art student, having finished the sandwiches, got up and wished the bride and bridegroom every felicity, and hoped that their palette of life would be spread with bright colours, with no more burnt umber on it than would be necessary to bring up the lights. This simile cost him the week between his hearing he was to be best man and the wedding itself to prepare; so he collapsed when he had perpetrated it; and as the weather was too hot, and Miss Chumpty was too fat to say much, she simply added, "For my part, I say, Amen, with emphasis;" and the whole thing was over.

What sky-rockety affairs weddings are: a fizz—a shower of falling stars—red, white, and blue—and then—and then—alas! too often—an interval, and the ignoble fall to earth of a charred and sooty case, a naked and uncanny stick. I draw a veil over the collapses of too many wedding-days—the impetuous blazing rush—the softly falling stars of light—the last extinguished spark—the after midnight gloom.

The humble wedding over, the parties concerned therein, after a short honeymoon, settled down to the real business of life. Mr. and Mrs. Henry Soames were to be found in a nice and tasteful little villa at Twickenham; and another who was very much concerned indeed in the wedding—though in his case indirectly—i.e. Mr. John Soames, at Blaystone, where he was to be found, from this day forth, limiting himself to inhabiting a single room.

This was a vaulted, crypt-like chamber, which I suppose was chosen by the recluse as having its surroundings most in consonance with his feelings.

Anyhow, what between the thoughts which were within his skull, and the surroundings which were outside it, there was hatched, and there eventually came forth into being, the monumental marble skull, of which, good reader, you have already heard a little, and of which you are yet to hear more.

To pace up and down that chamber and curse the man who, as he said, had robbed him, and the woman who, as he said, had deceived him; to plan the surest and the bitterest vengeance against them—these were now the general avocations of Mr. John Soames' life.

Many and opposite were the diabolical plans of vengeance which suggested themselves to his mind; but one after another was discarded—some as unfeasible, and some as not likely to inflict misery enough.

At last, one dreadful night, after this bad man had been perambulating the dismal chamber for some time, a plan struck his mind which would fulfil all the conditions of his revenge.

While Henry Soames and his young wife were sitting, one at each side of the cradle of their first-born child—none other than the now old Jacob Soames, the sexton of Blaystone—while they were already forecasting his future, and talking of his some day being the owner of Blaystone Manor—while they were spinning a cobweb of golden thread, alas! the dust which was to gather on it, and dim it, and choke it up, and make it a thing miserable to be beheld, was already beginning to gather round it, making that fond cobweb what so many of like kind have been, and will become again.

While Henry Soames and his young wife were seeing their little lad in, it may be, far-off vision, the Squire of Blaystone, the present Squire was seeing him in quite a different light. Stung to madness by the fact of there being a new heir, or apparent heir, to Blaystone, its present owner quickened himself to mature his plans that Blaystone he should never have. And so, helped, I suppose, by the thunder which was rumbling all around, and the fitful lightning which now and again lit up the dismal room, the Squire of Blaystone sat down, this time to finish the work over which he had pondered long. There he sat poring over a parchment—a parchment which he had examined again and again, at one time frowning over it as though it were his enemy, and now and again smiling as though it would lend itself to his will.

"The flaw is fatal!" at last the gloomy man ejaculated, as a tremendous flash of lightning burst into the room, and an equally tremendous clap of thunder made as though it would have brought down Blaystone Manor House about its owner's ears; "and Henry Soames, and Henry Soames's brat, shall never inherit Blaystone Manor. I told Isaacs it was a flaw for those who could find it out; and once found out, it didn't much matter whether it were only a little crack or a big smash, the slit of a penknife or the cleft of a pole-axe. Mr. Henry and Mrs. Amy, you and yours never enter Blaystone Manor, at least—hah—hah, hah, hah!" and a loud and diabolical laugh rang through the room; indeed, it almost seemed as if there were two laughs (perhaps there were); "at least not to stay there, Master Henry; not to stay there, Mrs. Amy; not to stay there, you little wretch, whatever they may call you. Hah, hah, hah! I see it all before me—the whole thing is lovely—and I go to town to-morrow;" and then the owner of Blaystone drew his arm-chair to the fire, cocked his feet up on the chimney-piece, to all outward appearance fell asleep, but really fell into deep thought, planning all the details of his evil intention; and there, until nearly morning, he remained.

ON GETTING MARRIED: A PAPER FOR WOMEN.

BY SARAH DOUDNEY.

MAN once remarked in my hearing that it was the nicest women who were most likely to be disappointed in marriage. A discouraging speech, certainly; and yet when we look round us at the best of our sex, and observe their immense capacity for idealising, I do not think anyone will deny the truth of those words. A girl who has no dreams, no power of calling up a vision of a nobler and sweeter life, is not exactly the girl from whom we expect much good, nor do we feel any deep interest in her concerns. But most girls are waiting for the coming of that prince who is to rule over their world; and while they wait their hearts are busily weaving the royal robe that he is to wear. It is a beautiful robe enough, made out of thousands of tender fancies; the pity is that it so often hides the real man from their gaze.

Of course there comes the inevitable process of stripping off the veil—the disenchantment which makes life seem so bare and hard to an eager soul. The girl has expected too much, and the man is angered by her disappointment. "I did not want you to make a god of me," he says, not untruthfully. "I wanted you to give a sense of comfort to my life, and make me a home. There is no true home without a woman. Why can't you be contented with the stream that flows on without any foaming and fuss? Didn't you know that the froth and bubbles would pass away after a while? Be satisfied with my love for you, and take me as I am, dear, and make the best of me."

And she is a wise woman if she does take him as he is, and make the best of him. She is wiser still if she does not part with the ideal of her girlhood, but believes that it can be found in the prose of life as well as in the poetry. Never refuse happiness because it is discovered in the casket of lead instead of the casket of gold.

One reason for the vague discontent which so often haunts the young wife is her ignorance of the moods of men. It is not likely that a fresh, unworldly girl has had many opportunities of studying the ways of the other sex. Her husband's first fit of the blues is sure to be a sore trouble and puzzle to her. A woman is not good at discovering causes, precisely because her habit of thought is introspective. She worries herself to find a reason for his depression, and hunts for it in the inner life instead of in the outer life.

"Was it something said,
Something done,
Vexed him? Was it touch of hand,
Turn of head?"

No, little self-torturer, it was none of these things. It was just something that happened out-of-doors, apart from your home-sphere altogether. It is Smith who has upset him, or it is Jones again—Jones with his aggravating supercilious airs, laying down the law, and proving that everybody else is wrong. A man must be as meek as Moses and as patient as Job to be proof against the exasperating ways of Jones. By-and-by, if you give him time, and do not bother him, your husband will tell you the cause of his gloom of his own accord, always supposing that there is a cause. Only do not question him, for a man hates being questioned.

It is not wonderful that a man who goes out daily to work in a noisy, bustling world should want soothing when he comes home. He gives and receives hard knocks; he is bruised and sore with pushing his way through a struggling crowd. From all this a woman is guarded carefully; within doors no temptations nor offences may come, unless she herself invites them to enter. Let her beware that she does keep her door shut against dangerous intruders—evil visitants that present themselves, not only in flesh and blood, but in a form which is not material. These enemies are many, and the deadliest of them may seem as "airy nothings;" sudden desires for a freer life and a wider sphere; a weariness of the prosaic surroundings; a vision of some brilliant circle where the lowly little wife might have been the society queen. It is always a perilous thing to encourage the might-have-beens; they are a race of mischievous spirits, bent on spoiling our peace. They make us disgusted with the work that our hands have found to do, by suggesting ideas of some grander performance. They take the sweetness out of our joys, and sour our tempers unawares. No wonder that the husband finds a cloudy face by the fireside when these malevolent sprites have been his wife's companions in his absence.

The first year of a girl's wedded life is often the saddest and loneliest that she is destined to know. The husband goes out to his daily calling, and she sits alone in a house uncheered as yet by baby voices. Can you marvel that she recalls the past, and thinks of the old home that she has left for ever? The long-tried mother's love; the well-tested father's care; the brothers' and sisters' familiar affection—all this is given up for the sake of a love untried and new. Is she as necessary to him now as she was to them once? Would he miss her from his life as they have missed her from theirs? She does not sway his will and his tastes as much as she expected to do. All women, even the meekest, have a secret desire for power, and they are generally disappointed to find that their influence is not unlimited. A man is more difficult to manage than a girl imagines. She thinks that the daisy chain will be strong enough to bind her adorer; but not even links of iron could fetter a creature so impatient of restraint.

"Kind like a man is he; like a man, too, will have his way." It is not all at once that a wife learns how to conquer by submission.

But if it is not easy just at first for the wife to understand the nature of the husband, is there no corresponding difficulty on his side? Even an experienced man of the world is not prepared for anything and everything that he may find in a woman. Her character affords a series of surprises; her mind leaps when it is expected to crawl, and crawls when it is expected to leap. She is a combination of ignorance and wisdom; and often talks like a sage while she behaves like a child. She is like a French bon-bon box, filled with an immense variety of sweetmeats, and every sweetmeat has the very flavour which you did not think to find in it. Did any poet ever describe her better than Pope has done?—

"And yet, believe me, good as well as ill, Woman's at best a contradiction still."

Men (if one may dare to say so!) are a monotonous set of beings, whose doings may be predicted with tolerable accuracy; but you may as well try to foretell the tints of to-morrow evening's clouds as the future moods of a woman. It is this glorious uncertainty of nature which makes her at once so charming and so provoking. She is a puzzle; and it is not surprising that men sometimes get tired of trying to fit all the dainty little pieces into their right places, and give her up in despair.

But our nice girl (even when the first chill of disenchantment is on her spirit) will never entirely lose faith in her old dream of married life. She may realise, bitterly enough, that love has only one spring-tide, and that nothing can restore the dew and perfume of its blossom-time; but she will take heart in thinking of the fruit that comes after patient waiting. A true home is not made in a few months; people do not know each other's souls after living together for a week or two. They see each other at first "through a glass darkly," and it is well if that glass be not darkened still more by the breath of their own unworthy suspicions. The charity that "hopeth all things, believeth all things," is seldom more needed than in the early days of wedlock. A woman desires evidences of love long after a man has ceased to think them necessary. He takes an interest in the round world, and all that therein is; and she, alas! is only interested in him. And so she too often calls his satisfaction indifference, and is half ready to quarrel with the peace that is born of content. But the good wife will check the reproach that rises to her lips, and stifle the craving, and avoid the smallest beginning of strife.

The beginning of strife—what a terrible thing it is, and what a little crevice will let out the waters of discord! There is one subject that very often brings about the first quarrel—a subject which ought to produce only peace and goodwill—I mean religion. And here again the best women, in their earnestness in seeking the higher life, are apt to make dreadful mistakes.

It is strange to hear harsh sayings from tender lips; but women will often utter the fiercest things in defending their "convictions." They are so fearfully sure that they are right, and so unsparing in their condemnation of those who are wrong, that one cannot wonder at the indignant disgust of the men who listen to them. "That which they can know least," says Mr. Ruskin, "they will condemn first, and think to recommend themselves to their Master by scrambling up the steps of His judgment-throne to divide it with Him." Painful as it must be for a young wife to feel that her husband does not perfectly sympathise with her religious views, she must possess her soul in patience. The time may come when he will think as she does; or it may be that experience will set matters before her in a new light. She may live long enough to learn that although the greatest truths never change, God does not teach them to us all in the same way. On creeds and doctrines and spiritual matters generally a woman should be slow to speak, for in most cases her silence will effect more than her speech. It is by her pure life, her meek and quiet spirit, and her loving service, that the excellence of her religion is made known.

A little tact, a great deal of self-control, and a desire to do right, will lead the wife safely over that Disenchanted Ground which all married women must tread. She will leave her girlhood there, ay, and a folly or two, perhaps; but faith and hope will go with her to the end of the journey. And as mile after mile is passed, and the heart of her husband doth safely trust in her, she will cease to regret the illusions of her youth. When sickness and sorrow have taught him her worth, and when her children rise up and call her blessed, she will find that her old dream is fulfilled. I believe that many of our best dreams do come true, only their fulfilment is so slow, and so gradual, that we hardly realise what is taking place. And sometimes, so strange a thing is life, when we near the end we find that the doubts and miseries were phantoms, and the bright visions were the realities after all.

But what shall be said to her who has done all that a woman ought to do, and loved as a woman ought to love, and yet finds that her marriage is an utter failure? This is a subject from which we would gladly turn away; but who does not know some gentle spirit crushed under the burden of an affection thrown back upon itself? She can no longer bear to think of the dream of her girlhood. "Memories hang upon her like the weight of broken wings that can never be lifted." The soul that used to rise hopefully above its troubles has lost the power to soar.

Still, "let patience have her perfect work." It is just when the earthly has utterly failed that the heavenly steps in. The last hope is dead; and the worn nature, having expended its best efforts in vain upon the human, can only wait for the Divine.

SUNDAY EVENING IN A SICK-ROOM.

A MEDITATION FOR THE RESTLESS.

TRAMP, tramp, go the feet on the pavement outside my window; how the footsteps echo! The church bells are ringing their glad chimes. Ah! now they have ceased. I can almost hear the organ's low voice of welcome as the throng of worshippers enter the church. Strange I never noticed it so much before; but the air is still, the hush of the sunset just lingering over the landscape; and from east and west come the footsteps, echoing—sounding—never at rest—tramp, tramp, go the feet!

The room is dark—I cannot reach towards the light. "Oh, that just for once I could go outside the four walls of this narrow room!" The thought presses heavily upon me. I think of Sundays long ago—bright, happy Sundays, when I went with the multitude to the House of God. Ah! one may read and pray, but what is that compared to the blessed worship of His sanctuary? Cannot I once rise and worship as in the days gone by? How often, how passionately have I breathed this prayer! And yet to-night no answer of peace comes to my longing spirit; only outside—tramp, tramp, go the feet!

Listen again! One footstep seems to ring out more distinctly than the others, though with a certain falter in its strength, as if knowledge of weariness were not so very far off. We sick ones are quick to catch the meaning of a step, even of a stranger's; but this is no unfamiliar tread—rather like that of a well-beloved friend.

It draws nearer—nearer. Involuntarily I rise and struggle upward, then sink back, recalling my forgotten helplessness with a groan. My breath comes and goes swiftly, my eyes are fixed upon the door, for the footstep has paused there; then silence, a sweet and subtle fragrance of some unknown Presence is wafted into the room. I bow my head and wait. Silence within, but outside the ceaseless, untiring refrain—tramp, tramp go the feet!

I cannot speak—struck dumb before the sweetness of His presence—that presence for which I have longed all through the weary hours of the tedious day. Tears of silent joy are raining down my face; they veil my sight, but I know Him in Whom I have believed—sight is lost in faith—what need of outward vision? . . .

"The hush of the sunset just lingering over the landscape."—p. 70.

The music of His voice comes through the silence like the sighing of a summer breeze—"Peace; it is I."

Then other words seem to follow.

"My wounded feet—wounded for thee—have come within thy door. Thy heart is sad with the long waiting-time I have appointed thee wherein to show My praise. Dost thou think I give it thee only for thine own sake—for thine own use? My child, thine ears are keen; the passing to and fro of feet without mars thy rest and breaks thy slumber; and well it should, for it has roused thee from dreams of selfish ease. Full satisfaction in thy Father's House shall be thine, but meanwhile learn the lesson I would have thee learn—forget thyself, and live for others. Thou canst not? Nay, thou canst and wilt if trusting in My strength.

"Listen! It would be easy to rise and work for Me; thou wouldst forget all thy heartaches in the very excitement of the toil—yes, and perhaps forget Me. It would be easy just to rise and do the bidding of thy restless will; but to lie still here, to clasp the Cross yet closer to thy heart, to see no hope of dawn till My day break—that is hard work indeed! Hard, but for My strength, which can make all burdens light. So thou art called apart—out from the glare of men's mistaken praise, into a life not of thine own choosing, from which thy very soul recoils. Thy work: to watch with Me in winning souls!

"I have given thee a quick ear for others' needs—use it for Me in this. Listen well to the sounds of sin and want that daily pass by thy door. Learn to detect each sign, to mark each inflection, and as thou learnest—pray!

"Not all will pass by thee. Drawn by some impulse, blindly as they think, some will pause at thy threshold, as I have done this night. For My sake give them welcome—let them find rest and refreshment in this little room.

"And if at times thou art tempted to grow tired with the constant strain of sympathy, saying thine own sore burden is enough to bear—think of My Cross, think of the words of comfort I spoke even there to suffering souls; think of My wounded feet walking this weary world for love of thee, dropping red blood-tracks through heedless crowds—thou canst not then repine!"

The darkness grows. Swiftly those blessed feet withdraw their shining presence, and I am left alone, yet not alone. Henceforth a blessed, thrice-blessed life begins.

Not all at once do the old heartaches go, or the old moods of chiding discontent. But day by day I try to do His bidding in His strength, and I find His promise true.

Tales of joy and sorrow have been told within my lonely room, aching eyes have dried their tears, burdened hearts seemed eased, children's faces dimpled into smiles. They do not know the reason, cannot tell the peace His pierced feet left as a sacred legacy within these walls for ever.

And when all else fails, I can lie still and pray for homeless wanderers, for roving hearts, for wayward wills, for the slow tread of mourners and the light steps of youth that almost dance in passing; for the weak and weary; for the quick, sharp march of duty, and the slow, happy tread of lovers—praying always the same prayer for all—"Guide their feet into the way of peace."

And at dark, just before dawn, when for a little while sounds have ceased, I turn on my pillow with a smile, and sigh: "O Lord, make no long tarrying. Even so, come, Lord Jesus!"

NOON AND NIGHT.

I STOOD in summer on a rock-bound shore,
 Beneath a blue sky mirrored in the sea,
 But I could only think what it must be
 In wintry gloom, when winds and waters roar,
 And women's hearts in fishers' huts grow sore,
 As, kneeling prayerful by the children's bed,
 They think of dangers dared for daily bread,

And boats that founder ere the night is o'er.
 So seemed the sunshine comfortless, while I Saw God in sunshine only. Then a voice
 Of deeper wisdom whispered in my soul,
 "For sake of sorrow, fear not to rejoice;
 God's harmonies have place for song and sigh—
 His noon needs night to make day's perfect whole."

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

"HE IS TURNED A BLUE LIGHT."

MRS. DANIELL.

THE conversion of a soldier, if sincere, is a fact that cannot be concealed; in time the whole regiment knows that he who lives and works in their midst has come out on the Master's side. As a Highlander expressed it, "When I knelt down, it was all over the depot by next morning—"So-and-so is turned a blue light!" A Christian soldier has necessarily a wide circle of influence, not only amongst his own countrymen, but frequently amongst those of another clime and race. "One might almost say that few things are more remunerative than to win a soldier for Christ;" such are the words of an interesting paper relating to Miss Daniell's Missions to soldiers and their families, a work which has grown from small beginnings to Homes at Aldershot, Manchester, Colchester, Plymouth, and Chatham. "It takes a woman to make a home," says one, writing of this work of faith and love. Aldershot was a most uninviting spot when first presented to the notice of Mrs. Daniell, the widow of an officer; the men must choose for recreation between the canteen, the barrack-room, the taverns, and the dancing-saloons. Mrs. Daniell visited the camp, took counsel with a chaplain, and addressed the men; she saw that their need was "a public-house without the drink," and for this she yearned and laboured. In October, 1863, the Mission Hall and Institute, which has since spread branches of blessing elsewhere, was opened on religious but unsectarian principles; no intoxicants are allowed here, but books, writing materials, and games are provided, and the reading-room, coffee-room, etc., are as Liberty Hall to the men, who come and go as they like, being also welcome to the meeting that, every evening, is held for one hour. A great deal of helpful and sympathetic work goes on among the families of the men, and, during the winter, blankets are lent, and coal, etc., bestowed in any really deserving case. Miss Daniell at present carries on the work; her mother died after a long illness, and, followed by a great throng of officers and soldiers, the form so venerated and beloved was borne to its rest in the Military Cemetery.

"THE QUIVER" HEROES FUND.

Carlyle expressed his opinion that hero-worship would for ever exist among mankind. It is a healthy and helpful feeling if properly directed, but the important point is this—what sort of people are we making into heroes? THE QUIVER heroes, as most of our readers are aware, are such as save lives at the risk of their own; heroism that imperils its own existence for the sake of another is the sort we desire to recognise, and have in many cases recognised, by medals of silver or bronze. Our "Heroes Fund" is open for such contributions as our readers may like to send; we invite them also to bring to our notice such instances of heroic deeds as may transpire within their knowledge, and be worthy of public sympathy. Our latest QUIVER hero is Dr. J. P. A. Gabb, of Guildford, who, while visiting Ramsgate, rescued a little boy from drowning: the boy got out of his depth, and floated about forty yards out to sea. Two other boys saw what happened, and called for help to a passer-by (Dr. Gabb), who plunged in and swam to the drowning boy. The latter had just come to the surface for the third time. He was brought ashore unconscious, but the rescuer restored him by means of artificial respiration. "I thought the boy was dead," writes a witness of the rescue, "and was surprised to see them putting on his clothes after a time." Thanks to the doctor's presence of mind, the boy was sent home not much the worse for his dangerous experiences. The poet bids us be on the watch for a heroism greater than that of the battle-field—

"When winds and waters roar."—p. 72.

"Deem not only helm and harness
Sign of valour true—
Peace hath higher tests of manhood
Than battle ever knew."

Our Silver Medal has been awarded to this brave doctor.

"WE WILL GO WITH YOU."

In the little cabin of a Chinese house-boat a Saturday night prayer-meeting was going on. A strange scene it would have appeared to those used to such services in our home churches. We had come about thirty miles from our mission station in Shanghai to visit a little band of converts connected with us, and to hold a Sunday service in a large Chinese city: and on the Saturday evening in question, the resident native preacher, Zau-Mow-Yung, and a middle-aged convert, Pau-os-Kway, were calling on us in our funny little floating abode, accompanied by three sons of the latter, who wished for baptism at the hands of the English missionary. These three lads had been led by their father's consistent Christian walk to say "We will go with thee:" in the same way his wife also, after much violent opposition to this new faith, had been brought in. After earnest and most satisfactory converse with our young candidates, it was natural that our meeting should merge into Scripture reading, and prayer and praise.

ONE SPOT OF LIGHT.

"Earth has many a noble city;
Bethlehem, thou dost all excel:
Out of thee the Lord from heaven
Came to rule His Israel."

Such are the words of the beautiful hymn, with the simple, tender melody so familiar to us all; and to-day we read in the report of the Turkish Missions Aid Society: "Bethlehem contains one spot of brightness in the midst of superstition and spiritual darkness." Here, where the "sweet flowerets of the martyr band" fell beneath the tyrant's sword, a Christian school has arisen, supported by the Society for Promoting Female Education in the East. Quietly, earnestly, and hopefully, the work of Bible teaching goes on in the place where our Lord was a child. Miss Jacombs and her fellow-helpers carry on the work of instruction, despite the intolerance of the Latin priesthood. The progress of the "glad tidings of salvation" is as a river that year by year is widening, slowly perhaps, but surely, and eternally; there are too many Jews in Palestine who seem sunk in poverty, distress, and oppression; but is there not dawn of hope in these little ones claimed for Jesus? "It does one's heart good," say the friends, "to hear those lovely children singing in English or Arabic the songs of Zion." The Lord has not forgotten to be gracious to these Bible lands. At sea-washed Jaffa there is a Christian Orphanage, built under discouragements, but crowned with blessing. When funds once threatened to fail, a passing stranger, name unknown, wrote on the door Isaiah liv. 10. The following is the promise: "For the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but My kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of My peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee."

BETHLEHEM.

JAFFA.

"THE QUIVER" GOOD CONDUCT PRIZES.

"Better than precious ointment." So says the Word of God concerning the value of a good name. Character is a priceless heritage for any life, and we are anxious to do somewhat towards developing and encouraging praiseworthy conduct in those who will by-and-by be thinking, speaking, and acting when the present generation may have passed away. "Boys and girls ought to be good without prizes," some severely constituted minds may be inclined to argue. We can only reply that so long as human nature is human nature, rewards will have power to encourage, inspire, and stimulate, and the God and Father of us all has deigned to cheer our onward steps by an everlasting hope of the reward and crown which await each faithful heart. A new feature of our magazine will be "THE QUIVER" GOOD CONDUCT PRIZES, offered (to the value of one guinea each) to the most deserving inmate of several of our benevolent institutions for the young. At present we have offered such prizes to the Princess Louise Home, where the most deserving girl proved to be MARY ANN HARBOTT; to the Gordon Boys' Home (prize-winner, THOMAS TOBIN); to the National Refuges for Homeless Children, and the Orphan Working School; to the Reedham Asylum, where the prize-winners are FRANCES HOTSON, aged 12½, and JOHN SAVILL, aged 14; to the National Orphan Home, Ham Common, where MARY WILSON bears the palm for good conduct by the vote of all the other children. This little maid is only eight years old. The Secretary of the Field Lane Ragged Schools, thanking us for the prizes (won by ANNIE WHITE and THOMAS NEWETT), remarks, "These awards are highly appreciated by the children, and will have, I am sure, a most beneficial effect on the schools."

A PLACE FOR ALL.

It has been well said that a good tree is not the one capable of bearing fruit, but the tree that bears it. A Frenchman described the object and end of a certain debate thus:—"To show capacity;" but an Englishman answered, "No; it was meant to set our shoulders to the wheel, to advance the business." In the cloudless days that Heaven vouchsafed us this summer many of us have held sweet fellowship with one another amid the fairest scenes of nature—we have looked up to nature's God, and spoken of His beauty and His goodness, and longed to serve Him with new ardour and enthusiasm; there have been open-air meetings of various Christian societies, and, at the present time, plans for the forthcoming winter are being zealously discussed and arranged. We have all known discussions that have simply ended where they began, in talk; but may the result of our debating be that we all put our shoulder to the wheel, and fill the darkening evenings with helpful and earnest work. Let us not be content alone with feeling we can yield fruit of blessing and healing, but let us yield it a hundred-fold with the Master's help. Those of us who are Sunday-school teachers, especially of boys, may well bear in mind that our lads will get no good hanging about the streets in the dark evenings. Perhaps one evening weekly we could arrange to receive a few of them in our own cozy room, where, with singing and games and puzzles and reading, they will obtain hearty enjoyment, and learn more of our friendship and sympathy. Let the boys and girls visit our homes sometimes this winter; newspapers spread over the carpet will protect from mud should such awaken our fears, and the young folks will be far too happy to take offence at the precaution. "I can't get on with children," may be said by some; well, there are the shop-assistants, and the aged poor in our workhouses or our Christian communities, all of whom appeal to our thoughts and interest. If we are willing and anxious to find some groove of good work this winter, let us be sure of this—there is a place for each and all in the Master's service; there is some special work that should inspire the cry, "Here am I, send me."

"For even I in fields so broad
Some duties may fulfil,
And I will ask for no reward Except to serve Thee still."

THE MASTER'S PRAYER.

"The Church of all space and of all time meets and is one in the Master's prayer; it is a sacrament of holy communion; the aspirations of eighteen centuries have gone up to God in it." So says Dr. Vaughan, Master of the Temple, concerning that petition which was given in answer to the cry, "Lord, teach us to pray."

It is lisped by prattling lips, whispered on the dying bed, breathed by vast throngs in our places of worship; even when our minds seem too dim for doctrine, argument, or creed, we can still falter yearningly, "Our Father," and in the cry we shall see God. In the Monthly Reporter that issues from the Bible House, 146, Queen Victoria Street, that edifice dear to all Christians and believing hearts, we read of a book published at Leipzig in 1748, in the Servian language, containing copies of the Lord's Prayer in two hundred languages or dialects. Oceania is unrepresented here, and Africa and America furnish few of the dialects. "At the present time," say our friends of the Bible Society, "after the lapse of about one hundred and fifty years, we can supply this prayer beautifully and accurately rendered in 326 distinct languages and dialects, from all the five regions of the world." We read that certain French officials were determined to erase the Divine name from the school-books, so that no mention of God should be known in their schools. Does not age to age proclaim, as nations, and peoples, and tongues, learn to breathe "Our Father," the truth of what one of our own archbishops uttered at a Bible Society meeting, "All else will drop away, except God's Word?"

"HOMES IN THE HILLS."

Sir Frederick Roberts has written from India that any help which the Lord Mayor or others can send towards the "Homes in the Hills" will be gratefully received by Lady Roberts. The latter urged the employment of lady nurses in the British military hospitals, and the Government agreed to such proposals, and made a commencement at Umballa and Rawal Pindi, but the matter of homes of rest for these nurses must be left to private subscription; Messrs. Cox and Co., of Craig's Court, Charing Cross, would receive assistance in England towards this object. Those of our readers who have lived in India know how trying and unhealthy are certain parts and particular seasons, and the restorative value of "getting on the hills;" it would be a poor return for the all-womanly work performed by the nurses, to permit them, unaided, to sacrifice their constitutions year by year. And, whilst on the subject of places of rest, we must not forget that "charity begins at home!" Week by week hundreds of lives that are toiling day by day are found in our Sunday-schools, striving to lead the children heavenward. A Home of Rest for Sunday-school teachers has been opened amid the sea-breezes and charming surroundings of Hastings; it is called the "Hermitage," and, during the bygone summer, many were the testimonies as to the pleasure and benefit this new institution conferred. The Master has many a wearied faithful servant to whom rest at Hastings would be a godsend: all who have been able to afford and enjoy rest and change might do worse than send a thank-offering towards the Teachers' Home to Mr. Scrutton, Sunday School Union, Old Bailey.

No correspondence can be entered into on the subject of the awards, which have been made upon a careful consideration of each case, in accordance with regulations which have been duly supplied to the members concerned. The Roll of the Order is now closed to all excepting domestic servants who have served fifty years and upwards in their present families.

"THE QUEEN OF THE ORDER."

"Honours achieved," said the sage of old, "far exceed those that are created;" what evidence of worth, of earnest effort, of domestic heroism, appears as we scan the Roll of our Order of Honourable Service, numbering now more than three thousand members! Discussions and letters seem going on endlessly about the perplexed question of domestic service; there are some employers, there are some servants who have solved this problem, for so vast has been the number of applications for membership to our Order, that the register can only be open now to the Distinguished Class—those who have been more than fifty years in their present situation. We have records of sixty-two years' service, of fifty-nine and fifty-seven years. All honour to the trustworthiness such records represent! We must bear in mind that when such members as these first started in life, more was expected, as a rule, from young servants, than in the present day; nor was the "evening out" every week, or the monthly holiday, so generally granted as is now the case. The more credit to these members of our Distinguished Class, who can show faithful service of half a century; and it cannot be denied that the honour is reflected back upon those they serve, for though the past days knew less of what maids now esteem their rights and privileges, we are inclined to think they also knew more of personal interest, affection, and sympathy, which go further with ninety-nine hearts out of a hundred even than wages, perquisites, and extra liberty. Strong must be the tie between employers and employed, and blest and holy it must be likewise, that abides for fifty years! But we have a record even beyond fifty years before us—that of the Queen of our Order, whose portrait we are sure will be of interest to our readers.

Mrs. Susannah Martin was born with the century, and was eighty-seven last July: she has been in one situation seventy years, and her mistress writes concerning her thus: "I am much interested to hear of the honour conferred on my dear old servant by her installation as Queen of the Order; the old lady will, I am sure, be much gratified." And, on our side, remembering what is meant by seventy years of domestic work, we have felt it an honour thus publicly to be able to record Mrs. Martin's name.

"THE WHITE MEN TAUGHT US TO DRINK."

We were present recently at a temperance meeting where a tall, earnest-looking man arose, who had been in the army, and related how certain of his comrades, men whom he loved and esteemed, falling under the influence of strong drink, had been sentenced to corporal punishment for sleeping at their posts. The punishment was inflicted in a way that made it a general warning, and the speaker told how his heart ached on behalf of his "mates," otherwise such sterling men. "A sergeant and myself," said he, "had been thinking of trying to do some temperance work among the natives; we were then on the African coast, and so we arranged a meeting, and, by means of an interpreter, we tried to instil among the people our own sense of the evil wrought by drink. When the interpreter had concluded, we were surprised, and our consciences, as Englishmen, were deeply stirred, by the words of the natives, 'We knew nothing of this fire-water till the white men brought it, the strangers who brought the Bibles too. When have our brethren been disgraced by it as those English soldiers have been? It is to us a new and strange thing, this drink against which you warn us, but it is you who gave it to us; you white men who come out amongst us have given Africa the fire-water.'" Words like these from a negro race hold a solemn meaning for such as are blind as yet to the evils of the drink and opium traffic among tribes across the sea.

PURE LITERATURE.

The Rev. Charles Bullock, speaking at the Church Congress, remarked that on one occasion, having purchased some papers in a populous neighbourhood, he asked the shopman, "Would you like your own children to read these?" Somebody's children were reading them, and many young minds are thus drinking in at the present day what has been characterised as "literary disease." "If we would win working people to church," said the speaker, "we must look well to the Printing Press." The progress of education has set hundreds reading and athirst for reading, and immoral and atheistic literature is as poison in many a home. Again we would earnestly enlist the sympathy of our readers for the Pure Literature Society, of which the Archbishop of Canterbury is a vice-president, and which does such valuable service to the Christian Church by circulating wholesome books and papers. "Its usefulness," says a clergyman writing of this Society, "is shown by the taste it has aroused for good books at home. Our library (helped by the Society) has been so popular that we have kept it open all the summer, it being preferred to cricket, since the men are tired from work." Ministers of all denominations grieve for the sad influences of unwholesome reading, but few make a point of publicly speaking on this subject. Our friends of the Pure Literature Society would be thankful if Christian teachers would utter warnings against sensational and injurious reading, and if once a year ministers could draw attention to the power of the Press, its influence on our lives, and the importance of reading that which is helpful and pure.

AN AFTERNOON'S CHARMING DRIVE.

Those who live within driving or railway distance of Bagshot should visit Collingwood Court, the Royal Albert Orphan Asylum, erected as a monument to H.R.H. the late Prince Consort. Here, in the healthy air of Surrey, amid the sweet fragrance of the trees, more than two hundred boys and girls—"orphans on the wide world scattered"—are boarded, clothed, and educated. The boys learn farming, gardening, etc., and the girls are taught house-work and plain sewing, and are trained with a view to the formation of helpful and valuable servants. Visitors can inspect the little folks and the various arrangements of the place any Tuesday or Friday, from 2 to 6 p.m. In the vestibule will be noticed a handsome marble bust of the Prince Consort, executed gratuitously by an eminent sculptor, and approved by the Queen, and a friend has presented a carved two-light stained glass window at the western end of the dining-hall, through which the sunset light streams down upon the children through the representation of the Royal Arms. In the board-room is a weighing machine where the children are weighed on entering the Home and on quitting it! The majority come from poverty-pinched houses, and efforts are eventually made to set them up in life; numbers of old pupils bear witness to the kind treatment and useful training that are in process at Bagshot. We are thankful to note that the canvassing system is not in vogue here; anybody who has tried to get a child into an institute by that system, and spent time, stamps, and patience in the struggle, will applaud the decision of the committee to elect by the unbiassed choice of the subscribers, whose addresses are not given in the reports. A short narrative of each case appears in a descriptive list, which is sent in due time to the subscribers, who select and vote for the cases they consider the most destitute.

BOOKS TO READ.

A series of handbooks on "Men of the Bible" that did not include one on Elijah would indeed be incomplete, and we are glad to welcome Professor Milligan's admirable little book on the life and times of the Prophet, which Messrs. Nisbet have lately added to their series. It is a work which both teachers and students will do well to study. The same publishers have also recently published, under the title of "The Philosophy of the Gospel," a new volume from the pen of the Rev. Hugh McIntosh, designed and well calculated to serve as a new weapon in the armoury of the defenders of the evidences of Christianity. Good sermons or addresses to children are notoriously difficult to find. There is lying before us a copy of a new edition of a volume of such addresses by the Rev. S. Cox, D.D., entitled "The Bird's Nest, and other sermons, for Children of all Ages" (T. Fisher Unwin), and those readers who do not find profit and pleasure in its pages must indeed be hard to please, while no reader need be deterred by the prospect of meeting with any reference to those special views to which many of our friends have with reason felt bound to take exception. Readers of the papers that recently appeared in our pages on the "Sages of all Ages" will not be surprised to find that the pagan Sages of old not infrequently gave expression to thoughts worth noting even in our days. Miss Annie C. Randell has collected and arranged many of the most striking of these in a pretty little volume entitled "Pagan Pearls." A tale of Hindu domestic life written by a high-caste Hindu has recently been translated by the Rev. J. R. Hutchinson, and issued by the publisher of Miss Randell's book, Mr. Elliot Stock, under the title of "Fortune's Wheel." Those who wish for a true picture of Hindu life cannot do better than turn to this volume. The same publisher sends us "The Rainbow Round the Throne," a memorial volume of sermons by the late Rev. Francis Tucker, prefaced by a touching biographical notice by his son. From Mr. Elliot Stock, too, comes a re-issue of a critical revision of the text of the New Testament by Granville Fenn, published fifty years ago, and which is interesting, as all such works must be, to the student of the Scriptures. Messrs. Cassell have added three more volumes to their "Helps to Belief" series:—"The Morality of the Old Testament" is a question on which sceptics often seize to the confusion of the unprepared Christian, who will now be able to turn to the admirable work on this subject contributed by Dr. Newman Smyth to this series. The Bishop of Peterborough is the author of the companion volume on the Atonement, and his work is all that we have learned to expect from Dr. Magee. The third of the additions to this series is the Rev. Brownlow Maitland's useful handbook on "Miracles." We are glad to welcome a new and popular edition of Mr. Hodder's "Life of Lord Shaftesbury" (Cassell), which is accompanied by eight full-page illustrations. In this form Mr. Hodder's admirable biography of "the Good Earl" will be within the reach of all.

THE ROYAL ALBERT ORPHAN ASYLUM.

We have received the following nice little letter from the winner of THE QUIVER Good Conduct Prize at the Princess Louise Home:—

"Princess Louise Home,

"Woodhouse, Wanstead, Essex,

"September 9th, 1887.

"To the EDITOR of THE QUIVER.—SIR,—Will you kindly permit me to thank you for the very handsome gift of books which you have so generously presented to me? and I hope I may prove myself through life to be worthy of it. The girls are all so pleased, and wish me to thank you too, that you did not forget our little Home in your kind act of beneficence, and they all mean to be the best behaved during the year. So I fear our Matron will find it troublesome to find the best girl next time. If you can possibly make it convenient, will you kindly come and see over the Home? for I am sure Matron will be pleased to show you, and then I shall be able to thank you in person, and all the girls will see the gentleman who has been so kind as to think of them. Again thanking you for the handsome present, I am, Sir, your grateful and obedient servant,

"M. A. HARBOTT."

This letter is so interesting that we give it at length, feeling sure that our readers will read it with the same pleasure it has afforded us.

LIGHT IN THE DARKNESS.

We have received a letter respecting the Royal Westminster Ophthalmic Hospital, King William

"The visitors read the Word of God to the blind."

Street, W.C., stating that, owing to the deaths and removal of old subscribers, this institution is in need of increased assistance, the available beds being quite insufficient to meet the demand of patients. To prevent the loss of sight, prompt treatment is often most valuable, and this hospital is open daily and at all hours for accidents and urgent cases. It is scarcely possible to imagine a charity that has more claims upon public support: there are few of us who have not personally, or in the person of some loved one, proved how sensitive to suffering and weakness is the eye, and all who have the blessing of their sight would do and give much to retain this boon of light. We hope this hospital will not appeal in vain; and we should also like to draw attention to a society that is scarcely so well known as it ought to be, that of "Home Teaching for the Blind" (31, New Bridge Street, Blackfriars). This association aims at visiting the blind in their own homes, and teaching gratuitously Moon's embossed type-reading; also it promotes the lending of useful books, especially the Bible, and the visitors read the Word of God to those who are too old or too weak to learn to read by the touch of the fingers.

"YE HAVE DONE IT UNTO ME."

"You haven't given me anything yet for my Father's house," said Billy Bray, the quaint Cornish preacher, desirous to thatch the roof of his little Gospel Hall.—"No, I haven't," said the man addressed, "and shan't neither."—"What! are you a mind for the Lord to say to you, 'You saw me a-hungred and gave Me no meat, a stranger, and ye took Me not in?'"

"Well," was the reply, "I doan't mind if I do give 'e ten shilling."

Billy, working in an underground mine part of each day, used the other part to work at the building of a place of worship; it is always those who are already busy and energetic to whom we may confidently look for additional service. A blind girl brought a clergyman a double missionary subscription, because she was blind and thus worked in the dark without the expense of candles; hearing of such zeal and love as this, our own hearts are constrained to look around, and to ask if we are doing our best for our Lord, and for His own.

Some of us, perchance, take a keen interest in certain benevolent schemes, that just now may be perishing for lack of timely help; perchance the work is even down in our wills; but, meanwhile, the pressing need goes on. We are acquainted with a little maiden, somewhat precociously prudent, to whom her aunt rather vaguely promised a future benefit. Presently there came a knock at aunt's bedroom door: "Aunt, thank you very much for your promise, but suppose you were to die? You know, aunt, you might die; have you left a piece of paper to say you promised it to me?" The lady wisely considered that it would be more satisfactory for her gift to be an immediate one, and we fancy there are many Christian societies which would be thankful just now for even a small portion of our intended benevolence. Let such as can bring fragrant and rich thank-offerings open their hands in the presence of the Lord of all.

THE NOBLEST PROPERTY.

It has been truly said that the will to help a fellow-creature is a far nobler property than intellectual wealth. To argue out a social problem takes a good deal of earnest thought, and is nowadays apparently more necessary than ever; but nobler still is the work of those who cut the knot of perplexity by stretching forth their hands to the friendless. While we are arguing why the destitute are among us, and proving that they ought not to be, how many would be quietly starving but for those who in the spirit of Christ not only bid them be warmed and fed, but take care they are able to carry out the advice! Our illustration represents a free meal at that busy centre of philanthropy, the "Edinburgh Castle," Limehouse, E., near Burdett Road railway station. Here Dr. Barnardo time after time gathers together the needy and destitute, and the cry, "No man cares for me," can no longer go up from boyish hearts prematurely sharpened by their poverty. It is told of John Falk that a child under his care once asked, "Why does not the Lord Jesus come? Every day at our food we say, 'Come, Lord Jesus, be our Guest, and bless what Thou providest!'"—"Dear child, He will come," was the good man's reply, and the little fellow ran to fetch a seat. By-and-by a poor frozen boy knocked at the door; he was welcomed to the chair, fed, and befriended. "Did Jesus send him in His place?" asked the little child earnestly of John Falk. What could his answer be but the words of Christ, still echoing down the ages, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these My brethren, ye have done it unto Me!"

EYES TO THE BLIND.

(See p. 142.)

THE SALT OF THE EARTH.

BY EDWARD GARRETT, AUTHOR OF "EQUAL TO THE OCCASION," "THE MAGIC FLOWER-POT," ETC.

HERE are few things more wonderful to consider than beginnings. It is a very trite saying that "everything has a beginning," but it may not have struck everybody that we never know what is beginning when it begins. You, dear reader, may have made two or three new acquaintances to-day, but how can you foresee that presently one of them shall enter your very inmost heart, and make you forget what life seemed before this date? Or that one of the others shall steal into your existence like a subtle poison, separating you from your chief friends, and perhaps finally overthrowing all the fair fortunes which now seem so secure?

Or you have said something to-day—you have uttered some emphatic conviction, born of some manifold experience of your life. Perhaps you gave it forth in discussion with some friend who held opposite views, and whose opinion was not shaken by yours. You seemed to have done nothing. You did not notice the young boy or girl who were present apparently occupied by their books or toys. But they heard your sentiment and marked it. (Let us infer that it was dictated by ripened wisdom, and not by mere shallow cynicism.) It is destined to sink into that young soul, and to repeat itself with varied significances in the different experiences that life will present, and the conviction which was wrought in you perhaps too late for your own action, shall shape the decisions of that youth, and turn the course of his history, and the destiny of those who shall come after him.

There is no exaggeration in this view of things. The world of "hard fact," as the phrase goes, meaning those matters which can be seen and handled, testifies abundantly how

"From small beginnings do great endings come."

When the Romans found a few poor aboriginal huts and fortresses grouped on the banks of the un navigated Thames, who could have imagined that they were the nucleus of a mighty city, whose kings should stretch out their sceptres over remote countries, whose men of genius should sing or preach to other men, of races of which the Roman never dreamed, and which at last, waxing riotous and corrupt in those reckless pleasures and regardless greed of gain, which must ever leave a dreadful dreg behind them, can be described by one of its own most gifted sons as "that great foul city of London—rattling, growling, smoking, stinking—a ghastly heap of fermenting brickwork, pouring out poison at every pore."

Or again, when the little ship Mayflower ploughed the empty desert of the wild North Atlantic, bearing to a sterile shore a little group of independent souls who were ready to risk anything so they might be free, who could have foreseen that the humble vessel was the pioneer of a great emigration, which now keeps a score of steamers, heavily laden with hopeful hearts, passing weekly over the North Atlantic, wild as ever, but no longer an empty desert of waters, to a shore which, ceasing to be sterile, became first fruitful fields, and then thriving cities, and finally little more than quays and landing stations to still wider lands beyond?

When a French soldier of the ancien régime was pleased to amuse himself in the streets of Paris in terrifying and torturing an old woman and a little girl by curvetting his charger over a coin which they had dropped, so as to prevent them from regaining it, probably they went home disgusted and disheartened enough, with a bitter realization that "on the side of the oppressor there was power," and perhaps filled with that sense of despair which a very small injustice or defeat will suffice to breed in the feeble or the aged, in the inexperienced or the utterly worn-out. They could not dream that the little incident had been watched by one, a statesman rising into great power, on whom it wrought the conviction that "the people" could never be happy or safe from wrong or insult, till it was guarded by a soldier identical in feeling and interest with itself; and his conviction presently found form in the organisation of the French National Guard.

We will now turn to one or two instances where the action of a single individual has sufficed to set the groove of social custom. When the worthy Quaker, Jonas Hanway, started out, amid the jeers of his neighbours and the missiles of naughty street-boys, carrying over his head the first umbrella seen in use in England, his faith must have been very strong indeed, if he could have fully believed that in a very few years the strange phenomenon would be so completely naturalised that an "umbrella-stand" would be among the regular appointments of every decent household!

Not many miles from where I write this, among the purple hills and wild moors of the North of Scotland, there is a spot where many roads meet, and where a now famous fair is held annually, and many smaller ones at shorter intervals, to which farmers bring their cattle and their produce, at which country "merchants" display their wares, and whereat many cottage industries, such as bee-keeping, or stocking-knitting, win pride and profit by prize or sale. The spot is admirably situated for the purpose—midway between several small villages, and easy of access to the farms and hamlets thinly scattered over the neighbourhood. Its advantages were first discerned many years ago by a solitary man—not the laird, nor the minister, but a simple travelling pedlar. Of such men the poet Wordsworth says—

"Their hard service, deemed deluding now,
Gained merited respect in simpler times,
When squire and priest and they who round them dwelt
In rustic sequestration—all dependent Upon the pedlar's toil—supplied their wants,
Or pleased their fancies, with the wares he brought."

Possibly our Scottish pedlar was such a one as the hero of "The Excursion," and had kept

"In solitude and solitary thought His mind in a just equipoise of love."

At any rate, he was an honest man, whose credit stood well with his customers, and whose coming was patiently waited for, because his goods were trustworthy and his prices fair. Presently the good man felt the weight of advancing years, which did not agree well with an ever-widening sphere of traffic. He considered within himself, and decided that the spot we have already described would be a convenient point at which to let his customers understand he would regularly await them on given dates. Be it understood that the roads which meet there now were not made then: they were all lying latent in the pedlar's idea. There he could show them a wider assortment of goods than was possible if he had to toil up hill and down dale, often uselessly, under their load. It was easier for each of twenty or thirty cottage wives, who really wanted his wares, to walk her two or three miles towards him, than for him to toil seventy or eighty miles to all of them, with many divergences where he was not required at all. Possibly a life of industry and thrift had already made such "due provision for his modest wants" as emboldened him to take this independent step. Anyhow, it prospered, and his name and story are still remembered in the neighbourhood of the fair which owes its start to him. But as far as I could discover, nobody remembers another individual who must have certainly existed, and who is worthy of scarcely less honour than the originator—i.e., that individual to whom it first occurred that it would be a wise thing to carry up some produce of one's own, and, sitting beside the pedlar, expose it to one's neighbours, when they came, cash in hand, to the pedlar's trust. The first disciple of any movement is a most important person, for he takes the fire of genius and originality, at which others are content to gape in admiring or scoffing wonder, and he proves that it is useful for boiling kettles and lighting lamps—and lo! the eccentricity of the remarkable man becomes the custom of the commonplace! I wonder who was that first person who sat down beside the pedlar on the moorland? Perhaps it was some old blind woman, who could do nothing but knit stockings, and wanted to sell some. Or perhaps it was some little girl, whose bees had given her more honey than she required for home consumption.

I have been narrating all these incidents of the unexpected developments of beginning in the material world, not for their own sake—deeply interesting as they are—but because, before proceeding further, I wish to work into my reader's mind a vital conviction (which is very different from a lifeless axiom), not only that everything must have a beginning, but that whatever we do may lead to results far wider than, and actually quite different from, any we can possibly anticipate. And further (and this is most important of all) that it is always "worth while to make a beginning," though all that we can possibly do with heart, hand, or tongue may appear utterly inadequate to the end we would achieve, and even hopelessly separate from it.

"He that believeth shall not make haste." When it is borne in upon us that something is right to be done, or to be got undone, then we have nothing to do with improbabilities or impossibilities. (Why, even a great French statesman who did not much believe in God was known to declare that "impossible" was "a beast of a word" which he never wanted to hear!) Our part is simply to do what we can; if necessary, even to wait quite quietly till we find an opportunity; though we need never wait long for this if we are content with the day of small things, and ready to do what we "may," instead of sighing for what we "might." Then, with prayer and faith let us launch our little action on the stream of Time, assured, with the honourable Gamaliel (Acts v. 38, 39), that if the counsel or the work be of God, and according to His will, it must bear fruit in the end, though the little seed may lie hidden for many days; while if it be but the product of human fanaticism or whim, it must perish utterly at last, though it may seem to spring up and bear a harvest in a single night. Has not a poet beautifully said—

"Nature's least worthy growths have quickest spring,
And soonest-answering service readiest need,
And undiscerning glory's shining wing
Lights earliest on an ill-deserving head,
Winter o'er autumn-scattered wheat doth fling
A white oblivion that keeps warm the seed ;

It can be readily seen that while it is not always possible to trace the beginnings of great movements in the material world, when we come to the things of the spiritual life, whether in individuals or in movements, our difficulties are increased tenfold. The

"Nobody could have been astonished more than poor Mrs. Bunyan herself, could she have foreseen the final result of the innocent wiles which she exerted to keep John interested in the Bible."—p. 86.

And wisest thought needs deepest burying
Before its ripe effect begins to breed.
Therefore, O spiritual seedsman, cast
With unregretful hand thy rich grain forth,
Nor think thy word's regenerating birth
Dead, that so long lies locked in human breast.
Time, swift to foster things of lesser worth, Broods o'er thy work, and God permits no waste."

deepest secrets of souls are sacred things not readily to be fully revealed even in those whose biographies or autobiographies are given to the world. And, indeed, we cannot always trace even for ourselves the first source of our best impulse or wisest line of conduct. Sometimes, when we believe we do so, we stop short at a book or a sermon on which our mind consciously seized, instead of going back to some incident or example of quiet goodness which served to illustrate the volume or prepared us to listen to the discourse. I myself am inclined to think that an action or a person is always the seed of fresh spiritual life in the world, rather than any mere word or thought; words and thoughts being rather the water or the soil brought to enrich the growth of such seed when already planted, perhaps quite unawares. The Word of God Himself we know came to the world a Person—the Person of our Elder Brother Jesus Christ.

There is, indeed, a sense in which words themselves are sometimes deeds of the very deepest import. Such are the confessions of martyrs, ready to seal their testimony with their blood; and such are other confessions of staunch faith or determined action, which also lead to martyrdom no less surely, though it may be the martyrdom not of death but of a broken heart, an abnegated ambition, or of work withdrawn, and the consequent failure of daily bread. But that does not disturb our former proposition, for behind such words as these beats the very heart of a personal life, throbbing in their utterance with the crisis of its fate.

But even of these subtler growings of the spiritual world enough is made visible to convince us that their roots spring in quiet and shady places, among those of whom the world knows nothing and hears little.

Wherever the English language is spoken, there we find Bunyan's immortal story of the Pilgrim and his Progress. Troubled souls and trustful souls have found their own experience mirrored there. It has given us descriptive phrases which can never perish. We need not go out of our way for words while Vanity Fair and the Slough of Despond, Doubting Castle and the Herb Heart's-Ease are ready-made for us. If the roofs of British homes could be raised for us on any Sunday afternoon, how many of the aged and the suffering should we find listening to the strangely melodious description of the Land of Beulah, how many brave boys pondering over the dread battle with Apollyon, how many little maidens gazing on the charms of the House Beautiful? Does it never occur to us that the wonderful allegory would scarcely have been written, but for the unselfish life and holy influence of the poor working woman who married Bunyan in the days when he was, not the unexampled sinner which the unsparing words of his earnest repentance might lead some to imagine, but what was perhaps almost less likely to change into the Christian saint and devoted preacher—to wit, a roystering and careless youth, knowing no pleasures but those of skittles and quots and beer?

Did it seem as if it could possibly signify to the whole Christian world, whether the penniless wife of that humble Bedfordshire villager was a sincere, godly woman, intent on keeping her little household in ways of purity and piety, or a mere good-humoured slattern, who, if her husband brought her home a fair share of his wage, would be quite content to humour his "little ways" and indulge his "harmless plea-tures"? Nobody could have been astonished more than poor Mrs. Bunyan herself, could she have foreseen the final result of the innocent wiles which she exerted to keep John interested in the Bible, or the "Plain Man's Pathway to Heaven," while the shouts of his playfellows on the village green penetrated to their little kitchen, which we may be sure was neat, and clean, and cosy, for all its bareness. Probably, if she could have known that John was a genius, she would have been frightened to marry him, and still more frightened to attempt to influence or control him. But God showed her all that it was necessary for her to know—that it was her plain duty to try to get her husband to do what she felt was pleasing in God's sight; and she found strength to do this. She laid her hand on the rudder of the ship of life, keeping it in its course, and the winds of God came down and filled its sails, and bore it triumphantly where she did not dream.

We think it may serve for our profit and comfort, if from time to time we give a little consideration to the great things which have sprung from the holy lives of those "who builded larger than they knew." We will try to remember such, whose hallowed "beginnings" have been recorded by others long after they had themselves passed through earth's green door into the Kingdom of God, when the seed they had sown had taken root and borne fruit a hundred-fold. Perhaps we shall be able to narrate some incidents of such "secret service" which have been made manifest to our own observation. And though we shall draw a careful line between "fact" and "fiction," we think we may be free to indicate by the aid of the eye of imagination where such secret services must enter into the forces which are to bring in the Kingdom of God, though they can never be traced by any other vision until the day of the great revealing of all things. We hold that anything which gives a deeper responsibility and solemnity, and yet a brighter joy and hope, to life, is a legitimate function of imagination, and that if it be carefully and devoutly exercised, it may make fiction far nearer truth than any mere bald statement of fact can ever be.

We want to trace "the salt of the earth" as it lies sparsely scattered, sinking into the substances around, only to be recognised by the freshness and savour it leaves behind it. We think that our search will bring us many lessons and hints that may help and console us as we go to work, each in our own little corner, and some of us in hedged-in corners, wherein we seem shut out from any service to our kind or any influence on it. We shall not have laboured in vain if we bring ourselves to a better realisation of the truth which sounds so simple in the hymn, but which, if taken home to many a warm and zealous heart, would calm its discontents and make bright the narrow path of duty—the truth that, in aspiration and act, we should be—

"More careful, not to serve God much,
But to please Him perfectly."

THE CHILD OF THE MINE.

"O H, mother, dost thou hear the voice of singing Float from the world above?
Through the dim arches gentle echoes ringing
Do speak to me of love."
"Peace, O my child! awaken from thy slumbers;
I hear no tender hymn."
She knew not that with sweet seraphic numbers
The angels sang to him.
Yea, as he listened through the pathways dim,
The angels sang to him.
"Oh, mother, I do know the earth's sweet story
Of bird and blossoming spray.
When shall I see the sunset in its glory,
The purple hills of day?"
"Peace, O my child—hearken the voice of duty,

Although the world be fair."
She knew not that the angels in their beauty
Were bending o'er him there.
Yea, as he listened through the pathways dim,
The angels sang to him.
"Mother, I do behold the sunset lustre,
The blossoms red and white;
The sunny grape, with its rich purple cluster,
The waters crowned with light."
"Peace, O my child; it is thy slumber's vision;
I see no sunset flame."
She knew not that, from out the land Elysian,
The angels for him came.
Yea, as he listened through the pathways dim,
The angels sang to him.

S. FORSTER.

"WANTED, A GOVERNESS."

CHAPTER IV.

"When shall we grieve, if grieve we must?
To-morrow, love, to-morrow."

CHARLES MACKAY.

OE is me! Maggie does not need a governess, and if she did I could never be that lucky individual. Her terrible old grandfather has given her the kind of education that people try (and generally in vain) to grind into boys. And partly from a lack of other employment, and partly from an innate love of knowledge, she has absorbed it as readily as a sponge absorbs water.

She is quite well now, so, as there was no reasonable excuse for longer delay, I have passed the morning in inquiring into the extent of her studies. And I have been simply horrified—classics, mathematics, botany, astronomy, geology, and goodness knows what besides. I might have been comforted by finding that she was ignorant of French and German, but, unfortunately, my own knowledge of those languages is of the most meagre kind, and I dare not undertake to give her lessons in them.

I have been so comfortable and happy here—so thoroughly at home; and now, in common honesty, I feel I shall have to give up the situation. Everything here is so delightfully unconventional and free from restraint. I am not obliged to weigh every word I say; my life is not made a burden to me by the vagaries of noisy, self-willed children; Mr. Bloomfield is the kindest of men; and as for Maggie, she is positively unique! She has the sweetest disposition in the world, coupled with quick intellect, and has been brought up in the society of a few learned elderly people, who have not only petted her as a child but conversed with her as a rational being. All these circumstances have produced in her the oddest combination of childish simplicity and thoughtful gravity that I have ever met with.

It amuses me greatly to listen to the conversations she frequently has with Hilton (between whom and herself a firm friendship has been established) on the subject of books and theories, and to hear her discuss some serious question with all the gravity of a sage, defending her opinions by quotations from all kinds of learned old writers. I fancy that Hilton himself feels inclined to laugh sometimes, but it never seems to occur to her that there is anything unusual in it.

Most of her scientific knowledge appears to be rather out of date, however, for Hilton often comes off victorious in an argument of that kind. On one such occasion, finding that for some time afterwards she continued to look dejected, I inquired the cause of her distress.

"It is nothing particular," she answered dolefully. "Only Hilton has proved to me that my ideas about the nature of light were wrong."

"Well, I would not fret about that," I remarked. "You did not make the light, nor the theory either, and you could not be expected to understand it until you were taught."

"No, but I always understood that it was radiated from all bodies, in the form of minute atoms; and now he tells me that it is in the form of waves."

"Well, I should not care whether it is in waves or in atoms. It is equally acceptable when we want it, and just as great a nuisance when we don't," I said. "Besides, your cousin ought to understand such things better than you do. He has had the advantage of reading all the newest books."

"Oh, I'm not thinking of it in that way," she replied quickly; "but my grandfather took such pains to teach me the nature of light, and it is disappointing to be shown by quite a young man that he was altogether mistaken. I have been accustomed to trust so implicitly to every word my grandfather said that I don't quite like this new experience. Besides, if he was mistaken in one thing he might have been mistaken in others."

It occurred to me then that I was hardly competent to be her governess, and this morning's examination has settled the matter beyond all possibility of a doubt.

Well, as Shakespeare says, "If 't were done, 't were well 't were done quickly!" I am aware that Mr. Bloomfield is now writing letters in a little room at the back of the house which is called the study. This little room is always at the disposal of anyone who has letters to write, and in it Mr. Bloomfield's private correspondence may generally be read by anyone who feels inclined to do so, as it is usually kept in a heap at one end of the table. Not that Mr. Bloomfield is altogether careless. Oh dear no! he has occasional fits of excessive carefulness, and sometimes spends whole days in the study, sorting and arranging these papers into the most wonderful order. But these fits are of rare occurrence.

The time and place are both suitable for a business interview; so I walk down-stairs and rap at the study door. There is no answer, but I can hear sounds from within which are not difficult to interpret, letter-writing being dull work, and the afternoon being warm.

Shall I leave it till another time—there is no need to be in such haste? No, there is nothing I dislike so much as uncertainty! I mean to have the matter settled at once, and I continue to knock at the door till a sleepy voice bids me "Come in."

Mr. Bloomfield sits at the table with a half-written letter before him, on which is a great smudge of ink, caused by the pen having fallen on to it when he went to sleep. He is lost in contemplation of this smudge when I enter.

"I have come to speak to you about Maggie, Mr. Bloomfield," I begin, plunging right into the subject at once.

"Oh, indeed! Take a seat, Miss Scott," he says, with difficulty withdrawing his attention from the letter.

"I find that she does not require a governess."

Mr. Bloomfield gives a low whistle of astonishment.

"Her English education is complete, and she has studied Latin and Greek, astronomy, botany, and geology, besides mathematics. Of course I cannot say how thorough her knowledge of these subjects may be, because I don't understand them sufficiently myself."

"This is quite unexpected," exclaims Mr. Bloomfield, looking greatly dismayed at my catalogue of Maggie's acquirements. "They told me she had never been to school."

"Nor has she. Her grandfather taught her himself."

"Isn't there anything you can teach her?"

"I am afraid not. If you wish to have her taught anything, there are the modern languages and music. But I have only been used to teaching children, and I could not undertake to give her lessons in them."

There is a long pause, during which Mr. Bloomfield stares at the smudged letter, and I gaze out of the window and feel like a prisoner awaiting my sentence. At last he looks up and says, with a sigh of relief, "I must talk it over with Hilton. I am much obliged to you for coming to me about it, Miss Scott. At any rate, we won't hear of losing you just yet."

"You are very kind," I say, and leave him to finish his letter. My case is remanded.

After dinner, Hilton and his father remain in the dining-room an unusually long time, and I know that my case is being heard.

I feel that Mr. Bloomfield might have decided without asking Hilton. It seems humiliating for a woman of my age to have her services accepted or rejected by a young fellow of five- or six-and-twenty. However, I am quite aware, by this time, that Hilton is the real master of this house. He has chosen every article of furniture in it, and superintended all the decorations, and I must confess the result does him great credit.

For instance, the room in which I await my fate—the drawing-room—is a marvel of lightness and elegance, terminating in a deliciously cool grotto of ferns and flowers. No doubt many people would complain of its want of conformity to the acknowledged rules of decoration, but I will defy anyone to enter the room without feeling that an artist has arranged it. There is not a single crude outline or colour in the whole room. Indeed, there is something almost Quakerish in the soft neutrality of most of the tints; yet where a touch of colour is introduced, how delightfully effective it is! In fact, everything is disposed with such consummate taste that, let the eye rove where it will, it meets with refinement and beauty.

The servants look up to Hilton with a species of awe. Whatever else is neglected, anything that will come under Mr. Hilton's notice must be faultless. The "master" is quite a secondary personage; he never sees whether things are right or wrong; or if he does, it isn't of much consequence—he doesn't care. I don't believe anybody looks after his comfort, poor man! or puts the buttons on his shirts. It's too bad!

Yet I do not think they are so attentive to Hilton because they are afraid of him, for I have never heard him scold them. Nor do I think it can be accounted for by the facts of his age and sex. I believe the sole spell lies in this—that he neither praises nor blames without good reason. The same taste and judgment that were brought to bear on the drawing-room furniture are exercised on everything with which he comes in contact; and quietly, without effort or ostentation, he approves or he disapproves, and we bow to his decision.

Hilton is the kind of man to whom the women of his household are certain to become slaves. No matter whether they are young or old, married or single, they are forced, sooner or later, to value his praise and to dread his censure. When I realised the kind of sway he had over the household, I determined that I, at least, would never put my neck under his yoke; but I have been several times startled to find myself blushing with pleasure when he has praised my work; and I am afraid I shall soon be as much under his dominion as the rest, much as my pride rebels against it.

The oddest part of it all is that it is quite possible to feel like this towards a person without having any great liking or affection for him. A public singer does not love the crowds of elegant idlers he better have masters to teach her French and German, and all that sort of thing. Hilton says it's too late to begin to learn the piano, but if he finds that she has a voice we are going to have her taught singing. What do you think of that plan?"

"I think it is an excellent one. You could not possibly do better!" I answer, with as much cordiality as I can command under the circumstances.

"Hilton thinks, as I do, that it would be a great pity for you to leave us," he continues. "The girls want a companion—somebody to go out shopping with them and take them for a walk now and then. Besides, the servants want somebody to look after them a little, and Julia is too young to manage them sings to, yet their applause sounds none the less sweetly in his ears.

Hilton never talks soft nonsense to women, never flatters them except by seeming to take an interest in their conversation and their welfare. But what flattery is half so precious to a woman's heart as that? He has the rare gift, too, of being able to take a real interest in almost everything that comes in his way; and if you ask his opinion about anything, you may feel sure that he will give it you carefully and conscientiously.

At last this young Pope appears, and I am informed that Mr. Bloomfield wishes to speak to me in the dining-room; so I proceed thither to receive my sentence.

"Well, Miss Scott," he commences in a cheery voice that instantly raises my hopes, "I've been talking it over with Hilton, and he thinks it's a pity not to give Maggie a really first-rate education now we are about it. It's no use spoiling the ship for a haporth of tar, you know. We think she had well. She does her best, I'm sure; but they want a strong hand over them. Hilton says you may not like to get out of practice with your teaching, but if you don't object to stay on these terms, why, we shall be very glad to have you."

"Object to stay, Mr. Bloomfield!" I exclaim warmly: "I shall be delighted to stay! I feel so thoroughly happy here that I have not the slightest wish to leave."

CHAPTER V.

"Do noble deeds, not dream them
All day long."

THE days glide on smoothly and evenly. I take upon myself the duties of housekeeper—very pleasant duties—at Alma House, and Maggie becomes more and more the queen of our hearts. She is the dearest child! I don't believe she has a fault, or if she has I have not been able to discover it. Mr. Bloomfield pours out the whole wealth of his affectionate nature upon her; he thinks nothing is good enough for her, and is continually devising some new scheme to give her pleasure. A man of his disposition must have someone to pet, and Maggie supplies the want to perfection; besides, was she not given back to him from the very jaws of death? If it were possible to spoil her, she would most assuredly be spoiled. But, fortunately, she attributes all this devotion and homage to our goodness rather than to her own.

There is nothing to mar the harmony of our home; no grinding poverty to sharpen our faces and our tempers; no hurrying after wealth and grandeur; and no bowing down beneath the yoke of those hard taskmasters, style and fashion. It seems that in this one house, at least, evil has no power to enter.

One evening, after having been for an unusually long walk, Maggie goes to bed with a headache. I search everywhere in vain for my smelling-bottle to lend her, and then remember having seen one on Julia's dressing-table, and go without the least hesitation to borrow it.

Julia returned from her long visit looking much healthier and happier than when she went; and her manner at first was so cordial that I repented of having wronged her by my first dislike; but during the last few days her old ungracious ways have reappeared.

There is no response to my two distinct raps, so I conclude that she is still down-stairs, and decide to go in and get it for myself. I walk quickly to the dressing-table, and then discover that the room is not untenanted. Julia lies, fully dressed, upon the bed, crying bitterly. She has evidently not seen me, and I can slip away again unnoticed if I like; but feeling sorry to see her in such distress, I lay my hand gently on her shoulder and inquire what is the matter.

In an instant she has dashed my hand away, and sits looking at me with an angry glare in her eyes which no amount of tears will hide.

"You here!" she says, in a low, hard tone. "How dare you come sneaking into my room like a spy!"

I draw myself back proudly, and explain the reason of my intrusion. But at the first sound of Maggie's name she exclaims fiercely—

"I wish I had never seen her! or you either! I was happy enough till you brought her here—with her baby face and deceitful ways!—and now—I hate her! I hate her!" and she throws herself back on the bed, and begins crying more passionately than before.

I cannot endure the sight of tears, and I have never seen anyone cry in a way so distressing to witness as Julia. She completely loses control over herself, and seems to take a morbid pleasure in making herself as wretched as possible; now grinding her teeth and clutching savagely at the bed-clothes in the impotence of her wrath, then breaking out into sobs and moans of self-pity. If I saw my worst enemy in such distress I should forget my enmity in a moment; and Julia is no one's enemy but her own. So, instead of resenting her speech, I try to show her how mistaken she is in thinking that Maggie has wronged her in any way.

"Oh, of course she has done nothing!" she interrupts, when anger has again got the mastery over tears. "She has done nothing—but supplant me in every way! I used to value my uncle's love. What is it worth to me now, when he has given the same—and more—to her? I used to feel proud and glad to be called his darling! What do I care for it now, when he calls her so twenty times a day! Bah! it is disgusting! He would be the same to anyone who happened to come in his way!" Then raising herself on her elbow she says, with a look of unutterable scorn, "I shouldn't wonder if he called you his darling next!"

"You are excessively rude!" I retort, and sail majestically from the room, my cheeks hot with indignation. Me, indeed! Am I so old, or so ugly, that such a term would be preposterous if applied to me? Why, it seems no time since I was as young as Julia, and, as well as I can remember, far more attractive than she ever was—or will be. Me, indeed! As though I were the last person in the world to whom such a word could be applied!

By this time I have reached my own room and my looking-glass; and, on catching sight of my red, angry face, a sense of the ludicrous comes over me, and the spell is broken. Julia is right—it would be absurd! There is a text in the Bible somewhere which speaks of a man beholding his natural face in the glass and going his way and straightway forgetting what manner of man he is; and such has been the case with me. But, fortunately, my looking-glass is a true friend, and neither flatters nor deceives. In it I see a stout, fair woman, with neat hair and dress; and a face that I should call neat also, since there is nothing to offend the eye in it. No one could describe me as "a woman with a large nose," or "a woman with a hook nose," or a particularly small nose; nor, indeed, could I be described by any peculiarity of my face. I am what my dear mother would have called "a comfortable-looking person;" but certainly no one would dream of calling me a "darling!" And Mr. Bloomfield of all people! It's too absurd! So I laugh myself into a good temper, and recommence the search for the smelling-bottle.

Julia's burst of passion opens my eyes to many things which I had not previously noticed, and before very long I make several discoveries. Firstly, that Hilton takes more than a cousinly interest in Maggie; secondly, that Maggie literally adores him (which, indeed, I had foreseen from the very first); and thirdly, that, however desirous Julia may be to retain her uncle's affection, she is still more anxious to win the love of her cousin Hilton. Now she purposes to accomplish this I do not know; for, in direct contrast to Maggie's lively, sunshiny ways, she shows nothing but ill-temper. 'Tis true she occasionally has fits of amiability, at which times she is charming; but as a rule she feels herself eclipsed, and takes no pains to conceal her sulky ill-humour. I find it in my heart to pity and half like her for that very reason; though all my friendly advances are met with studied coldness. I fancy that, amongst other things, she is angry with me for having taken her place as house-keeper; though I gather from the remarks of the servants that she had no liking for those duties, and performed them in her usual jerky, impulsive way; sometimes annoying the whole house with her excessive fastidiousness, and then letting things take their chance for weeks together.

Both the girls spend a great deal of their time in reading. Maggie has never before had the run of a circulating library, and she seems determined to make the most of the present opportunity. As she is under my charge, I feel it my duty to see that she reads no objectionable books; but at present I have had no reason to complain of her choice. I think she has discovered which authors Hilton most admires, and will give herself no rest till she has read all their works.

Fortunately Julia is quite out of my jurisdiction, or I should be continually putting my veto on the books she reads. She is an inveterate novel-reader, and no novel could be too wild or sensational for her taste. I wonder if the reason is, that her peculiar nature craves for that form of excitement, when there is no other to be had; or that a long course of such reading has produced the craving? Perhaps it is a little of both. I believe that if she had always had plenty of useful occupation, and had read none but wholesome books, she would have been a very different girl. But, as it is, she sees everything through the medium of these distorted, highly coloured novels, and is quite incapable of looking at anything from a common-sense point of view.

I am sitting alone in the dining-room, and have just reached this conclusion, when Hilton comes in and inquires for Maggie.

On my informing him that she has gone out with her uncle, he takes up his position, in true man-fashion, on the rug, with his back to the fire-place, and from that elevation proceeds to cross-question me.

"What has she been doing all the afternoon?"

"I don't think she has done anything but read. She seems to have enjoyed it very much."

"Oh, no doubt she enjoyed it! That is the very subject I wanted to speak to you about, Miss Scott. Do you think that it is a proper state of things for a girl to spend two-thirds of every day in reading?"

"If Maggie chooses to read, I don't see how I can prevent it. She never neglects any of her duties. Besides, I am not her governess, you know, Mr. Hilton; I cannot treat her as if she were a child!" I feel rather irritable, for, to confess the truth, I believe I have taken a sort of personal pride in Maggie's goodness, and to be addressed in this way is, to say the least of it, startling.

"Yes, I perfectly understand that," he says, "but I have come to talk it over with you because you are the only one who can help me in the matter. I should as soon think of flying as of speaking to the pater about it! He would not understand me."

How skilfully he has smoothed my ruffled feelings! I know that that half-implied compliment was purposely said; yet it is almost equally flattering to know that he wishes to conciliate me.

"Now, don't you think there is a general tendency to spoil Maggie—to treat her as if she were a baby?" he asks. "I don't say that it is anyone's fault in particular, but the sooner we adopt some other system the better. It isn't fair to her. She has been shut up all her life in that lonely place, with only her grandfather and his old friends and old books; and the natural consequence is that she has become an idle dreamer. I'm sure she thinks more about books than anything else, and lives in a sort of ideal world of her own. Why, to go through life like that, is about as sensible as to go on a journey with your face turned in an opposite direction! You might see an extremely pretty view, but you would be sure to walk into the first pond you came to!"

"You are rather difficult to please."

"Am I?" (With a curious little smile which I think I can interpret.) "I want to rouse Maggie out of that dreamy state—to wake her up to the fact that there is a real world living and struggling around her—to make her see that she must fall into her proper place in the ranks, and march on with the rest. She ought to take a natural, healthy interest in everything and everybody. Don't you think so?"

"So the poor child is to be robbed of her sweet faith in humanity, and all the fancies that make her life so lovely! She is to be dragged behind the scenes and shown all the mean, paltry shams of life—for the sake of making her like other people! I wonder you can be so hard-hearted as to wish it!"

Again that curious little smile. He is evidently amused at something. Perhaps that he has roused me to such enthusiasm—perhaps that I think him hard-hearted—or it may be because I seem to give him credit for possessing the power to work this transformation.

"You are looking at the subject in a wrong light," he says. "There is not the least fear of making Maggie unimaginative and commonplace—that would be impossible. But I want her to be more self-reliant, and more thoughtful for others. At least you agree with me that a girl cannot be really happy unless she has some kind of work to do?"

"Yes," I answer reluctantly, "that is quite true."

"Then you will do your best to remedy the evil? It is simple enough, isn't it? She is neither obstinate nor unreasonable?"

"Not in the least."

"And when once you have put her in the right way, she will go on smoothly enough. I shall very likely give her a hint myself that she spends too much time in reading."

"How do you think she will take it?"

"I don't know, but I can guess. At any rate, she will be sure to ask what I think she ought to do with her time—and I shall send her to you!"

"And about Julia. Are you quite satisfied with the use she makes of her time?"

"Oh, Julia's is quite a different case. You would not be able to do anything with her. She is a warm-hearted girl, with many good points in her character, but she wants very careful treatment. I know how to manage Julia."

I think (but I dare not say so) that I wish he would take her in hand at once, since she is in much greater need of management than Maggie.

CHAPTER VI.

"Nothing useless is or low;
Each thing in its place is best,
And what seems but idle show
Strengthens and sustains the rest."

LONGFELLOW.

AFTER that conversation in the dining-room, both Hilton and I, each in our several ways, try to rouse Maggie out of her dreaminess, and to a great extent we succeed; though whether she will ultimately be the better for the change time alone can prove.

Now that illness is banished from the house, we resume our intercourse with the outer world, and begin to exchange civilities with our friends. Mr. Bloomfield's circle of acquaintances is a large and somewhat varied one. It consists in the first place of professional people, proud and exclusive, who imitate religiously the manners and customs of those above them in the social scale, and feel that the deadliest of sins is a sin against society. These look upon the good man with contempt, but tolerate him for the sake of his eligible son. Secondly, of ambitious tradespeople, wealthy enough to buy up all the professional set; yet mean enough to eat any amount of humble pie if by so doing they may enjoy the honour of their acquaintance. And thirdly, of honest, hearty, commonplace people, who don't care a fig for etiquette, and who laugh loudly at their own old jokes, and are not ashamed to talk of the shop. Of course, these last are Mr. Bloomfield's especial friends.

In my nomadic life I have had many opportunities of studying these three divisions of middle-class society in cliques; but never having seen them in combination before, it interests me greatly to watch the effect when unlucky chances bring them together at Alma House. How the professionals condescend, for the regulation number of minutes, to the tradespeople, and try to overawe them by the extreme correctness of their ideas and actions! How the ambitious tradespeople are servile to them when they think of the stigma that attaches to trade, and defiant when they remember their superior wealth! What beautiful sentiments are exchanged between them! and how Mr. Bloomfield's vulgar friends shock them by their open worldliness, and then outstay and laugh at them. Maggie, having no worldly wisdom, sees nothing of all this; she naturally prefers the more refined and well-bred people, and shrinks involuntarily from those who are unpolished in their manners. We have frequent invitations to the houses of these good-natured folk; which invitations Julia and Hilton almost invariably decline, and Maggie and I, as a matter of course, accept. For my own part, I like their honest, hearty ways; but they are evidently so obnoxious to Maggie, with her ultra-refinement, that I soon beg Mr. Bloomfield to have her excused; alleging as a reason that she is not yet strong enough to bear so much noise. He looks disappointed, but acquiesces, and Maggie accepts no more such invitations. However, there are plenty of others that she can accept, and very soon after her first introduction into society she has met more people than in all her life before.

I expected that she would be shy at finding herself amongst so many strangers, but she seems to be too much interested at the novelty of everything to feel any self-consciousness. All too soon, however, she learns that there is such a thing as etiquette; and with the knowledge of that fact comes timidity and self-consciousness.

It must be startling to discover, at the age of eighteen, that, at every turn, you may be breaking one of those dreadful rules of etiquette, and exposing yourself to comment, if not to ridicule. It must have much the same effect as when a man who has been walking on what he thought to be solid ground, suddenly becomes aware that it is only the thinnest of ice. All his boldness instantly vanishes, and he looks round fearfully, and takes every step with the greatest caution.

I am surprised, and indeed disappointed, that it should have this effect on Maggie; and when she comes to me for help in the matter, I inquire what makes her so anxious to learn the rules of etiquette.

She laughs nervously, and says she is not more anxious about that than about other things.

Then, to tease her, I ask whether she is actuated by a desire to appear to the best advantage in society, or by a sense of duty.

To my surprise, she takes the question quite seriously, and proceeds to explain, in her quaint, old-fashioned way, that, as so much often depends on seeming trifles, she finds it difficult to decide which duties are important and which are not; and therefore wishes to keep on the safe side by neglecting none of them.

"Besides," she adds, "as it always jars on my nerves when people speak incorrectly, it has occurred to me that my awkwardness may have just that effect on others. And how do I know that the want of this foolish knowledge may not lessen my influence at some future time—perhaps just when I am most anxious to exert it for good!"

I am rather amused at the idea of looking at the subject from such a serious point of view. After all, I don't half believe in it. People who have business transactions with their fellow-creatures see the worst side of human nature, and are generally inclined to look very doubtfully upon any profession of unusually elevated sentiment.

Not that I really disbelieve in Maggie for one instant. I should be worse than foolish to do that! I only think that she deceives herself, and that underlying all other motives (unacknowledged, perhaps, even to herself), is the desire to please Hilton, and in this instance the fear of making him feel ashamed of her.

He is certainly very kind to her, continually taking her to morning concerts, to picture galleries, and to other intellectual amusements—forming her tastes after the pattern of his own, I suppose.

Indeed, he is so thoroughly sociable, and has such powers of interesting and pleasing those about him, that he is sought after by everyone. But perhaps we appreciate his society most when we spend the evening quietly at home, sitting cosily round the fire, while he reads aloud to us, either from some interesting book or from the newspaper.

If the subject happen to be a tale of woe—such, for instance, as the account of a shipwreck, with all its thrilling incidents of suffering, death, and sometimes of noble heroism—it is curious to watch its different effects on the two girls. Julia stoops forward so as to hide her face as much as possible, and seems only intent on the fastening of her bracelet, or the adjustment of some fold of her gown. But I can see, by the nervous twitching of her lips and eyelids, that she is fighting back all outward expression of the emotions of which she is ashamed. Maggie, on the other hand, sits gazing into the fire, with her face an index to every passing thought—compassionate when a child is swept from its mother's arms, tearfully sorrowful when some poor creature, who has battled long with the cruel waves, is at last overcome and dashed from his frail support.

And when Hilton has finished she looks up at him with her blue eyes full of tears, and expresses in her own quaint way the sympathy she feels. I wonder if he is ever tempted to kiss the tears away from the sweet young face that looks so innocently up at him? I know that, if I were in his place, the temptation would be altogether too strong for me!

Then Julia, having regained the control of her voice, makes some hard, unfeeling remark, which affects us like a discordant note at the close of a sonata. Poor Julia! Why does she take such pains to crush the best part of her nature—her warm heart and ready sympathy?

"We appreciate his society most when we spend the evening quietly at home."

R. T. A. C. R.

THE VOICE OF WINTER IN CHRISTIAN EARS.

BY THE REV. PROFESSOR W. G. BLAIKIE, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S. EDIN.

WINTER is not a popular visitor; the appearances are all against him; his voice is harsh, and his breath is cold. One might be disposed to think that he could be no friend of the poets; yet one of our tenderest bards found in Winter material for two poems of profound interest and beauty—the “Winter Morning Walk,” and the “Winter Walk at Noon.” The Psalmist couples summer and winter as alike the work of God (Psalm lxxiv. 17), and leads us to regard both of them as manifesting the Divine perfections, and summoning us to show forth His praise.

Winter, then, is the work of God. It may be useful to ask, How has He made it, and why?

I. In what manner has God made winter? By the same contrivance by which He has made all the seasons. Expressed in technical language, the axis on which the earth rotates is inclined to the plane of its orbit; it is not upright, but slanting; this gives us a longer day in summer than in winter, and a more full and direct communication of the light and heat of the sun. It is one of those very simple contrivances by which very important and far-reaching results are achieved. It is at the same time an instance of an arrangement which at first sight appears a defect, having its origin, notwithstanding, in the deepest wisdom. If God had taken counsel of man when making the earth, and had shown him its axis not standing upright, but with a twist or incline to one side, man's eye would have been dissatisfied; he would have said that it was a defect. The eye is offended when a tree does not rise up perpendicularly from the ground, when it has that incline toward the east which exposure to the west wind often gives. Yet the inclination given to the axis of the earth is the fruit of admirable wisdom, and, in such a latitude as ours, is the simple, quiet, yet most orderly and effective cause of all the changes of the seasons. Might not this teach us a lesson in modesty? It is the commonest of all fancies of half-informed men that things might have been done much better. Many deem the Bible to be so full of faults that they ridicule the notion that it is the Word of God. The Omniscient Creator can afford to smile at their criticisms. Had man objected to the poisoning of the globe, He might have simply said, “Be still, and know that I am God.” When objection is taken to the contents and structure of the Bible, the same answer may suffice. “The foolishness of God is wiser than the wisdom of man.”

II. But for what ends has God made winter? The answer is twofold: to fulfil certain physical purposes, and to teach certain moral and spiritual truths.

1. Thus, in regard to the physical results that are attained by winter, we remark that by means of it the circle of vegetable life is completed. If there had been no winter, there would have been no summer, but all the year round something between the two. What would have been the effect in such a latitude as that of Britain? There would not have been heat enough to ripen half our crops and most of our fruits, and the attempt to cultivate them must have been abandoned, or rather would no more have been thought of than it is thought of by the Esquimaux. Such plants as we might still have had would have been growing in a languid way all the year round; flowering in a languid way, a little now and a little then, always half-fresh and half-withered, half-young and half-old. Whereas, by the existing arrangement, the vegetable world has a rest in winter; even while resting, it is preparing for the outburst of spring and summer; lying fallow for a time, but only to come forth in richer luxuriance when spring comes round; preparing in secret its buds and flowers and seed, and then at the proper time bursting into activity, flowering and bearing fruit, with a vigour that would have been unknown but for its winter rest.

Then we must further remember how winter gives hardihood to such plants and animals as have sufficient vigour of constitution to stand it, while at the same time it hastens the decay of such as are drawing near their end; it obviates that slow, lingering death which it would have been alike sad to witness, and, in the case of animals, painful to endure.

And, still further, since it is summer on the opposite side of the globe when it is winter here, we are reminded that what may be loss to us is gain to others. We are taught to think of others as well as ourselves; we get a great lesson from God as to the distribution alike of His temporal and spiritual gifts. Especially are we reminded that there are many poor, naked, and friendless creatures, on whom winter presses with a sharpness from which others are mercifully exempt. Strange to say, winter warms our hearts, and the day that is buried in the heart of it, Christmas, is morally the warmest of the year. We are reminded, too, of the countries where, in a spiritual sense, there is yet nothing but winter. We think of those dreary Polar regions where the nights last for half the year; but more desolate still is the spiritual state of countries where the Sun of Righteousness has never yet risen with healing under His wings. When shall these sunless regions welcome the Bright and the Morning Star? When shall they luxuriate in the beams of the Sun? We are taught with new ardour and earnestness to pray—"Thy Kingdom come!"

2. This brings us to the other branch of our subject—the moral and spiritual lessons of winter.

And first, there is the familiar, commonplace lesson that life has its dark, stormy experiences; that these must be patiently borne; and that, if possible, they should be conquered and turned to good. The sun does not always shine on us; the sky is not always smiling. Hardship, disappointment, blighted hopes are joined more or less in every lot. One thing is very plain here—it does no good to complain of it, any more than it does good to complain of bitter blasts and drifting snow. Calm endurance of what comes from without, and is utterly beyond our control, is surely the part of wisdom. Many of our troubles are brought on us by our own folly, and might easily be avoided. Troubles that are brought on us by the injustice or cruelty of others call, doubtless, for remonstrance. But that which is utterly beyond our control ought surely, even on grounds of earthly wisdom, to be borne with patience. It is hard for us to kick against the pricks.

But surely for the Christian that is not all. It is the doctrine of Scripture that there is by Divine appointment an element of correction in all God-ordained sorrows and troubles. How many an afflicted person has found infinite comfort in that verse (Heb. xii. 11): "Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness in them that are exercised thereby." It is a text that is very true to human nature. Chastisement though it be, the stroke is not joyous, but grievous. When it falls, it makes us very miserable. There are moments, perhaps hours, of utter wretchedness to many a bereaved Christian. Further, the well-known influence of time in softening the pain is recognised—"nevertheless, afterward." And, still further, there must be "exercise" of spirit under it—spiritual gymnastic; the exercise that comes from fixing our minds on the loving nature of God manifested in Christ, on the desperate hold the world has on our hearts, and the need for loosening it, so that we may be able to rest in the Lord, who doeth all things well. For "He who spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not, with Him also, freely give us all things?"

Thus, if we cannot annihilate winter, we may greatly modify its severity. If we cannot, with the swallow and other birds of passage, wing our flight away from the approach of cold and snow, and find near the equator a clime where there are no bitter winds, we may discover a balm in Gilead that soothes the bitterness and modifies the chill. If we may say of our Lord and Saviour, "It is not night if Thou be near," so we may say, It is not winter. Where the promises come in all their richness, the chill of winter vanishes. Where brethren dwell together in unity, where love warms the atmosphere, let the outward surroundings be what they may, it is summer in the soul.

But, again, winter is the appropriate season for indoor employments, for social fellowship, for domestic intercourse and recreation; and the recurrence of the season suggests the duty of seeking to have all these things carried on in compliance with the will and for the glory of God.

It would be a remarkable photograph that should show us the indoor occupations of any considerable number of people—say a Christian congregation—during the evenings of winter. What should we find that the reading part of them had been reading? Who would be found to have been earnestly studying the Book of books? who trying to store their minds with profitable knowledge and to master what they know not? On the other hand, how many would there be who never rise above trifling and uninteresting stories—incapable of reading anything but what merely amuses?

Or, again, what sort of disclosure should we have about recreation? Would any be found ruining themselves and all around them by drink and debauchery? Any worshipping assiduously at the shrine of mere frivolity, laying out vast sums on dress and gaudery, intoxicated with the spirit of the world, mad in the pursuit of pleasure? We do not forget that recreation is a right thing, and to young persons a needful thing. But it is well to remember that it is one of the things that the devil tries specially to get hold of and turn to his purposes. Things most innocent in themselves are mixed up with so much that is pernicious that thousands are ruined. Music is a charming gift, a gift to be thankful for, and to be cultivated and enjoyed; but if (as a mere recreation) it draws away from solid duty, if it is associated with dissipation, if it takes away the relish from everything else, it is a stumbling-block instead of a recreation. The notion of recreation is a simple one, and the word is the key to the nature of the thing. Recreation, creating over again, denotes something fitted to repair the energies, to refresh mind and body, and fit one for doing one's ordinary work more vigorously; and the test of whatever claims to be recreation is, Is it really fitted to refresh us, to make us stronger, better, brighter, more useful, more helpful, more mindful of our duty to God and to man? It is sad when so-called recreation contributes to the very opposite end; when, instead of knitting up the powers more firmly, instead of girding up the loins of mind and body, instead of oiling the wheels, it brings all to a dead halt, and makes the machinery go as heavily as Pharaoh's chariots. It is as if one meant to take medicine but took poison instead. You wish to be braced, in reality you are paralysed.

There is yet another very commonplace lesson to be got from winter. It reminds us of old age and its usual accompaniments. It seems to say, "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, before the days come and the years draw nigh when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them." It is hard for the young to believe how bare, empty, and sapless life may one day become. It would have been equally hard for the child to believe, a few weeks before winter, how cold, and bare, and colourless the earth would soon be. Hard to believe, when the trees were yet in leaf and the flowers in bloom, and the birds gaily fluttering, and the bee hurrying along, that in a few weeks the flowers would be withered wrecks, the trees stretching their naked branches against the cold sky, no lark singing from above, no swallow skimming the air; only the hapless black-bird and the trembling robin, hopping anxiously about the window, glad of a crumb to keep them alive. It is but a picture of joyous young life passing away so quickly, and winter following apace.

And then the question arises, Is life worth living? And how many to-day are putting that question, in a dull, grim despair? Why should men be brought into this world, they ask, to taste every pain and mortification, to become acquainted with every grief, and then perish miserably? Why should they spend their lives like beasts of burden, to be laden up with sorrows, till at last their poor backs break? But surely this is not the universal view of life. "They that are planted in the house of the Lord shall flourish in the courts of our God. They shall bring forth fruit in old age, they shall be fat and flourishing." Among the very poorest such cases may be found.

I remember many years ago hearing that, owing to advanced years, a worthy working man in my neighbourhood had "got his leave," as people called it, by his employers. It seemed to me a sad blow, for the man and his excellent wife had nothing earthly to fall back on. I went to see them, expecting to find them in deep waters, but, to my surprise, I never saw them more cheerful. "We have never wanted a meal," said the old woman, "and when we sit down at the fireside, we have such fine 'cracks' about Providence!" I could hardly convey the meaning of the Scotch phrase in classical language. The spirit of trust had got a wonderful place in these poor people's minds, and it brought with it wonderful serenity and joy. They certainly did not ask, Is life worth living? To them winter was almost annihilated. Life in all its varied experiences was as God ordered it. And death, when it came, would be great gain.

This is the last victory over winter. Across the Jordan is the Land of Promise. "Thy sun shall no more go down, neither shall thy moon withdraw itself; for the Lord God shall be thy everlasting Light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended."

HOW GOD PRESERVED THE NEW TESTAMENT.

BY THE VERY REV. R. PAYNE SMITH, D.D., DEAN OF CANTERBURY.—SECOND PAPER.

WE have seen in our last paper how God gradually led on the minds of Christians to the conviction that they had in the writings of Apostles and Evangelists Scriptures as authoritative as those of the Jews, and equally "able to make men wise unto salvation." It was concerning the Old Testament that St. Paul spake these words (2 Tim. iii. 15—17), but the Church of Christ soon became aware that the Gospels held for it the same position which the Pentateuch held for the earlier Church; while the Apostles were the inspired interpreters of doctrine, and stood in the same relation to the Gospels which the Prophets had held towards the Law. And just as no book might be admitted into the Old Testament which had not prophetic authority, so no book was received into the New Testament Canon unless it had an Apostle for its author, or rested upon Apostolic sanction.

There was this only difference—that whereas the Jews had recognised different degrees of inspiration, and placed such books as Proverbs, Job, Esther, Daniel, Chronicles, and even the Psalms, upon lower ground, the Church formed no theory of inspiration, but accepted all Apostolic books as authoritative. The question debated as to the reception of certain books simply was whether they were genuine, or books passing under a false name.

As their value was thus acknowledged, it became an object of desire both to churches and to the clergy and the faithful generally to possess copies of these writings. But copies were very expensive, and men were content with possessing a part. Some of the large manuscripts which remain to this day owe their preservation to their immense value, which caused them to be laid up for only occasional use; while what men generally could afford to purchase was a copy of one or more Gospels, or of the Acts, or of the Catholic (or "General") Epistles, or those of St. Paul. And of all these classes of manuscripts large numbers remain to this day, especially of the Gospels; while copies of the Apocalypse and of the Epistle to the Hebrews are comparatively rare.

These MSS. are divided into two classes, uncials and cursives. Uncials are so called because written in capital letters, often of large size, the word literally meaning the twelfth of an inch in length. For uncia, whence our word ounce (signifying the twelfth part of a pound), means the twelfth of anything whatsoever. But all MSS. written in capitals are called uncials, though sometimes the letters are delicately small; while occasionally they are more than the twelfth part of an inch in length. Cursives are MSS. written in running hand, and are much later in date than the uncials, the oldest cursive being of the ninth century, while the uncials date from the fourth century after Christ.

The writing in them is arranged in parallel columns, with no division between the letters, and no stops. Thus the beginning of St. John's Gospel would be as follows :—

ASTHEWORDANDTHE

NDTHEWORDWASGOD.

Each column contains perhaps forty of such lines, and two or three columns occupy a page. But sometimes they are written with a total disregard to economy of space. Thus the Codex Laudianus, in the Bodleian Library, containing the Acts of the Apostles, is written in two columns containing one word only in each line, that on the left hand of the page being the Greek, while the other column contains a Latin translation. This codex is of the sixth century, and was brought from the East by Theodore of Tarsus, who introduced the study of Greek into England, and became Archbishop of Canterbury in A.D. 666. This example may serve to show how great were the care and expense incurred in making copies of the Holy Scriptures, and naturally it is these costly copies which survive; while cheaper copies made for daily use were worn out and thrown aside. Yet the industry and the love for the Word of God manifested in modern times have recovered portions of many of them, a considerable number of the uncials being represented by only a few leaves recovered from the bindings, perhaps, of other volumes, or from collections of fragments in various libraries. And these odd leaves have been deemed worthy not merely of collation, but even of publication in full, in such magnificent works as Tischendorf's "Sacred Monuments."

These MSS. are called codices from their shape. A codex is strictly a block of wood, but the term was applied by the Romans to their pocket-books, formed of several thin slips of wood placed like leaves one over another, and so forming a square or oblong block. Long after the substitution of parchment or paper for the thin slips of box, or other hard material, on which the Romans scratched their writing, the wooden covers were retained, whence we speak of a book being bound in wood, though what is now used is thick paper, called cardboard because it took the place of the wooden boards originally employed. So, too, a part of a book is called a tome or a section, the words each signifying a cutting, and referring to a time when these codices were shaped with axe and saw; while a volume means a roll, such as was used for the Old Testament Scriptures. Such rolls were not in fashion for the New Testament, but the parchment or paper was folded, and made up into quires consisting of four, or five, or six sheets, which were then bound between solid covers of wood. When, through rough treatment or long use, these heavy covers were broken off, the outer leaves were especially in danger of being lost. And thus a large number of MSS. are defective either at the beginning or at the end, or both.

Of uncial MSS. there are about eighty, many, as I mentioned, being mere fragments; while of cursives there are more than sixteen hundred. To these we must add about four hundred Lectionaries—that is, copies of those portions of the New Testament which were read in the daily services of the Church. And while uncial writing began to give way to cursive about the ninth century for ordinary copies, these service-books continued to be written in capitals for a long period, probably because of the sacred purpose for which they were intended. As a general rule uncial MSS. date from the fourth to the tenth centuries, and cursives from the ninth to the sixteenth, when printing put an end to this costly method of multiplying books.

Now these numbers may strike the reader as large or small, according to his knowledge of the subject. Perhaps he may think two thousand a small number of copies of the New Testament for the use of the whole Church. But he will perhaps change his mind when he learns that the oldest complete MS. of Homer belongs to the thirteenth century, though there are papyrus fragments of his works as old as the sixth or even the fifth century. The oldest MSS. of such portions as remain of Æschylus and Sophocles belong to the tenth century, and of Euripides to the twelfth. Virgil is the only classic writer of whom there is a MS. as old as those of the New Testament—namely, the Medicean codex of the fourth century. As a matter of fact, there is no book in the world for which there is such vast and ancient authority as the New Testament. But this serves to sharpen the contrast with our own days, when the Bible is printed by millions, and a copy of the New Testament can be obtained for a penny.

Of the eighty uncial MSS., four are of primary value and antiquity. Of these, the first, the Codex Sinaiticus, was discovered by Tischendorf in the convent of St. Catherine, on Mount Sinai, in 1844 and 1859. It consists of about 346 leaves, and contains large portions of the Old Testament in the Greek version (the Septuagint), all the New Testament, the Epistle of Barnabas, and part of the Shepherd of Hermas. It was in 1844 that he found forty-three leaves of the Old Testament in a basket of fragments, and obtained them without difficulty. But when he revisited the convent in 1853 the monks had discovered the importance attached by him and all Europe to his discovery, and would not show him their treasures. Nothing daunted, he went again armed with letters and great powers from the Emperor of Russia, who is the head of the Greek Church, and was reluctantly allowed to carry the rest of the MS. away as a loan; but subsequently the monks thought it best to give it to the Emperor, and it is now in the Imperial Library at St. Petersburg. In the year 1862, in honour of the millennium of the Russian Empire, the Czar Alexander II. caused a facsimile edition to be printed, forming four massive volumes. Of the 300 copies issued, 200 were presented to Sovereigns and great public libraries throughout Europe, and 100 were granted as an honorarium to Dr. Tischendorf. These copies of course came into the market, and have enabled scholars to obtain for themselves this princely work.

Tischendorf has given good reasons for believing that this codex is one of the fifty copies of the Scriptures made at the command of the Emperor Constantine about A.D. 332 for the use of the churches in Constantinople, and that it was presented to the convent of St. Catherine by its founder, the Emperor Justinian. But though the priceless value of this codex is now admitted, its genuineness was at first sharply contested, and a Greek named Simonides even asserted that the MS. was his own handwriting. It was this Simonides who once offered some MSS. for sale at the Bodleian, and when after inspection he asked Dr. Bandinel his opinion of the age when they were written, received for answer, "The second half, sir, of the nineteenth century, and you will do well to leave Oxford immediately." About that time I carefully examined the forty-three leaves first brought over by Tischendorf, and then called the Codex Friderico-Augustanus, because it had been purchased by Frederick Augustus, King of Saxony. It is written upon the very choicest parchment, in four columns to a page, each containing about forty-eight lines, but is disfigured by numerous emendations made by later hands. The proofs of its antiquity were manifest, but I will only mention two. The first, that it was easy to distinguish between the outer and the inner sides of the skin. The inner side retains, even after the most careful preparation, more grease than the outside, and the ink therefore does not penetrate so deeply. Gradually, therefore, in the course of centuries, the writing on the inside becomes lighter than that on the outside. But when the MS. was written no such distinction was possible, and the sides come indiscriminately. The other proof was that on holding up the sheets to the light, a number of most minute pinholes might be seen in the lines of the writing, eaten by the acid contained in the ink, and of which no trace was discernible when the pages lay flat before you. These matters were proofs simply of extreme antiquity: the exact age is settled by the nature of the parchment, the style of writing, the shape of the letters, and other points well understood by experts. In editions of the Scripture the Sinaitic codex is known as Alph (α).

That known as A is the Codex Alexandrinus in the British Museum, and exhibited there in the manuscript-room. It is of the fifth century, and consists of 773 leaves, containing the whole of the Old Testament in the Septuagint Version, the New Testament except parts of the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. John and 2 Cor. iv. 13—xii. 6, and the Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians. It was given by Cyril Lucas, Patriarch of Constantinople, to King Charles I. in 1628, but is of Alexandrian origin, while the Sinaitic MS. is Constantinopolitan. The two thus give us the text current in the fourth and fifth centuries at two of the great centres of Christianity.

The next codex, B, is in the Vatican Library at Rome, and it is a matter of debate whether its authority is not greater than even that of the Sinaitic codex. Though not so complete, it is more carefully written, and on comparison it appears that the scribe who copied into it the New Testament is actually the same who wrote some pages in the Sinaitic, and especially the beginning of the Apocalypse. Evidently, therefore, they belong to the same period, but Dr. Tregelles considers that B is the older, and that it was copied a little before the Council of Nicea held in A.D. 325. It is written on delicately thin vellum, and is defective both at the beginning and end, most of Genesis being wanting, and all the New Testament after Heb. ix. 14. It also does not contain the Books of Maccabees.

Of the other uncials little need be said, but Codex C is interesting because it is what is called a palimpsest. The text in it of the Holy Scriptures written in the fifth century has actually been erased in order that the Syriac poems of St. Ephrem might be written in its stead. But though entirely obliterated for the time, yet gradually the iron in the ink begins to show itself in a red stain, and by infinite pains can be deciphered. The parchment of these noble uncials was very valuable, and possibly the writing had grown faint before this act of vandalism was committed. A happier fate befell the Vatican Codex, B, in which some careful scribe has inked again the fainter writing, omitting the many redundant letters. Among the uncials are several other palimpsests. This Codex C is at Paris, and is considered to contain a better text than our own A.

After the fifth century up to the tenth, uncials, though rare, are yet found in moderate number, many, however, being mere fragments or copies of some portion of the Scriptures. Thus, as we have seen, the Laudian MS. contains only the Acts, and Codex D, at Cambridge, the Gospels and Acts. But to illustrate the fortunes of these MSS., and the laborious search made for them in modern times, I may mention the Codex Coislinianus, of the sixth century, which consists of leaves found at Mount Athos in the bindings of other books. Rather more than thirty leaves have been discovered at various times, and are deposited, some at St. Petersburg, some at Moscow, some at Paris, and two found in a book in the library at Turin are treasured up there. Another MS., also of the sixth century, is called the Purple Codex, because written in letters of silver on exquisitely thin vellum dyed purple, with the names of God and Lord written in letters of gold. Of this MS. only fifty leaves are known to exist, of which two are in London, and the rest dispersed in Continental libraries. Finally, the Codex Rossanensis, also of the sixth century, is written in silver letters on purple vellum, with the beginnings of each Gospel in letters of gold. It was found in Calabria, and is adorned with curious water-colour drawings—most valuable as specimens of early Christian art. It consists of about 188 leaves, and contains only the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark.

In the middle of the ninth century cursive writing came into fashion, and being cheaper and easier, it soon took the place of the old uncial characters, except for lectionaries. Of cursives the number is very much larger than of uncials, and about thirty of them contain the whole of the New Testament. It is upon these cursives that the received text of the Greek Testament is founded, the uncials having been discovered since the days of Erasmus, the editor of the text which has received this honourable title.

In conclusion, we have seen that the Diocletian persecution was waged against the books of the Christians, and unless a large number of MSS. had been surrendered and destroyed, a violent schism would not have broken out in the Church as to the proper treatment of those who had given them up, nor would these men have been regarded as guilty of a sin as heinous as that of Judas, unless the Scriptures had been highly valued. But it is evident that the Donatists and the mass of churchmen had not given up their books, though probably those preserved were small and portable copies. In Codex B we have a MS. written immediately after those times; and from the middle of that century we have a succession of copies both of the Greek version of the Old Testament and of the books of the New, all alike bearing witness to the substantial accuracy of the present text. Naturally those which survive of the most ancient copies are MSS. of vast size, and written at great cost on the choicest vellum. And we have seen how God led the minds of believers to the appreciation of these treasures, and how the very efforts of enemies to destroy them ended in making men only value them the more.

A BOAT TO HEAVEN.

BY M. S. HAYCRAFT.

GR^{EAT} bunches of lilac and laburnum swaying over a rustic porch, the purple hills behind, and, before, a white road leading to craggy steps and rocks, and down to the gleaming silver sea. A haven of rest indeed—a place where many a jaded Londoner has come apart in summer-time, and drunk in peace and gladness from the beauty of fields and waves; but Mrs. Hurst is not at rest: she sits with folded hands at the lodging-house window, doing nothing, outwardly peaceful and at ease, but racked by heart-disquiet that refuses to be soothed by the calm ministry of nature. She is a widow—in that word the secret of her bitterness is told; she has known a happy married life—an existence like an idyll—for more than twenty years, but after a brief illness her husband was taken hence, and now he lies in the churchyard of the Kentish village that so long has been their home, close to the little mound where, years ago, they laid the child that looked on earth for one sweet year and passed away. Mrs. Hurst has comfortable means and excellent health; the lodging-house keeper, working hard from morning till night, is inclined sometimes to envy her lodger's easy circumstances and luxurious lot, while the poor lady at the parlour window never sees without a quivering sigh the meeting of husband and wife at the gate when the good man's work is done.

This evening Mrs. Kibbs had heard of lodgers for her second set of rooms, and she ran out excitedly, half-way down the road, to acquaint Kibbs with the news. Mrs. Hurst watches them together, and then looks out to sea with the sense of loneliness, the feeling of a life utterly blank and empty, that is her daily torment. The boys in the neighbouring church are singing sweetly of the "Sovereign Ruler of the Skies," as she gets up restlessly, and wanders down to the beach; but the mention of her Lord brings her no relief. She has hardened her heart against Him, for has He not taken her all, and left her for ever alone?

All the little world of Shingledown is on the distant pier, where a band is playing; happy couples are promenading, and merry children are enjoying a final game of ball upon the firm, tempting boards. This evening, too, there is a fête in the gardens, and most of the boatmen have patronised it; the beach, on which the moon is beginning to rise, seems to Mrs. Hurst deserted, and its solitude attracts her, for she is in that irritable state of mind in which the society of our fellow-creatures is almost unbearable. She is musing on her melancholy condition, without any near relations, without any home—for she has given up the old house, linked with so many tender associations—when she becomes conscious of voices near her, and impatiently prepares to depart. Then she realises that the intruders are only little children, hidden from her view behind a boat; but the chain of her thoughts is broken—she finds herself following their talk.

"It's all right, Linnie—the tide's going out; and, besides, I'm certain sure I can row. I'm nearly seven, and I often went out in the boat with him. And old Dan will never mind if his boat never comes back; God's sure to give him another boat instead, you know. I heard old Dan say once, God makes it up to folks who are good to little children. Come, Linnie, quick, or they'll try to keep us back—are you ready?"

"Yes, brudder, quite ready," another little voice makes reply; "just wait while I put my jacket round baby."

"Good-bye, dear Shingledown! good-bye, dear boats!" says the boy; "we loves you dearly, but we've got to go. We've got no home, and we've no dad and no mother, only in heaven.—Come, Linnie, you step in and hold baby tight, and I'll push you down the beach."

"And then," says the little one, joyously, "we'll sail away to heaven. Ah, baby! don't cry; we'll see dad and mother very soon. Old Dan said they're in heaven, you know. Brudder, are you sure you can find heaven?"

ragged, with yellow curls streaming beneath a tattered cap; within an old boat is seated a tiny lassie, with short floss-like hair, and a broad hat of broken straw. The little maid carries a young baby wrapped in an old jacket, and inclined to be tearful in the chill of twilight.

Their loneliness, their look of helpless innocence, stir strange, warm, yearning feelings in the desolate heart. Mrs. Hurst draws near, and lays her hand on the shoulder of the boy.

"My child, who are you who would fain float away

"Don't you see that silver light far away there?"

"Certain sure," says the little fellow stoutly; "don't you see that silver light far away there over the waves? That's where the angels are walking—that's where we've got to get! And, oh! Linnie, we shan't ever say then we've got no home again—you, and me, and baby—we'll all belong to somebody, for you know Jesus lives out there."

"Gentle Jesus," says Linnie softly. "How long will it take, dear brudder, before we get to Him?"

"Not long; oh, not long, Linnie; I'll pull so hard. Now, don't you be afraid. It's getting dark, but I'll pull for the silver light."

Mrs. Hurst has risen now, and the moonlight shows her the little group. She sees a boy, bare-foot and to heaven? It is further—oh, how much further off, dear boy! than you think."

"It's there," says the lad, pointing decisively to the white glory beyond; "and I'm Evan Lister; but, please, we can't stay. Please, lady, don't you stop us; it's so dreadful lonesome here."

Evan! the name thrills her like sweet music: her husband's name. And the boy is fair, as he was, and the curls of gold are much as her own lost boy gave promise of possessing.

She sits down beside Linnie in the boat, and questions the little ones till she learns that "mother and dad are in heaven;" and now they have no home. They have plenty of friends—all the people in Shingledown are their friends—but they belong to nobody, and they want to “sail away to heaven and belong to God.”

Mrs. Hurst takes the boy's cold hands in hers, and, as gently as she can, she tells him that the silver light is but the glimmer of the moon, and he, and Linnie, and baby can never reach to heaven save when God shall call.

“Never mind, dear brudder,” says little Linnie, “we can't sleep no more at old Dan's, 'cause his lodgers want all his rooms now; but we can lie here in Dan's boat, and, maybe, if we listen all night, and tell Him we're very lonesome, God will call!”

“You need not lie in the boat, little children,” says Mrs. Hurst, in a broken voice. “I will shelter you to-night. I, too, am very lonely—come home with me.”

They gaze at her wonderingly, uncertainly, and she finds herself pressing her invitation with an earnestness that seems to warm her own heart. She tells them of picture-papers, and Mrs. Kibbs' parrot, and warm bread and milk, and a cosy nest for baby; and presently they are all climbing the rocks together, she watching them as though these little homeless lives were treasure untold.

Mrs. Kibbs comes softly to her side, when, later on, she is sitting with tear-dewed eyes, watching little Evan asleep. It seems as though her baby were hers again, grown to boyhood—as though this brave little lad with her husband's name were in very truth her own property—God's gift of pity to her solitude.

“Everybody knows them,” says Mrs. Kibbs; “they're the boatmen's pets; but what's to become of them in the end often puzzles my heart. Their father and mother came here for their health, and rented a little cottage among the hills; I heard they had come down in the world, and were very poor. The mother went first, and then Captain Lister—they said he was a sea-faring man, and he was always fond of the water. First one took the little ones in, and then another; old Dan, the boatman, has sheltered them of late, but I expect in the end they'll have to go to the union, for they've nothing of their own, and Shingledown folks have nothing to spare out of the season.”

Early morning the widow's resolution is made: she holds little Evan's hands, and tells him of her loneliness, and offers to adopt him, and to call him her son.

The boy's face flushes. “I'd like to get some learning,” he says frankly, “but there's Linnie to think about. I am a boy. I've got to take care of Linnie. She's only a girl. I won't be 'dopted, thank you; I'd rather stick by Linnie.”

The widow hesitates awhile—can she make up her mind for two? Why, she would have to take another home, and actually arrange a nursery, and make all sorts of preparations for this new element in her life. How busy she will be! and only yesterday there seemed nothing left on this earth to do.

“Well, little Linnie,” she says, touching the lassie's sweet face, “I will make room for you, and you two shall grow up together.”

“No, lady, I can't; how could I leave my baby?”

The child turns to the infant with a clasp of passionate love, and the little fellow's satisfied cooing in her arms gives emphasis to her cry.

Motherly Mrs. Kibbs looks at her lodger with a smile; she guesses what is coming next.

Mrs. Hurst holds out her arms to the baby; those little, dimpled, mottled hands are strong enough to send a quiver of sweet memories through heart and soul.

“We will not part, little children,” she says; “my life has room for you all; come and be to me as my own, and teach me—for you know better than I do—the path to heaven.”

And the children gather round her, and hold up innocent lips, and for time and eternity her heart forgets evermore what it is to be lonely. And still to-day there are fair, loving lambs unsheltered, and still there are empty hearts and homes; it is for such I have told the tale.

THE ENDLESS LIFE.

LIFE, with all thy woe,
Thy pains and tears :
With all thy sad farewells
And lonesome years—
How dark his lot who builds
His hopes on thee,
Who seeks no life beyond
Death's cold, sad sea !

O Life of endless joy
On yonder shore,
Where sweetest pleasures reign
For evermore—
How happy he who looks Above to thee,
Who sees the light across Death's darksome sea !

Severed ye seem
To those who lose themselves
In earth's drear dream ;—
But—trusting in the love
Of God's dear Son—
We rest assured that both These lives are one.

By Jesu's precious death
On Calvary's tree
He linked the life that is
To that to be :
And those who follow Him
Through mortal strife
Have entered on the glad,
The “endless life.”

GROWTH UNDER PRESSURE.

"Cast down, but not destroyed."—2 COR. iv. 9.

BY THE REV. HUGH MACMILLAN, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E.

UB pondere cresco"—I grow under a weight—was the motto on the crest of John Spreull, of Glasgow, who for his defence of religious liberty in the times of Claverhouse was imprisoned on the Bass Rock, in the Frith of Forth. This is the great motto of the world. Nature is like a huge watch, whose movements are caused by the compression of the mainspring. Only by restraint is life possible. The forms of all living things, from the smallest moss to man himself, are determined by the extent and degree to which the force of life overcomes the dead forces of nature. The simple principle of growth under limitation will account for the shape of every leaf, and the formation of every organ of the human body; for the germination of a seed, and for the beating of the heart within the breast. In early May you have seen in the woods the curled top of a young fern just appearing above the ground, like the richly ornamented head of a bishop's crozier. That rolled-up shape is due to the fact that the central part of the young fern is growing while the ends are fixed. As the plant grows it becomes free, and uncurls. The same cause accounts for the convolutions of the human brain. Its form is due to the pressure arising from its increase under limitation. As it expands beneath the resisting dome of the bony skull, it is folded into these convolutions for want of space. The blossom of a plant is produced by growth under restraint. At the point farthest away from the root the vital forces are weakest, and the supply of nourishment almost exhausted; and therefore the ordinary leaves are compressed by their diminished power of resistance to the forces to which they are subjected, and modified into the strange shapes and changed into the beautiful colours of the flower. The compression goes on farther in the interior parts of the flower, according as the resisting power becomes less, until at last, in the innermost central part, the forces are brought to an equilibrium, and the plant finds rest in the round seed, which is simply the most complete compression of which the leaves are capable. The head of man is in the same way only a modification of the vertebral column, and his brain a compression of the spinal marrow, by the mechanical conditions under which they are developed.

Have you ever watched a bubble of air rising up from the bottom of a clear pond to the top? If so, you cannot fail to have noticed that it ascends not in a straight line, but in a corkscrew or spiral form. The force which draws it upwards to rejoin the native air from which it has been separated, would do so, if left to itself, by the shortest course; but it encounters continually the resistance of the denser element of the water, and this pressure delays its ascent through it, and makes it take a longer zig-zag path. If you understand the reason of this simple phenomenon, you will understand the way in which every herb and tree grows in the air, and why their shapes are what we see them to be. They all grow in the most varied and complicated spiral forms because they grow under resistance. This is the simple method of nature's working, the law which determines all her forms.

THE SPIRITUAL ANALOGY.

The same law obtains throughout the spiritual world. There, too, growth is under resistance. The law of the spirit, of life in Christ Jesus, contends against the law of sin and death; the law in the members wars against the law of the mind. The most essential character of spiritual life is that it depends upon the resistance or contest of one form of moral force by another: its tension is holiness, righteousness, self-control. We grow in grace as the trees grow in space—under limitations; and the various forms and degrees of spiritual life which men exhibit are due to the extent of these limitations. Spiritual life does not assume one stereotyped monotonous pattern. The Pharisees of religion have always endeavoured to cast it into one mould—to clip all the trees of the Lord into pollards. They have tried hard to make men think and feel and act alike, and to reduce the infinite variety of human life to the mechanical uniformity of a well-disciplined army. In this happily they have not succeeded. The individuality of men and the circumstances of life have been too strong for them; and human beings have developed in the spiritual as they have developed in the natural, according to the sum of the forces that have been brought to bear upon them.

There is the same infinite variety in the spiritual world that there is in the natural, arising from similar causes. As no two plants grow in precisely similar circumstances, so no two human beings are exposed to the same spiritual influences. Have you ever looked attentively at the leaf of a strawberry—which consists of three leaflets? If so, you have noticed that while the central one is nearly symmetrical, the two side ones are decidedly unsymmetrical, the upper half of each being smaller than the lower, as if it had been trimmed. Well, here are three leaflets placed as nearly as possible in the same circumstances, and yet they differ from one another in shape; and the difference of shape is owing to the fact that the conditions under which they are grown are in reality different—that their exposure to air and light, and the pressure exerted upon them by the adjacent parts, are different. And so in the human world: no two members of the same family, brought up in what we believe to be the same circumstances, and exposed to the same religious influences, exhibit the same form of religious life; showing that in reality not only is there a different original bent of nature, a different temperament to begin with, but also a real difference in the apparent identity of the conditions under which they grow.

If you look narrowly at a common pine-tree, which is the most symmetrical of all trees, which seems to be but a repetition of similar parts, you will notice that there is a considerable difference in shape between the lowest branches, which are the oldest, and the higher ones, which are the youngest. The branches at the top grow vertically round the leading shoot; the ones at the foot spread out horizontally around the trunk; and there are various modifications of the two modes of growth, according to the position of the branches in the tree from the bottom to the top. All these modifications of shape are owing to the different amounts of space and light in which the branches grow. And if the variety be so great in a tree that looks so regular and uniform as a pine or fir, need we wonder that in the same church, in the same congregation, nay, in the same family, where the conditions of spiritual growth seem precisely the same, the variety of its forms should nevertheless be so great? And thus by this simple law, in the spiritual world as in the natural—the law of growth under pressure—God has produced that wonderful variety of Christian character and experience which strikes us as much in the Kingdom of Heaven as in the field of nature, and which is one of the most powerful factors in human progress.

THE NECESSITY OF LIFE TO BEGIN WITH.

Of course there can be no growth without life. If the soul has no resisting power within, then the forces of the world without simply destroy it. If the soul is dead, all things deepen its death. But if it has spiritual life, then all things help to maintain and develop it. Like the sailing-boat that tacks to the wind, it takes advantage even of the contrary currents of life to reach its end. We may compare the soul that is dead and the soul that has spiritual life to two seeds, one infertile and the other fertile. The forces of nature play upon both seeds in the same way. In the case of the seed that has no life in it, these forces are unresisted; they have their own way, and they proceed to corrupt or break up the elements of which it is composed, until nothing of it remains. In the case of the seed that is possessed of life, the forces of nature are resisted, and this resistance becomes the source of living action, the very power of growth. The changes which the seed undergoes in germinating under the influence of those forces, duly controlled, form the basis of all the subsequent developments.

And like these two seeds are dead and living souls. If the soul is dead it yields helplessly to the corruption that is in the world through lust; if the soul is living, it resists these disintegrating forces of the world, and uses them to increase its spiritual life and to build up its spiritual structure.

It is only, therefore, of those who have spiritual life in themselves that it can be said, that though "cast down they are not destroyed." To such, justification is a living doctrine—not merely part of a formal creed, nor an intellectual abstraction. Their faith is alive, and can prove its vitality by its energy. It is the vital act of the Spirit by which the soul enters into real living union with Christ, and becomes partaker of His spiritual and eternal life. Faith is the conquering principle in common life as well as in religion; and Christian faith is only the daily faith by which we live, exercising itself upon the highest possible subjects. And the force of this life is remarkable. This faith can overcome the world. It can rise superior to all its temptations and trials. The force of natural life even in the lowest forms is extraordinary. The soft cellular mushroom has been known to lift up heavy masses of pavement by its expansion beneath them; the tender root of a tree insinuating itself in a crevice of the rock splits it up by its growth. The mechanical resistance yields when the vital force reaches a proportionate amount. And if life in its feeblest form can do such wonderful things, what may not be expected from spiritual and eternal life? The life that is in Christ Jesus by mere formality and profession, is like a dead branch that is merely mechanically united to the tree, and which, destitute of the tree's vital sap and force, yields inevitably to the forces of nature, decays, and drops off into dust and ashes. But the life that is in Him by faith is like a living branch that becomes partaker of the whole force of the tree, and grows with its growth, and flourishes with its strength and beauty. "Whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world." It grows strong by opposition; it flourishes in the most adverse circumstances; it uses all the conditions of life for its maintenance; it makes even its hindrances to advance its life-work. Let us believe in Christ, and we rise above the world; we shall have that heroic perseverance which refuses to own itself beaten. It may be overcome again and again, but it finally exhausts the force that is merely earthly and temporal. "We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed."

CAUSES THAT CAST DOWN THE LIFE.

What casts us down most of all is the burden of sin. In the unrenewed heart this burden is unfelt. We are unconscious of the enormous pressure of the atmosphere upon us, because our bodies are pervaded with air which counterbalances the superincumbent air. But were the air within us removed, the pressure of the air without would crush us. And so, being sinful ourselves, we are unconscious of the weight of sin. But when the love of sin is taken away, then sin becomes a burden which is too heavy for us. We feel ourselves like Christian in the "Pilgrim's Progress," with his huge bundle upon his back. This pressure of sin has drawn tears from eyes which would have looked unmoved upon the martyrs' fires. There is nothing on earth so terrible. It made Paul when he was converted grope for the light in fasting and darkness for three miserable days at Damascus; and at the close of his life it made him cry out, "Oh, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from this body of death?" What evil can we bewail that deserves a thought compared with sin? Bunyan, when he came to the knowledge of the truth, remarked that nothing amazed him so much as to see how men were affected with their temporal experiences and troubles. "These," he says, "have no power now to interest me; all my concern is absorbed in something infinitely more worthy—What must I do to be saved?" Sin is indeed the great adversity, the only thing that is truly hostile to us; and yet, in contending with it, we can use it as a fulcrum to remove the obstacles that lie in the soul's upward path.

But though this great adversity be taken away by faith in Christ, other evils are not taken away, for that would be to take away what determines the strength and shape of the spiritual life: that would leave it a weak and flaccid and powerless thing. The Christian is not exempt from ordinary troubles. In the world he has tribulation; and many are the afflictions of the righteous. In addition to the ordinary trials of all men, he has troubles of his own that are peculiar to the spiritual life. And these are felt most in proportion to the strength and vigour of the spiritual life; only that in his case what crushes others proves a means of growth, calls forth, exercises, and educates all the powers of his soul, and brings down the powers of the world to come to shape his character and conduct. Sometimes, indeed, the weight is too much. There are many of God's people who are so cast down by their circumstances that they seem almost destroyed. The burden of life is so heavy that it almost crushes them to the earth, and prevents their looking up. They are like a tuft of grass growing under a stone. The stone does not destroy the grass, nor prevent it from growing, for the vital force is stronger than the mechanical; but it dwarfs and distorts it; it blanches its colour, and it deforms its shape, so that in the mass of pale and twisted stems and leaves exposed to view when the stone is turned over, it would be difficult to see any resemblance to the graceful green tufts of grass growing freely in the meadow around. Thus many lives are prevented from being what they might otherwise have been by the crushing circumstances of life.

THE WEIGHT OF POVERTY.

Poverty often lies like a stone upon them. The sordid care for things that perish in the using seems to dwarf the immortal nature to the level of these things—seems to make the soaring spirit a part of the dull material world. The toil that is needed to support the body leaves little time or inclination for the cultivation of the soul. What roughens the hand and stiffens the back is not favourable for the refinements of life. The "Elegy in a Country Churchyard" is a pathetic lamentation of the waste of human energy caused by outward circumstances. Chill penury repressed the noble rage of those who slept unknown underneath those green mounds. But where there is a strong vital nature—when the soul is quickened by heavenly impulses, outward poverty, instead of repressing, only braces it. God can say regarding such a nature, "I know thy poverty (but thou art rich)." Its poverty is like the surface barrenness of the mine which is always in the bleakest and most desolate scenery, but contains beneath the fine gold or the precious diamond. Though poor in itself it can make many rich. It is when the plant is poorest in material, and most limited in force, that it produces the blossom and the fruit by which the world is adorned with beauty and the generations of living creatures are fed. And so the poverty of the Christian may blossom and fruit for others. How often has this been the case in the history of the world! It is to its poor men that the world owes most. It is the poor in the Church who have left behind the most noble examples and the most valuable legacies of Christian experience. Few of the world's greatest benefactors have had worldly advantages. The inventions and discoveries that have been of the greatest use to society have been made by persons who had little wealth. It is an axiom in nature that motion takes the direction of least resistance. Poverty, therefore, must be eminently helpful to the growth of the soul, inasmuch as it removes many of the hindrances which make it hard for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of Heaven. If the aspiration of the soul is heavenward, then a poor man encounters less opposition in that aspiration from his circumstances than one who is rich and increased with goods. He is relieved of that weight of worldliness—of those cares and anxieties which oppress the soul and give it an earthward tendency. Wealth means dependence upon others; gold is only the purchasable aid of other men. A rich man, therefore, is one who to the extent of his riches leans upon his fellow-creatures, and to that extent he is poor in himself. We do not say that a man is learned because he possesses an extensive library which he may never consult, but because his mind has been highly cultured and richly stored with knowledge. And so we cannot say, in the true sense, that a man is rich merely because he possesses great wealth, which enables him to make a claim upon the labour of others; but because he can help himself and provide for his own wants. Riches, in this sense, is a confession of weakness and poverty; poverty is true independence. The principle of self-help is the best element in the formation of the Christian character. It saves so much of the waste of life. What an amount of fever and hurry it would take out of life if persons were more anxious to develop the wealth that is in themselves than to accumulate riches which are only the aid of other men, and which, to the extent that we avail ourselves of it, weakens and impoverishes instead of strengthening and enriching us. It is not in what we have, but in what we can do without, and most of all in what we are, that we are truly rich. And limiting our own wants, we shall not only grow more freely in the Divine life, but we shall be more able to relieve the wants of others; and the Apostle's paradox will be fulfilled: "Though poor we shall be able to make many rich;" we shall be able to give personal service with love, which is far better than to purchase the service of others without love.

THE WEIGHT OF SORROW.

Sorrow is the commonest of all pressures that cast down the soul. This experience belongs to no class or condition of life exclusively. It is shared some time or other by all human beings in virtue of their humanity. "Man is born to trouble, as the sparks fly upward." It is the law of his being. Through suffering he enters into life, and in suffering he passes out of it. And in all the successive acts or states of his being the same law holds good. There is sorrow enough in life for all of us, however guarded may be our lot; and those who have the keenest sense of its higher aims and instincts find life saddest. Its pathos is inexpressible, and increases as the years go on. So much of its suffering seems needless. We can conceive of men being perfected without suffering, like the angels; and often, when we are passing through some sore experience, we have been tempted to feel as if the sorrow were overdone, as if God could have effected His purpose at less cost. It is the great mystery of Providence that there should be such a prodigality of pain—how God can permit such forms of anguish. But the greatness of our sorrow is owing to the greatness of our nature. The highest mountains cast the largest shadows; and so the dark, wide shadows of human experience witness to the original loftiness of our being. Sorrow gives a tragic touch to the meanest personality. It lifts him out of the petty incidents and surroundings of daily life into a higher world, confronts him directly with the thoughts of God, and inspires him with a sense of the sacredness of his being and the grandeur of his destiny. God has ordered that sorrow should be the most powerful factor in the education of our race. "Ought not Christ to have suffered these things and to enter into His glory?" That was the law of Christ's life, and it is the law of ours. That Christ, though holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners, should nevertheless be the Man of Sorrows, makes sorrow holy, and connects it with heaven as the Father's discipline, the training of a blessed and glorious life. In the histories of the patriarchs and saints we see how suffering, deep and long-continued, ministered to a noble development. We see the baser earthy element in them crystallised into the purity and transparency of heaven through the fires of pain and sorrow. And we see the mysterious process completed in Him who Himself was made perfect through suffering, and entered into His glory—not the glory which belonged to Him in virtue of His essential Godhead, but a glory far more significant to us—the glory which grew out of all that He willingly suffered, in order that through the fellowship of His sufferings He might present us faultless before the presence of His glory with exceeding joy. Why should a living man complain, when his true life transcends all the limitations of its circumstances, when he has God and a future which is more glorious than an archangel's destiny? Why should a living man complain, when the sufferings of his earthly life are the very means by which he is redeemed from its evils? God separates between the person and his sin; and the part of him which cleaves to the sin must suffer, in order that the higher part of him may be severed from the taint and the stain of sin; and hence the goodness and severity of God are reconciled in one blessed harmony of love. If the ordeal of sorrow brings to light the noblest traits of a man's character—unflinching faith, self-denying patience, pitying tenderness—then what matters the anguish of the moment, what matters even the halting all his days, as one sore wounded in the battle of life? If our trouble, instead of shutting us up in it, and making us morbidly exaggerate it, until we become peevish and selfish, expands and opens like the frost of winter the soil of our hearts, and makes it ready to receive the seeds of charity, and we become more tender and sympathetic towards our suffering neighbour at our side, then sorrow becomes to us indeed an inverse aid to progress.

INTERNAL AND INVISIBLE WEIGHTS.

The crest of John Spreull was a palm-tree, with two weights hanging on each side of it from its fronds, and yet maintaining, in spite of this heavy down-dragging force, its upright position, carrying its graceful crown of foliage up into the serene air. The weights in the case of this sufferer for righteousness' sake were visible. His cross of imprisonment and martyrdom was apparent to everyone. And very many of the weights that press down the Christian life are equally visible and palpable. But as the palm-tree is pressed on every side by the viewless air, as it is exposed to the resistance of forces which the eye cannot see nor the hand feel, so the heaviest weights which drag down the Christian life are often invisible. Its crosses cannot be displayed. No stranger can intermeddle with its sorrows. Many of its troubles are of a spiritual nature. It is cast down, not by circumstances, but by the state of the soul. It is in the inward man—"the hidden man of the heart"—that it suffers. And these spiritual sorrows are the evidences of the reality of the work of grace; for where there is the principle of life there must be the changes of life. The form of godliness is a dead, invariable thing; whereas the power of godliness has its winter, its summer, and its autumn states. Sorrow arises in the case of most believers from inability to realise the ideal, to reach the mark of attainment they have set themselves. They mistake the degree of their experience for the ground of their hope, and thus, their confidence varying with their frames and feelings, they are frequently cast down. They have sorrow because of the remembrance of past sins and shortcomings; they have sorrow because of the consciousness of a thousand deficiencies and infirmities within them, a consciousness which becomes more susceptible the more they grow in grace and see of the infinite excellence of the Saviour. They have sorrow because of the sins of the world. All this is the godly sorrow that worketh repentance unto life. In this winter state the spiritual life is collecting and concentrating itself for renewed effort when the spring of revival is come. It waits upon the Lord, and so renews its strength; upon Him who has revealed His tender and patient love in the life and cross of His Son. And so the very peace of God Himself flowing into the soul, which holds patient fellowship with Him, hushes its restlessness, and fills it with quiet energy and resolute faith.

No life can grow or support itself in the void by its spontaneous buoyancy. All life upholds itself in the air by continuous effort. The humblest life is a vortex of unceasing forces. The various substances of a growing plant are in a state of constant change owing to the destructive action of the air, and the constructive action of the light; and the condition of each part at all seasons of the year and under different circumstances depends upon and expresses the temporary or more permanent equilibrium between these two opposing forces. Much more is this the case in regard to the highest life of the soul, the life that is breathed into us by God's Spirit and formed by faith in Christ Jesus. It has ever to do an uphill work. It has to grov against the gravitation of sin. It has to exert itself against the weariness of the flesh and the heaviness of the soul. It has to push up like Sisyphus the stone of endeavour to the top of the hill, notwithstanding that it rolls down again and again.

STRENGTH AND BEAUTY DEVELOPED BY PRESSURE.

But this resistance is meant to bring out all that is best in us, to stimulate our most strenuous exertions, to cultivate our patience, to educate our faith and hope, to mould us after the Divine pattern. It is the weight of the architrave upon the pillar that gives it stability and endurance; and it is the fightings without and the fears within that give strength to the character and perseverance to the life. What a beauty and grace does the spiritual life take from the pressure of the light afflictions that are but for a moment and that work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory! The capital of the Corinthian pillar, the loveliest of all the styles of architecture, derived its origin from a basket of offerings placed upon a child's grave, and covered with a tile to protect it from the birds. The basket stood upon the root of an acanthus, a species of thistle, and the plant grew and spread its leaves around it in the most graceful manner, thus suggesting to a passing artist the form of the Corinthian capital. And so the pressure of earth's troubles causes the spiritual life to develop around them its fairest forms; and thus it is crowned with its appropriate capital. The thorny sorrow that springs from the grave of some dead love or hope forms the richest adornment of life. Not only is the outward form of the Christian life moulded into shapes of moral beauty—into whatsoever things are pure, and honest, and lovely, and of good report—but its inner substance is also made more lovely by the pressure of external shocks and internal sufferings. It is not the tree that grows in rich soil and in a sheltered situation that produces the richly grained wood which is selected to adorn our finest furniture; but the tree that is exposed in its bleak, shelterless situation to every storm of heaven. The wild forces that beat upon it, and which it successfully overcomes, develop in it the beautiful veins and markings which are so highly prized by man. And so it is not when growing up in luxurious ease and comfort that we produce the gifts and graces which enrich and ennoble the Christian life. The natures that have the richest variety and the greatest interest are ever those which have grown under pressure of suffering, and by a vital faith have overcome the world.

THE EXAMPLE OF THE APOSTLE PAUL.

The Apostle Paul is an illustrious example of the law in question. His growth in grace was indeed under pressure of the most trying outward circumstances, and yet what a marvellous fulness and variety of form did it display! No man was more many-sided in his Christian attainments; no man realised more of the length and breadth and height and depth of the love that passeth knowledge, or exhibited to the world more of the fulness of God with which he was filled. Whether we look at his deep insight into the mystery of the Gospel, or his catholic conception of the application of Christian faith to all the acts and relations of life, we feel that he could not have developed this wide human sympathy and spiritual culture had he not touched human life at so many points, had he not passed through the most sharply contrasted conditions, and gathered from each some fresh fitness for his great work. Like his Master, though in a lower sense, he was in all points tempted like as we are, that not only his own nature might be perfected, but also that he might be qualified for the solace and strength of the whole world. Let us be followers of him as he was a follower of the Lord Jesus, and learn, as he did, that the things that seem against us are in reality working together for our good. So long as we are rooted in the Divine love—so long as we are abiding in Christ—our spiritual life, maintained continuously from its infinite Source, will grow and overcome the forces that are opposed to it. For not only is He that is with us greater than all that can be against us, but the life that is kindled in us is the mightiest power in the universe; and though cast down at times by the adverse circumstances of the world, cannot be destroyed, but rises victorious over them all, and uses them for its growth in grace. We are not at the mercy of the thousand contingencies of life. The troubles that come to us are not accidents. Divine Wisdom is shaping all our ends. Our life is hid with Christ in Him who is better than all His gifts—Who continues while all things else fail. And trusting in Him and walking in His ways, the character we thus build up will control and use the occasions and opportunities of life, whether they come in the shape of duties or trials; and the form and direction of our life will be Christlike and heavenward!

PEARLS OF CHRISTIAN SONG.

BY THE REV. R. SHINDLER, AUTHOR OF "HYMNS WITH A HISTORY," ETC.

I.—ON THE INCARNATION.

THE era of Christianity began with song. The angelic host which "sang creation's story" came to "proclaim Messiah's birth." When Zacharias's tongue was loosed, his first utterance was a song of the coming Redeemer. When the first lines of the glorious mystery of the Incarnation were read out to Mary, the Virgin mother, she responded in a song magnifying the Lord and her Saviour-Son. Old Simeon, too, when "Fondly in his withered arms

He clasped the Holy Child," celebrated Him as God's Salvation, the sight of whom consummated all his wishes for time and eternity. It was meet that all who "looked for redemption in Israel" should greet Him with their songs:—"Lo, this is our God; we have waited for Him, and He will save us. This is the Lord, we have waited for Him; we will be glad and rejoice in His salvation." Every morning is ushered in with song; and in like manner the arising of the Sun of Righteousness was the signal for an outburst of joy from all in earth and heaven, whose hearts were attuned to the praises of Redeeming Love. Whatever differences of opinion there have been, or may be still, as to the precise year, or month, or day of the Saviour's Advent, the fact has ever awoken the sweetest strains of harmony, and the loudest notes of praise, from the whole "sacramental host of God's elect." It was the same inspiration that swelled the heart of the "Father of English Hymn-writers," Dr. Watts, then quite a young man, at Southampton, as he sang—

"Joy to the world! the Lord is come!
Let earth receive her King;

Let every heart prepare Him room,
And heaven and nature sing."

The challenge of his godly father to produce "something better" than the dull strains then in use in the sanctuary stirred his devotion, kindled his enthusiasm, and inspired his muse, and henceforth "the glories of the Lamb" became his favourite theme. For many years the whole town of Southampton drank from "Watts's Well," the site of which is still traceable near the Above-Bar Congregational Church; and, in like manner, countless thousands in succeeding generations in both hemispheres have taken their key-note of Advent song from the strains of the aspiring but unambitious poet, whose name has resounded everywhere; while from the dock near the old house in French Street, where he penned many of his hymns, multitudes have gone forth to many lands to carry the tidings of salvation, and summon the "whole creation" to "Join in one,

To praise the sacred Name
Of Him who sits upon the throne,
And to adore the Lamb."

The introduction of singing in public worship in what is called the Western Church has been ascribed to Ambrose of Milan. He was born in A.D. 340, the youngest of three children, became a lawyer, rose to great distinction at the bar, and was appointed consular-prefect of Liguria, his native State. He won great celebrity for the justice and wisdom of his decisions. In A.D. 374 there was great strife in Milan concerning the appointment of a bishop. The Arian and orthodox parties were near coming to blows. Ambrose stood up in the assembly as the advocate of order and peace. It is stated that a child in the assembly cried out, "Ambrosius Episcopus!" Straightway the multitude took up the cry, and Ambrose was appointed Bishop of Milan.

The Te Deum has commonly been ascribed to Ambrose, "gushing from his lips," one tradition says, "as he baptised Augustine;" while another runs that "both hearts were kindled with sacred fire at the same moment, and they sang together in responses."

One of the twelve hymns ascribed to Ambrose is on the Incarnation:—

"Come, Redeemer of the nations, Woman-born, yet Highest Lord;

and Redemption—a fault which marks certain phases of modern theology. The result of this, as seen in hymnology, was Mariolatry of the grossest form.

It is a long stride down to the time of Martin Luther, and the interval was a time in which there was much darkness, few faithful soldiers of Christ, and few, very few outbursts of sacred song. The singing

LUTHER WRITING FOR HIS SON.

Ever, by all generations,
Be Thy wondrous Name adored!"

Clear statement of the doctrine of the Incarnation marks these hymns, the Deity and humanity of the Christ, in opposition to the Arian and such-like heresies, being distinctly set forth. The earlier Eastern hymns on this and other themes partake more of metaphor and legendary ideas.

Some of the hymns of these earlier dates give even greater prominence to the doctrines relating to the Incarnation than to those relating to the Atonement was done by the priests, in a language which few of the people understood, and this part of worship was to them a performance only. The Reformation changed all this. The people were reached by the preaching; they embraced the doctrine of salvation through faith, and hymns of penitence and faith, of joy and gladness, burst from many a heart. The Incarnation found and held its true place, as it has done ever since.

Luther prepared his hymns not so much for princes and learned men as for the people; but they were welcomed and sung by all. He wrote on the Incarnation—

"Saviour of the heathen, known As the Virgin's promised Son," etc.

"Now praise we Christ, the Holy One,
The spotless Virgin Mary's Son," etc.

He wrote one, too, for his little son Hans—

"From heaven above to earth I come,
To bear good news to every home;
Glad tidings of great joy I bring,
Whereof I now will say and sing," etc.

A noble Advent hymn was written by George Weissel, pastor at Königsberg, where he died, 1635. It is founded on Psalm xxiv.—

"Lift up your heads, ye mighty gates,
Behold, the King of Glory waits;
The King of Kings is drawing near,
The Saviour of the world is here.
Life and salvation doth He bring,
Wherefore rejoice and gladly sing."

"Christians, awake! salute the happy morn Whereon the Saviour of mankind was born," is a hymn which has received too little attention. Its author, John Byrom, M.A., F.R.S. (1691—1763), was a man of mark. His marriage with a cousin displeased his wealthy relations, and he was in great straits. First he studied for a surgeon, and then he abandoned that course to teach a new and superior system of shorthand. He was an acceptable and fertile writer, a religious and honourable man. After a time he succeeded to the family estates. His religious writings were tinged with mysticism.

"As, with gladness, men of old," was written by Mr. William Chatterton Dix. It is a fine hymn, with a good beginning a bet'er ending, and a happy and steady progression throughout.

Of Paul Gerhardt, what could be expected when he touched this sacred theme? Only something of the very best; and that we have in his—

"All my heart this night rejoices,
As I hear, far and near,
Sweetest angel voices:
'Christ is born!' their choirs are singing,
Till the air, everywhere,
Now with joy is ringing."

Charles Wesley's

"Hark! the herald angels sing," is one of the finest of our English hymns on the Incarnation, only the attempt of his brother John to mend it by substituting—

"Hark! the herald angels sing,
'Glory to the new-born King!'" for

"Hark! how all the welkin rings,
'Glory to the King of Kings!'" has seriously marred it. The old Saxon word for the "vault of heaven" is a very expressive, though little used, word. In the hymn as amended there is some confusion of sentiment. "Glory to God in the Highest" belongs to the Son as well as to the Father, but the angelic song praises the Giver rather than the Gift.

"Come, thou long-expected Jesus," is another familiar pearl of Incarnation song.

Dr. Doddridge's

"Hark, the glad sound! the Saviour comes,"

is another.

Samuel Medley was not a poet, but he has left some few good hymns.

"Mortals, awake! with angels join,
And chant the solemn lay,"

will always hold its ground among Advent hymns.

When he was a midshipman, he received a severe wound in a hand-fought action. Invalided home, he was staying with his grandfather, when, one Sunday evening, the old man read aloud a sermon of Dr. Watts'. It was blessed to the young man's conversion. He left the sea, became a schoolmaster, and afterwards a very successful minister. He founded the church in Liverpool over which the late Hugh Stowell Brown presided.

Montgomery's

"Angels, from the realms of glory," is a rich pearl. His appeal to all to "come and worship"—to "worship Christ, the new-born King," is very telling.

Good John Newton's

"Sweeter sounds than music knows Charm me in Immanuel's Name," deserves to live still, though it may not be quite in harmony with modern taste. But taste is not always right, and the tree should be moved to the wall—not the wall to the tree. The first Advent brings the second—

"Oh, that we Were more prepared to welcome Thee!"

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME

THE CAPTIVITY AND RESTORATION OF JUDAH.

NO. 5. THE BURNED BOOK.

To read—Jeremiah xxvi.

THE BOOK WRITTEN. (1—4.)

The fall of the great city Jerusalem soon coming. Jehoiaxim, the king, by his wickedness calling down God's judgment. Jeremiah, the prophet, warning and rebuking the people—has been preaching in the streets, but now told to write his warnings. Why?

(a) To give another chance to Judah to repent.

(b) That the warnings might be read to the king.

(c) To preserve them for our instruction.

Jeremiah takes roll, i.e. sheets of prepared skins, afterwards rolled together, and dictates to Baruch the scribe. What did the roll contain? God's message of punishment, God's message of forgiveness.

So Jeremiah, like David, would "sing of mercy and judgment." (Ps. ci. 1.)

II. THE BOOK READ. (5—25.)

(1) To the people. Jeremiah, unable to go himself, sends Baruch. Must choose a fast-day, when crowds would be gathered at Jerusalem—people's minds would be more softened. How anxious Jeremiah is that people should turn to God! At last day comes—ninth month of fifth year of king's reign. Public fast proclaimed—people from all country round assembled in the Temple. Baruch goes to a room in the house of Shaphan, another scribe—overlooking the large court of the Temple—goes out on the balcony and reads aloud the book.

(2) To the Princes. Shaphan's grandson been listening—much interested—runs off with the news to where a number of princes are sitting—tells them all about it. They send message to Baruch to come and read it to them. What do they do?

(a) Listen attentively.

(b) Inquire all about its being written.

(c) Go and tell the king.

(d) Take great care of the roll.

(3) To the King. Can picture the king sitting in his study—the princes coming in and telling the news—Jehudi, a messenger, sent to fetch the book itself—a few columns read—king takes a knife—cuts the roll across—flings it into the open hearth—three princes entreat him to spare it (verse 25), the skins crackle—burn till all are destroyed.

God's words treated with contempt—yet none are afraid.

III. THE BOOK RE-WITTEN. (26—32.) Notice the king's conduct.

(a) Destroys the roll—cannot destroy God's word.

(b) Threatens the scribe and prophet—God protects them.

(c) Despises the prophecy—brings down more judgment.

So another book is written. More words, more judgment. Notice the king's punishment.

(a) No heir to succeed him.

(b) Dishonoured death—without burial.

(c) Nation fearfully punished.

LESSON. They that despise Me shall be lightly esteemed.

NO. 6. JEREMIAH IMPRISONED.

To read—Jeremiah xxvii.

I. A NEW KING. (1—10.) Last king dead—prophet's warning had come true—new king, Zedekiah, the last king of Judah. Will he be any better than the others?

(a) He did not hearken himself.

(b) He did not bring his people back to God.

(c) Yet he sent to the prophet to pray for them.

This part of prophet's duty. Thus—

Abraham prayed for Abimelech. (Gen. xx. 7.)

Moses for Pharaoh. (Ex. viii. 8.)

Samuel for Saul. (1 Sam. xii. 23.)

Now the Chaldeans besiege Jerusalem—the end is drawing near. But meanwhile a respite. Pharaoh's army come out of Egypt to help Jews. But God had warned them not to trust to Egypt. (Isa. xxxi. 1.) Now repeats warnings.

(a) Pharaoh's army will depart.

(b) Chaldeans will return and take Jerusalem.

(c) Even if Jews did gain victory it would not avail.

II. A NEW PERSECUTION. (11—15.) Turn now to Jeremiah the prophet.

Had been going in and out among the people—warning, rebuking, praying. Now prepares to leave Jerusalem. Proposes to go to Benjamin—where his house is at Anathoth (i. 1)—to obtain supplies. Is taken prisoner as passes gate of Benjamin—accused of being deserter to the enemy—indignantly repudiates the idea—but is arrested—taken to the princes—put in prison.

No unusual experience. Other prophets been persecuted.

Jezebel slew the prophets. (1 Kings xviii. 13.)

Ahab imprisoned Micaiah. (1 Kings xxii. 27.)

But suffered patiently. (James v. 10.)

LESSON. Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake.

III. A NEW MISSION. (16—21.) Jeremiah safe in dungeon—probably in inner one ("cabins" or cells) like St. Paul and Silas (Acts xvi. 24) at Philippi. Now sent for by the king, after being long time in prison. What does the king want? A true message from God. Had heard flattering things from lying prophets (verse 19) as Ahab did when wanted to go to war (1 Kings xxii. 22), but knew that Jeremiah would speak the truth. So he does. Gives same message as before—he shall fall before Babylon. Also pleads for himself.

What has he done wrong against king or people?

Where are the false prophets?

To return to his present dungeon is to kill him.

The king relents—removes him to better quarters—arranges for his food.

Notice Jeremiah's conduct throughout.

1. Is faithful to his trust.

2. Is bold before the king.

3. Is patient under persecution.

4. Is kept safe by God's providence.

LESSON. Who is he that will harm you if ye be followers of that which is good?

NO. 7. JERUSALEM TAKEN.

To read—Jeremiah lii.

I. FATE OF THE KING. (1—11.) This chapter kind of summary of previous—gives account of last king, last siege, last days of Temple. This king Zedekiah, uncle of previous one (Jehoiachin or Coniah), had beautiful name, meaning the "Lord our righteousness," but did evil in the eyes of the Lord. What were his special sins?

1. Did not listen to God's voice by Jeremiah. (2 Chron. xxxvi. 12.)

2. Broke his solemn oath to Nebuchadnezzar. (2 Chron. xxxvi. 13.)

Now comes the siege of Jerusalem, with all its attendant horrors.

(a) Jerusalem surrounded by invading army.

So it was in Hezekiah's day, but angel of Lord smote them. (2 Kings xviii. 35.)

(b) Forts built against the city to shoot out burning arrows, etc.

But God could have prevented their doing harm as before. (2 Kings xviii. 32.)

(c) Sore famine in the city.

But God could have provided as at siege of Samaria. (2 Kings vii. 1.)

(d) The city taken, and army routed.

(e) King taken prisoner to Babylon.

(f) King's sons slain before his eyes.

(g) King's eyes put out, as prophesied by Ezekiel. (Ezek. xii. 13.) What does all this teach?

1. The wages of sin is death. (Rom. vi. 23.)

2. The certainty of God's judgments.

II. FATE OF THE CITY. (12—30.) Siege lasted eighteen months. Read in Lamentations of Jeremiah full account of horrors; e.g.—

(a) Noble women searching for offal. (Lam. iv. 5.)

(b) Children devoured by parents for food. (iv. 10.)

Now read of destruction of beautiful city. (Psalm xlviii. 2.)

(a) Walls all broken down.

(b) All houses burned with fire.

(c) The Temple itself destroyed.

What became of the people?

One-third died of pestilence. (Ezek. v. 12.)

One-third killed by the sword.

One-third taken captive to Babylon in the three different captivities (28—30).

A few poor people left to till the ground.

III. THE KING IN BABYLON. (31—34.) A new King of Babylon—finds Jewish king a prisoner—has been thirty-seven years in prison. What does he do to him?

(a) Pities and speaks kindly to him.

(b) Takes him out of prison.

(c) Gives him proper clothes.

(d) Exalts him above all vassal kings.

Some have seen in this a type of Christ, who for man's sin became lowest, was put in prison, suffered, and died. Then exalted at God's right hand for ever.

SPECIAL LESSON FOR CHRISTMAS DAY.

To read—St. Matthew i. 18—25.

ALL over the world this day kept by Christians as Christ's birthday. Every few years comes on Sunday, first day of week. What was the first thing created by God? Christ called the Light of the World—came to give light—i.e. knowledge of God. (St. John xvii. 3.) Have probably often had lessons on Christ's birth. Story well known. May be summed up as follows:—

I. EVENTS OF CHILDHOOD.

(a) The annunciation to the Virgin by angel Gabriel.

(b) Caesar's decree sends Joseph and Mary to own city Bethlehem.

(c) Christ born in stable at Bethlehem.

(d) Circumcised when eight days old.

(e) Persecuted by Herod from jealousy.

(f) Visit of the wise men from the East.

(g) Presentation in the Temple at age of forty days.

(h) Visit to the Temple when twelve years old.

(i) Lives at Nazareth subject to parents.

Nothing more known of Christ's infancy and childhood, but can learn much from these events.

II. CHRIST'S TITLES.

(a) Jesus—given at His circumcision (St. Luke ii. 21), meaning "The Lord my Saviour"—describes His personal work to seek and save the lost.

(b) Christ—His title of office—means "Anointed." Was anointed with Holy Ghost at Baptism as Prophet, Priest, King.

(c) Emmanuel—"God with us"—describes His taking flesh and dwelling with us (St. John i. 14) to show us the Father.

III. CHRIST'S LIFE AS A CHILD.

(a) Dedication. Circumcised, when eight days old, to keep Jewish law and be enrolled among God's children. Presented in the Temple (St. Luke ii. 22) as holy to the Lord, being Mary's first-born son.

(b) Subjection. Lived till thirty at Nazareth subject to His parents. (St. Luke ii. 51.)

(c) Persecution by Herod's orders causing flight into Egypt—earnest of future sufferings for us men and our salvation.

(d) Diligence in learning God's will and increasing in knowledge. (St. Luke ii. 47.)

IV. LESSONS. Christ came to be—

1. Our Example—"the Holy Child Jesus."

2. Our Saviour—"He shall save His people from their sins."

3. Our Friend—"I call you not servants, but friends." Our duty to Him—believe in Him, fear Him, love Him, serve Him.

"Two girls in quaint Dutch costume, with their spinning-wheels before them."—p. 114.

THE SPINNERS: A REVERIE.

BY THE LADY LAURA HAMPTON, AUTHOR OF "NEW PARABLES FROM NATURE," ETC.

"Thy pierced Hand guides the mysterious wheel."—H. BEECHER STOWE.

TAKE care of yourself, Amy."—"I do hope you will not be very dull."—"It seems a shame to leave you all alone"—and then there was a sound of wheels on the gravel, a waving of hands and handkerchiefs, the merry voices died away in the distance, and I, a solitary figure, was left standing on the doorstep, to amuse myself as best I could for the rest of the bright summer afternoon.

How hot it was! I did not envy them their long drive to the ruined Abbey as I entered the cool, old-fashioned oak-panelled saloon, and, ensconcing myself in the deep window-seat, prepared to give myself up to my correspondents, the pile of whose unanswered letters had assumed alarming proportions during my week's holiday. The best intentions, however, are seldom thoroughly carried into practice, and after an hour or more of struggle to reduce the arrears of debt, I gave myself up to the, to me, unusual luxury of reverie and idleness.

I think only those who inhabit the crowded places of the earth fully appreciate the beauty and quiet of the country; a stillness instinct with life to the ears that hear, a loveliness ever varying yet ever pleasing to the eyes that see. Then how different a country "home" to a London "house"; one we almost unconsciously acknowledge in the terms we employ in speaking of them! Is it that the sounds of the outside world in the one are ever reminding of the battle of life, of the struggle for existence going on within a few feet of our hearth, of the deadly warfare between the world, the flesh, and the devil, which is being waged with such unequal vehemence on every side of us, do they cause this sense of bustle and unrest to penetrate even the walls of our dwelling, and rob home of its charms; or is it the loneliness of being one in a crowd, of being only No. — to your next-door neighbour, which makes one always feel more or less a stranger in the city—a sojourner of a day!

On the other hand, whence comes that indescribable sense of repose and satisfaction which pervades the country home? Even the noise of distant wheels and voices blend with, and do not mar, the song of the birds, the hum of bees, the rustling of leaves, and the thousand-and-one sounds which form "the music of the spheres," and seem to absorb the individual life into one grand whole. Is the solution only to be found in the oft-quoted poet's words, "God made the country, and man made the town," or does the answer lie deeper within ourselves?

"Ah, me! one might as well ask how it is that the silken thread of life is given to one to spin, the tangled flaxen skein to another," I mused, as my eye fell on a picture which hung on the sunlit wall opposite to where I lay, representing two girls in quaint Dutch costume, with their spinning-wheels before them, the elder, thread in hand, gazing earnestly at the other, who, with sad, pensive face, was smoothing out the flax on the distaff. What was their history? What words of counsel or reproof were being spoken? Had the painter left no message for the future, no thought of encouragement for the toilers of another age, hidden beneath the touches of his brush? Long since has the wheel ceased to revolve for them, long since has the thread been spun, the distaff empty, and yet who knows but that their children's children still reap the reward of their labours in well-filled lavender-scented presses, the pride of the good housewife's heart! Ah! are these the lessons the artist would leave with us—work given, work accomplished?

How often we talk of the wheel of fortune, of fate, as if it were something apart from ourselves, over which we had no control; and yet is it so? Are not circumstances, accidents, events foreseen and unforeseen, all part of the hank of flax God has given us to spin into the silver cord of life? We may, if we will, take our feet off the treadle and give up in despair, and life becomes empty and meaningless; we may cease to oil the wheels, and the thread is rough and uneven; we may jerk and pull at the tangle till the work is twisted and soiled; and yet, through it all, do not half our troubles proceed from forgetting that we are not asked to make the flax, but simply to spin from it the best thread we can? I wonder is this why in the picture the painter has made all the light to come from above? We cannot alter events, but we can make them subservient to our use. God does not bid us to alter the circumstances of our lives, but to serve Him in them. He does not require grapes from thorns nor figs from thistles; the coarse and the smooth, the fine and the rough strands are alike from Him, and when the skein is spun, the shuttle full, will be found woven by Him into their prepared place in the web of human life.

Work accomplished! Yes, our own; but are there not two spinners in the picture? and would not the painter remind us by this that, though each thread is separately spun, they are to be interwoven as well? Should we be so intent upon our own wheel, that we cannot spare time to encourage and lend a helping hand to another whose hank may be less easy to spin than ours? Should we not also be the more heedful to do our best, for fear of spoiling the effect of our neighbour's work when brought into contact with the weakness and imperfections of our own? Should we not strive to keep the wheel going merrily, lest our oft-repeated halts and silences should dispirit the learners and toilers around?

As to how all these tasks are to be fulfilled, surely our picture gives us another hint; for do we not see in the background the preparation for daily bread? and whatever our station in life, be our habitation in town or country, be our lot joyous or sad, hard-working or the reverse, it is only in the strength of God-given food that we can live, and move, and have our being. Yet, spiritually, how apt we are to forget this. We wonder at the clogged wheels, when the oil of prayer has never been used, or at the most only at haphazard, without any special application to the particular obstacle in the way. Our feet grow weary of the treadle, our heads confused with the ceaseless whirr, our hearts faint with endless toil, and yet the Sacred Food offered for the strengthening and refreshing of our souls is neglected or refused, as we strive unaided to bear the burden and heat of the day. Gazing only on our work and its difficulties, we sit with our back to the light, and do not see the food and the flowers and the sunshine God sends to cheer us on our way; or if, perchance, we do catch a slanting gleam, we shut our eyes and refuse to rejoice, forgetting that all that makes our life bright and beautiful and joyous is as much God-appointed, as trials and sorrows are God-permitted, and that through and in each and all, He is ever revealing to us His Name of Love.

The shadows are lengthening fast; the old picture looms indistinct in the twilight; for a moment a ray of light falls full on the painter's name, and, as the sound of approaching wheels is heard, rising to greet my friends, I murmur to myself the poet's words—

"While he marvels at his fancy, reading
Meaning in that quaint and ancient scroll,
Little guessing that the loving painter
Left a message for his weary soul."

NOT ALL IN VAIN.

CHAPTER IV.

MARY OWENS.

"Ah! why to that which needs it not,
Methought, should costly things be given?
How much is wasted, wrecked, forgot
On this side heaven!"
JEAN INGELOW.

THE east wind had departed, and in its stead the rain came pouring down—pouring in a steady, business-like way, pattering alike on roof and pavement, busy street and garden shrub. It came in soft splashes against the curtained windows of Mary Owens' pretty drawing-room, where the shutters were closed, and a bright fire cheerily blazed and sparkled.

It was a pretty room, luxuriously appointed, yet with a stamp of originality all its own, and an appropriateness in its every smallest detail. Here was no crude jumbling of styles, or of ill-assorted colours. Nothing to offend the most fastidious taste. The walls were of a pale sea-green, and showed up a few good water-colours to the best advantage; the curtains and hangings of tawny orange shot with gold. The vases were filled with delicate hot-house flowers. Everything in the room spoke of quaint originality in its owner, as well as of affluence and good taste. It was a room such as only about one woman in every thousand knows how to create.

By the soft rose-coloured light of a shaded lamp on a small table in the centre of the room Mary Owens sat working. She was rather pretending to work than doing anything very real with the gay tags and brilliant silks in her hands.

She was a decidedly plain-looking girl, this wealthy Mary Owens; and yet, for all its homeliness, her face had a certain pleasant attractiveness of its own. It was a kindly soul which looked out through her brown eyes, and the freshness and simplicity of her speech and manner made her many friends. The only pretty thing she possessed was her hair—curly, soft, luxuriant, and of that dusky golden shade which the old painters loved. Her eyes were brown, but not that liquid, tender brown which should have gone with hair like hers; her nose of no particular shape, and her mouth decidedly wide. It and the small square chin together bespoke a fair amount of strength of will and decision of character. She was under the medium height, her figure slight and rather graceful, and she was always dressed perfectly, with the same exquisite sense of suitability to season, place, and position which distinguished the appointments of her dainty house.

It was a detached villa at West Kensington, of red brick, and many-gabled, standing in its own ground, and this evening, as she sat in her cosy drawing-room, toying with her work, she could hear the rain falling ceaselessly on the shrubs outside.

From time to time she paused in her occupation to listen intently. But yet there was nothing to hear but the ceaseless splashing of the rain outside, or the loud purring of a wee black kitten basking in the heat before the fire within. It was not likely anyone who need not, would venture out on such a night as this; and she went on sorting out fresh silks from the work-basket beside her.

The latch of the garden gate was sharply lifted, and a quick, firm step echoed along the gravel walk between the shrubs. A sudden colour came up in the heiress's pale face, and her eyes brightened.

A few moments later Stephen Wray entered the room.

"All alone, Mary?" he said cheerily, as he crossed the room to where she sat: looking as fresh and handsome as ever, and in her mind the comeliest sight that ever gladdened mortal eyes. Not in the first quick flush of greeting did she perceive an unwonted cloud upon the eager, almost boyish face.

"You bad fellow!" she said, as she gave him her hand. "You came back to town on Monday, I heard from Annette, and this is Friday. And you have not come once to see me in all that time."

"I was in a very bad temper, Mary. My room was preferable to my company," he said, seating himself by the fire.

"You do not often treat me with such consideration," she replied, laughing.

"No," said Stephen, turning his head to look at her as she sat somewhat behind him. "I usually come and bore you to death with my worries. But it is your own fault, you are always so patient and sympathetic."

"And the present worry, Stephen—what is it?"

"Something I can't tell you," said the young man, rather awkwardly. "I have given up to my father so often, that he looks upon me now as a mere slave, to do his bidding without question. It is preposterous. I am not going to obey him in his last mandate, and, accordingly, he is irate."

Mary looked at him wistfully. His fair head was thrown haughtily back, while his brows were drawn together in anger and perplexity. He remained silent, and she did not question him farther. Only such confidence as he bestowed upon her voluntarily did she seek or care to have.

After a time he roused himself, giving himself a little shake, as though casting off some unpleasant burden.

"I am very surly," he said, "to come here to visit you with an attack of the sulks upon me. You can't think how good it is here in this quiet room with you, what a boon it is to get away from the Thirty Years' War at home! I get soothed here directly. At home we know no peace, no quietness. Every man's hand is against his brother, and a man's foes are those of his own household. As a family, I think, we Wrays are noisy. We are always in a state of clamour about one thing or another. Here, if I have anything to say, I can say it; if I want to sit silent I can do so. You are a regular trump, Mary! You know how to make a fellow comfortable."

Mary's lips parted in a radiant, tender smile. It was a pity he did not see it, so wonderfully did it transfigure her face. Stephen's infrequent words of praise were the jewels which adorned her life, every briefest one of them treasured in her heart.

"It is so jolly, just you and I together here," he said affectionately, as she handed him his tea. "Can't people let us alone? I want no change—no Mrs. Heatherington, and no great swarm of your admirers."

Mrs. Heatherington was a lady who for a consideration—a large one, too—had until recently fulfilled the double duties of companion and chaperon to the heiress. She had, not long since, bestowed herself, her telling eyes and graceful figure, upon a returned West Indian of mature age and comfortable means. Mary was seemingly in no hurry to fill her vacant place.

"Stephen, don't," Mary said, with a slight frown. "They don't admire me—not one of them. And I hate to be reminded of them."

"I don't see why they shouldn't admire you, Mary," he said stoutly. "I think you are very nice-looking, and you are always very nicely dressed; and when a man gets to know you well—you are rather icy at first—you have a heart worth its weight in gold."

"Yes," she replied, a little bitterly. "And I am worth my own weight in gold, too. That is all any of them see in me. No, Stephen; money has poisoned my life. It hangs like a millstone round my neck. At school even, do you suppose I used not to see how cleverer girls, better girls, were put aside for me, and snubbed on my account, because I was Miss Owens the heiress? Do you think I did not understand that my playing was applauded, my paintings rapturously admired, the slightest remark I made was listened to with deference by mistress, governesses, and pupils alike, just because I was Miss Owens the heiress? And now I misdoubt all love, all kindness, all affection shown me. I distrust and despise humanity. Money has poisoned happiness for me."

"Truly, money is a dreadful nuisance," observed Stephen thoughtfully. "Could his sire but have overheard the misguided young man, how the scant hairs time had left him had risen up in condemnation!"

"Other girls can be happy," Mary went on, roused strangely from her wonted calm. "They can believe in the reality of friendship and affection. They can know that their own worth is what they are weighed by. But I—since my childhood bowed down before and worshipped as an embodiment of the golden image, in whose affection can I believe?"

"In mine, I hope, Mary." He spoke quietly, yet with a great pity for her deep down in his heart. He had not known she felt like this.

"Yes, in yours, Stephen," she answered, the bitterness suddenly dying out of face and voice—"I believe you at least are true. Thank God for that! And I believe also in Mr. Davenant: I believe he loves me as his own child. As for you, you are like a dear brother."

"And as a brother I hope you will always look upon me, Mary. It would be all the same to me if you had not a farthing. I hope always to be your friend."

Mary Owens was a remarkably clear-sighted young woman. She knew as well as if she had seen it written in letters of fire upon the sky, that Stephen Wray's affection for her was simply the deep and passionless love of a brother.

They had known each other from childhood, had grown up together, had shared each other's joys and sorrows, and she had come to be a part of his life—while, alas! for Mary, he was the whole of hers. She knew he did not love her. She made to herself no illusions, as say the French. She used often to sit and think how some day Stephen would meet some woman to whom all his heart would go out at once and for ever—for he possessed the simple fidelity of a dog—and his eyes would soften and his lips uncurve, and all his face be glorified with radiant love. And she would love him in return. Who could help loving Stephen? And they would be supremely happy. And at this juncture in the day-dream—I am sorry to be obliged to say it, for it seems weak-minded—a suspicious little mist would rise up in Mary Owens' eyes, and a little choking sensation in her throat—for this poor little image of gold had a heart of flesh and blood. And to crave for love is a God-given instinct, after all.

"I am talking nonsense, Stephen," she said, presently, a little ashamed of her outburst of feeling. Then, with her eager interest in all that concerned him in anywise, "What did you do while you were away?"

"On Friday and Saturday I did my business at Bullionston. And I spent the Sunday at Flashford-on-Sea."

"Poor Stephen! how dull you must have been."

"Not at all. I went to morning service in such a dirty, miserable, wretched old edifice as I could not have believed existed in England. It was hundreds of years old, I think, and a great pity that Cromwell spared it when he was clearing out the churches. But judging by its present appearance, I should say it had been used as a barn in his time. There was an old, old sexton, and an old, old parson; but the funniest thing of all was that the old parson affectionately invited me home to dinner. He said something about 'angels unawares,' which, I am sure, was very polite of him."

"And did you go?" asked Mary, laughing.

"I did. And the parsonage matched the church in antiquity, though not in dirt and ugliness: the quaintest old rambling house you ever saw, all wainscoted in oak, and with tapestry hangings. And Dr. Romney has a brother who preserves in his own person the fashions we may now see in old pictures. Imagine an old gentleman, Mary, with powdered hair, and gotten up regardless of expense, in numerous different-coloured waistcoats. And you really should see the diamond buckles on his shoes. I should like to know if they are genuine."

"And these two old gentlemen live together?"

"Yes. Mrs. Romney is dead. Master Drury is her brother. They live apart, he told me, 'the world forgetting, by the world forgot.'"

"Poor old things!"

"Reserve your pity, Mary. They had a right good dinner. And splendid plate and glass."

"You sordid creature! And is there no one else with them?"

"Dr. Romney has a daughter." Why should Stephen look so awkward?

"Ah!" said Mary, using that wretched, mean little word that may mean either volumes or nothing at all. "What is she like? Is she antiquated, like everything else there?"

"She is very young—about twenty, I should say."

"And pretty?"

"Pretty is such an idiotic word. Everyone has a different idea of prettiness."

"But do you think her pretty?"

"No. I think her face is more what one calls lovely. She is like a picture."

A cold little fear thrust itself suddenly into Mary Owens' loving warm heart. Young, lovely, like a picture—and Stephen had the air of being for the moment a subject of the Grand Inquisition.

"Like a picture is rather a wide range, Stephen," she persists. "Is she like the picture of Jael slaying Sisera, for instance?"

Stephen laughed.

"What an inveterate little tease you are, Mary!" he said. "No; she is more like an Elaine."

"Long golden hair, blue eyes, hawthorn bloom?"

"Not a scrap like. Hilda Romney"—how easily the name came to his lips—"has brown hair, or rather, hair of no particular colour, and grey eyes—not a shade of blue in them—and a pale complexion. A golden, healthy pallor, you know—not the paleness of delicacy, which I, for one, do not admire."

Mary asked no more questions, but bent her head somewhat closer to her work, sorting her silks.

"The poor girl!" Stephen remarked, presently; "I did pity her, living there shut up with those two old men. She must have a lonely time of it."

Mary's was a lonely life too, for all its gilding. She wondered, rebelliously, if he had ever thought it worth his while to pity her.

"I suppose I shall never see her again," he said reflectively, staring into the fire.

"I suppose not," Mary answered.

"And yet, why not? Why should I not go again to Flashford?" His tone was half-vexed.

"Why not?" Mary returned, in the same mechanical voice.

At this moment a ring at the hall door came to their ears.

"Mary," said Stephen hurriedly, "you must replace Mrs. Heatherington. You are too much alone. And when visitors come, it is not quite the thing."

"I am old enough to take care of myself."

"Nonsense! When I'm by, it's all right. But I dare say this visitor is that Whyte. And I do not like it."

Mary's face brightened. She liked to hear him take this masterful tone with her.

"You come when I am alone," she said.

"Oh, if you place my visits and his on the same level, I am vastly obliged to you," began Stephen haughtily.

Mary laughed outright now. This pretence at jealousy was to her keen pleasure. The visitor entering out short their discussion. It was the Rev. Hawthorne Whyte, and Stephen made a grimace as he shook hands deferentially with Miss Owens. The young man's dead-white complexion and shining black hair looked more funereal than ever this evening. He seated himself nervously on the extreme edge of a chair, rather put out at finding Stephen Wray in possession of the field. It certainly did look as if he and the heiress were engaged, he reflected.

Hawthorne Whyte was a well-meaning youth, but vacant-minded. His was one of those feebly illumined natures that take always their tone from the surroundings of the moment. He had taken orders as the easiest profession to slip into, rather than from any inward preference for a clerical life. He had adopted a few catch-phrases, the meaning of which he did not always stop to consider, and by interlarding his conversation, more or less happily, with these, believed he had "done all that might become a" clergyman. Furthermore, he intensely hated all who walked not in his ways, nor spake the words he spake. He looked upon Miss Owens as in a condition of ignorance absolutely lamentable. Perhaps that was his reason for coming so often to call upon her. In his eyes, of course, the money she possessed was "dross."

Upon what plea he had presented himself this evening did not at first appear, so disconcerted did he seem by Stephen Wray's presence. His dark eyes travelled furtively from the young man's inscrutable face to the calm tranquillity of Mary Owens'. Mary offered him tea, but he stammered, and declined it on the plea that he was "fasting." Mary's thoughts flashed back to the old Book, which says such exercises were to be done in secret, and not to be seen of men—Stephen stroked his fair moustache meditatively, and thought how dreadfully disimproved Whyte had become since the days when they were at college together.

Mr. Whyte had come to ask Mary to sing at a concert which he was getting up in aid of a charity. But Mary shook her head, and declined.

"I never sing in public," she said.

"I have heard of your doing so for Mr. Davenent," he said, not over-politely.

"Once or twice, in the wards of his House of Rest," said Miss Owens—"a few ballads or hymns for a small gathering of old men and women. That is very different from singing at your concert."

"Mr. Davenent is a favoured person," said Mr. Whyte, with a feeble smile.

"I would do much for him," Mary answered simply. "But truly, Mr. Whyte, you overrate my powers. I may say I do not sing at all. I have hardly any voice."

"It is true I have never had the pleasure of hearing you sing," he returned gravely; "but one has only to look in your face to see that you possess all Heaven's best gifts of harmony."

Stephen stooped suddenly and picked up the little black kitten to his knee, playing with it industriously.

Mary laughed gently, but did not seek to answer the charge thus brought against her.

Presently the young men rose simultaneously to their feet, and said good-night. As Mr. Whyte went down-stairs, Stephen ran back to the drawing-room.

"What shall I do to this fellow for you, Mary?" he asked—"smother him, choke him, throw him into the Thames—"

"Oh, nothing," replied Mary, laughing. "He means no harm. He is quite inoffensive."

"Don't tell me he means no harm after that compliment about Heaven's best gifts of harmony!"

He has been a month composing that remark, and came here this evening for the express purpose of making it. I am afraid I was considerably in the way."

Long after they had gone, Mary Owens sat musing by the fire, with the black pussy Stephen had caressed in her lap. "Young, lovely, like a picture," he had said of this strange girl he had met—this Hilda Romney. Instinct told her Stephen had met his fate. She had often smiled at his shallow flirtations, his transient admiration of this girl or the other; but this she dimly felt was more serious. He had looked both awkward and embarrassed while speaking of her. By the soreness of her own heart now, Mary discovered that, all unawares, she had been cherishing some vague, faint hope that in the future years Stephen's heart might have turned to her.

There is no one to care if she stays dreaming here all night. Her father sits alone all the evening in the dining-room, dozing over his wine, until his servant rouses him and leads him off to bed.

"I shall go to see Mr. Davenent to-morrow," she resolves at last. "That is my only refuge when I feel wicked."

CHAPTER V.

FROM WEST TO EAST.

"Jesus said unto him, Follow Me; and he left all, rose up, and followed Him."—GOSPEL OF ST. LUKE.

HE had been young when he made his choice. At the threshold of life two ways had lain before him: one led to earthly distinction, and perhaps to fame and high honour. He had chosen the other. He had turned away his eyes from beholding vanity; had chosen to fast that others might feast; to weep and mourn that others might rejoice and sing; had counted gain but hurt and loss; had learned to forsake himself, and, taking his life in his hand, he had gone forth to spend it amidst sounds and sights of infamy and woe, for the love of Jesus Christ.

Such was William Davenent, now with close upon sixty years to his account, over thirty of which had been passed amidst the squalor and misery of East London. He was a small, spare man, slightly stooped, with a clean-shaven, keen face, thin and worn, a few scant locks of greyish-brown, and light blue eyes whose hardness was redeemed by the tender smile that came upon his face at intervals: a smile the sick knew and the little children loved, yet a very rare smile. Ordinarily his face wore an unmoved calm, that gave one the impression of great mental strength and fixed resolve. He was a man whose intense reality impressed all those with whom he came in contact. You felt you might safely stake your life upon his truthfulness.

As a young man at Oxford he had not been without distinction, and those who knew him best had looked for great things in the future from an intellect so incisive and clear, balanced with a mind so logical and calm. He had shone in intellectual society, and the great books that burn like lamps along the centuries were familiar lore to him.

But there had come a change. Across his visions of earthly laurels and the praises of his fellow-men, there had sounded a cry which pierced to the innermost fibre of the young man's heart—the despairing, desolate cry of the poor, the sick, the sinful, the sorrowing. He sickened at his heart when he read or heard of the woe on God's fair earth, where the sun shines alike on just and unjust. When he thought of human beings, his fellow-men, his brethren, daily, like Issachar of old, “crouching down between two burdens”—sickness and poverty—he longed to help them; and pain of pity for the desolate ones, sinking by their thousands in swamps of overwhelming sin, rent his heart. The great phalanx of unanswerable problems, as to why such things be, confronted him. Why should he live in ease, and these die in misery? Who was sufficient for these things?

Could he help them—he, one man amongst these terrible thousands?

At first he gave his time and his intellect to the question. He inquired into the truth of statistics and estimates of crime, and wrote magazine articles, and even pamphlets, on the remedy for the disease. He was termed a Utopian, a Don Quixote—nay, even a Socialist. And then at last, hopeless of other aid, he gave himself, body, soul, and spirit, to be a living sacrifice upon this altar. From the day of his decision his heart had not flinched, but had been perfect before the Lord. He was lost to fame and honour, to the invigorating friction of congenial minds, to all pleasant sights and sounds of the happy outside world; and the grime and dreadfulness and misery of East London engulfed him henceforth.

Thirty long years had gone over his head since the day of his ordination, and still he was labouring in the burden and heat of the day, toilfully gathering out a few stones from the Lord's highway, and a few briars from His path.

He had one friend still of his former rank, and that friend's carriage was now at the door of the mean house in the narrow street where he lodged.

“Is Mr. Davenant at home?” Miss Owens asked of the old woman who answered the door and attended to Mr. Davenant's simple needs.

“No, ma'am,” replied the dame, well used to Mary's appearance. “He's below to the chapel.”

Mary walked on briskly to the next street. Half-way along its length stood the small mission-chapel, with doors always open. Mary had built this chapel for her old friend, when her mother's money had come under her own control—not from love of the mission, but out of love and respect for Mr. Davenant, her dear and honoured godfather, who had all her life been as well her closest, wisest friend. As far as his mission went, she simply thought it a pity, and likewise very disagreeable, that there should be such a number of dirty people in the world. It was certainly sad they should be sick and hungry as well as dirty, but they were not interesting. She gave freely of her money to them, partly to please Mr. Davenant, partly because it was uncomfortable to reflect that in the same city with her own well-fed, well-clad self people should be daily dying of hunger and cold. But to touch one of these repulsive beings with so much as the tip of the finger of one well-gloved hand she would have loathed. She could not understand how a gentleman, well-bred and refined, could voluntarily elect to pass all his life in daily, hourly contact with such wretched creatures as these.

The little mission-chapel was lit but by the last cold glimmer of the short, fast-fading March day, when Mary seated herself quietly just within the door. Away at the farther end she could make out the old pastor standing on the chancel steps. Around him, some on seats, some on the floor, was crouched a small group of listeners—girls from seven to twelve years of age—squalid, hungry-eyed, old-looking, for the most part, except some few who by profession were fairies at the neighbouring theatre. These were better clad, and not so starved-looking as the rest. Some of the girls held in their lank arms thin miserable babies, who occasionally wailed, and were hushed to quietness again. These he had gathered in for a few moments' quiet teaching about the children's Jesus and the children's Home. He might not keep them long, lest the rehearsal at the theatre might call away some, and hard blows and shrill words greet others on reaching home. But simply, that the youngest there need not lose her way for lack of understanding him, the eternal doctrine of the love of Christ fell from the old man's lips.

He was telling them about Jairus' daughter—a little maid like them. And tears of wonder and delight stole down some of the elder girls' hollow cheeks when he told them of that happy heaven, to which, if they loved and served Jesus now, He would bring them hereafter, where nothing might hurt them—where they would never be hungry, or cold, or beaten, or even scolded any more. And there would be no more curses, or misery, or drunkenness. This last, how great a boon none knew better than some of the sore little hearts and bruised bodies listening to him. Then the childish voices rose in a simple hymn he had taught them, and one by one they stole gently from the church.

Mr. Davenant knelt, some minutes after they had gone, in silence on the chancel steps, then rose and came towards Mary. His keen eyes had noted her entrance.

“So, my child, you have found your way to see me?” and he clasped her hand affectionately, as they passed out into the street together.

“Yes,” Mary replied brightly. “I was feeling rather wicked, and when that fit takes me I like to come to see you. It does me good, too, to see how much more miserable people there are in the world than me.”

“You miserable! Don't, Mary dear. Sorrow is real enough, without any of us going out of our way to look for it for ourselves.”

“As you were speaking to those children, the idea suddenly occurred to me that I might just as well have been born one of them as myself—I might have been ragged, and hungry, and wretched, like them.”

“Just as well,” the old man replied gently. “And just because you were not born to their wretchedness, their degradation, their ignorance, do you not think you are all the more responsible to Almighty God! Think of the difference there will be between you and them on the Day of Account."

Mary was silenced, and a little awed.

"I have brought you a few violets for that poor

"Very well; I'll go," she said reluctantly.

He turned to the right, away from the direction in which his own house lay, and guided her through a labyrinth of narrow, unlovely streets—a district known to few outsiders but the policeman. Rough, however, old blind Scotchman of whom you were telling me," she said presently, as they walked on.

"'They 'mind me of the spring,' he said."—p. 121.

"Come and see him, and give them to him yourself, dear," said the old clergyman, stopping short.

"Oh no!" cried Miss Owens, shrinking a little.

"I don't like dirty old men. Besides, what could I say to him?"

"Jameson is not dirty. And a kindness you do yourself is a double kindness."

as were the denizens of the place, none offered any affront to Mary and her escort. To be sure, the bent figure of the old man, in his plain, worn black garb, was well known to most of them, going daily in and out amongst them, and from some of the women he won a vapid smile and a whispered blessing as he passed. But most of them, even the children at play in the gutters, suspended their operations to stare at the young lady in her dainty grey costume and costly furs. Mary had a vague remembrance of the parable of Dives and Lazarus, and an uncomfortable sensation of being on the wrong side of the gulf as she passed through the narrow streets and courts amidst these hard-faced men, and ragged women, and children woefully dirty and neglected.

Mr. Davenent pushed aside the heavy swing-door of a big, old, gloomy house. Mary followed him as best she could along a dark and narrow passage, and up long flights of broken stairs. At the farther end of a landing, lit from above by a dirty skylight, he tapped at a door, and a broad Scotch accent bade them enter.

It seemed to Mary, when she and Mr. Davenent entered the room, it surely could not have held another human being, so small it was—a box of a room, faintly illumined by a dormer window, but spotlessly neat and clean.

"I have brought a young lady, a great friend of mine, to pay you a visit, Jameson," said the old clergyman to the occupant of the room, a feeble old cripple, who turned sightless eyes towards them as they entered.

Mary went forward, and placed her little offering of violets in the old man's hand. He smelt them gratefully, smiling at her in thanks for her gift.

"I thought you would like these. They smell so sweet," she said, feeling more stupid and tongue-tied than she had ever done in a fashionable drawing-room.

The old man fondled the flowers with his stiff rheumatic fingers.

"Yes. They 'mind me of the spring," he said.

Mr. Davenent meanwhile, perfectly at home, produced a broken mug from a cupboard behind the door, which, filling it with water, he placed within the blind man's reach.

"I canna ask the ledly to be seated," he said apologetically, turning his face, with the wondrous instinct of the blind, to where Mr. Davenent stood. "T is a puir place, ledly, and there's but the chair I sit in."

"I do not want to sit down, thank you," said Mary graciously. "I am sorry to find you suffering so much, Mr. Jameson."

Mr. Davenent smiled wistfully as her words and accent fell on his ear—kind, courteous, gracious, but spoken as from an immeasurable height above the poor man she addressed.

"The pain is bad at times, ledly," replied the poor man. "But a bit longer now, and 't will pass."

"Were you always blind?" she asked, compassionately.

"No, ledly. In my time I've seen the sun rise, and the blue sky above the bonny Clyde water. I sit and think of just how it looked, now when all is dark. But the darkness will pass too, ledly; 't is but for a time."

Mary felt a sort of sudden compunction as he spoke. This lonely life, so patiently borne, smote her heart with the pains of contrition, as if somehow or another she were to blame for it.

"Shall I sing you something?" she asked timidly, wondering if violets and songs were not stones rather than bread to this poor shivering wretch in his drear attic.

The old man listened ecstatically to her low, sweet voice, keeping time with head and hand, all the wild love of music awakening once more in his impressionable Celtic nature.

"My soul longs to be free,
And angels beckon me
To the Land o' the Leal," she finished with. There was silence in the room for a while.

"Ah! 'tis so, 'tis so!" murmured the old man, with his white head bowed upon his breast, and tears rolling down his withered cheeks. "The pain, and the sorrow, and the darkness will be a' gone and done with in the Land o' the Leal."

"I shall come to see you again if I may," said Mary ere she went away, a good deal surprised to find herself making this promise.

"Do you know he had no fire in that miserable little den?" Mary asked indignantly, when they had left the house, and she looked at Mr. Davenent as though he were guilty of some monstrous cruelty.

"I know it," he answered, with a heavy sigh. "The winter has been exceptionally sharp and cold, and very long. My coal funds are at ebb, and I have cases of far sorer need than his."

"Could you not ask me if you wanted money?" Mary asked reproachfully. There was something not unlike tears in her brown eyes as she marched along, her head very erect. "When I touched that old man's hand, I assure you the cold of it went to my heart."

"And do you not think that the wretchedness of these, their cold, their hunger, their unending misery, has not been going to my heart all these thirty years, Mary? God knows it has."

"I do not want to blame you, but I think when I have money, more than I know what to do with, and am willing to give it whenever you ask for it, that you should ask me. Now, you must promise me at once that Jameson has a fire every day until the cold weather is over; and he must have a rug under his feet, and woollen gloves for his poor hands."

"And if I get him all these things," said Mr. Davenent, smiling, "what will the rest of my poor say? They, too, will want carpets and gloves, and then where shall I be?"

"Then I shall get him these things myself. And take them to him. Poor old man! what a wretched, miserable life! And with nothing to look forward to but heaven."

"Yes," the old pastor answered, lifting up his face with such a tender, happy smile, "Nothing to look forward to but heaven."

The words were the same, but they sounded very differently from his lips and from hers.

CHAPTER VI.

SUMMER HOLIDAYS.

All loved thee; I, a dweller in the towns,
Used to coarse faces, common souls and worn—
How could I choose but own thee sweetest, best?"

WESTWOOD.

SUMMER once more, in all its jovial gladness, its prodigality of fresh, gay colours, and of sounds and scents delicious. The winter past, the rain over and gone, the flowers appeared on the earth, and the time of singing of birds had come.

June, the queen month of roses, had gone, but her wealth of fragrant treasures still adorned the green-swards of July. The old Parsonage garden at Biffey never looked more beautiful than now, with its wealth of flowers standing up bravely in the July sunshine; the grass, green and close-cropped, making a vivid setting for the well-filled flower-beds, roses, scarlet geraniums, gaudy sunflowers, and assertive hollyhocks, making up one delicious compound of colour, scent, and beauty.

Hilda Romney looked on it all, this July morning, with eyes that loved every blade of grass, every smallest tuft of flower—in this dear old garden, where she had passed so many tranquil, happy hours. Her book lay open, face downwards, on the seat beside her, and her work-basket stood near. But she was neither working nor reading. It was too lovely a day to do aught but sit and dream amongst the flowers.

The garden gate opened, and the dapper little housemaid appeared, bearing a card on a salver.

"The gentleman is in the drawing-room, miss," she said, and disappeared.

Hilda's face grew rosy as she read the name upon the card. He had not, then, forgotten—he had come back. With light, swift steps she left the garden, and followed the housemaid's retreating form. She did not take the path through the lawn under the drawing-room windows, but turned aside behind the hedge of laurestinus to the yard wicket-gate. The yard was square, with a stone trough and fountain in the middle, and a device and Latin inscription wrought with white stones in the centre of the pavement. The sooty-coloured Dorkings and fluffy goslings raised a clamour at her appearance, which in their limited minds was associated with something good to eat. The pigeons, preening themselves about the fountain, turned their glossy heads, and peered with round, bright eyes at her as she passed towards the house. But she heeded none of them, not even the round-headed puppy that came gamboling to meet her from one of the out-offices. She ran on swiftly to her own room, girl-like, to see if her hair were in order and her collar straight. Meanwhile Stephen Wray, down-stairs in the drawing-room, was having a "very bad quarter of an hour."

The inspiration which had seemed such a happy one when first it occurred to his mind did not appear quite so plausible now that he had carried it into action. A very superficial knowledge of British law told him that bigamy is a felony within these islands. Once the husband of Hilda Romney, his father nor the world could compel him to wed Mary Owens. Thus much was clear. The one-day-seen Hilda had lingered in his thoughts like a beautiful vision, until he told himself she was, of all he had ever met, or ever could meet, the sweetest and loveliest of woman-kind. To see her would be to love her, he believed, so far as his family went. His father, by fair means and foul, and by every means in his power, had of late been urging him to propose in due form to the heiress. This Stephen hotly refused to do. Hence were these family rows innumerable, and across the discord had struck the luminous idea of cutting short the threads of difficulty by marrying Hilda Romney. None other than she would ever be his wife, if she would have him, and that being so, he might as well set about the matter at once, and put a truce to the war between himself and his father.

First he had dutifully escorted his family to Boulogne, where they proposed to pass the season, established them in a comfortable hotel where English was freely spoken, and then hastened back to London, and thence to Flashford-on-Sea, where he now sits on thorns in the Parsonage drawing-room, waiting for Hilda to appear. He hoped to return to London engaged to Miss Romney. His mother would ask her on a visit. All his people would incontinently fall down and worship her. His father would accept the inevitable, and make handsome settlements on the young people. Stephen was his only son, and he would not be implacable towards him.

Like the plans of all great generals, his was short, sharp, and to the point, besides being beautifully simple. But, notwithstanding, as he now sat waiting for Hilda to appear, he felt as awkward and shy as a schoolboy. What should he say when she appeared? How account for himself? For his coming?

The door opened, and Hilda entered. She looked unaffectedly glad to see him, and held out a ready hand in greeting. And Stephen found, to his intense delight, that he was not expected to give any account of himself or to offer the slightest excuse for his coming.

"I am going to rusticate for a few weeks by the seaside, Miss Romney," he said, after some minutes had passed. "I am getting tired of foreign travel."

"Oh! are you?" she answered wonderingly. "And I should so love to go abroad. There are so many places I have read of, that I should dearly like to see."

Stephen smiled as he thought to himself what pleasure he would have in taking her north, south, east, or west, wherever her fancy might dictate, in the happy future which lay before them both. He could picture the eager, girlish joy as he showed her all her heart desired to see.

I am afraid the young man Stephen was somewhat of a coxcomb, to be thus exultantly sure of the success of his wooing. And yet, with his beautiful happy face, and the manly strength and grace in every limb of him, he was a lover of whom any woman might well be proud.

Not as even a possible lover, however, did Hilda Romney regard him, in her utter unconsciousness, as the two young people sat together in the quaint old room filled with flowers—great bowls of roses, crimson and yellow and white, and vases of heavily fragrant carnations gleaming from cupboard and shelf, while the open windows were framed with drooping clusters of wisteria and clematis.

"Father and Uncle Drury went to Bullionston this morning by the early train," Hilda remarked. "Father went about some books of reference for his Encyclopædia, and Uncle Drury went to take care of him. You know, if father got reading in a library he would forget to come home. They will be very pleased to see you again. Uncle Drury liked you very much."

"And I liked him," Stephen answered. "There is such a stately air of chivalrous old times about him. And he seems very kind also."

"The kindest, dearest old heart in all the world! He is so good to me," she answered simply.

Stephen thought she looked prettier than ever. The fresh, cool dress, of brown holland, with a dainty crimson ribbon round her waist, suited her better than the heavy velvet robe she had worn the day he met her first.

At this moment there were steps in the garden, and the bustle of an arrival at the hall door. The old gentlemen had come home, evidently. Dr. Romney's heavy steps went straight along the passage to the study, but Master Drury came to the drawing-room.

The worthy old gentleman experienced quite a panic of delight upon seeing Stephen. He bent and bowed, and waved his hands with elaborate gesticulation, and wound up finally by a hearty hand-shake, which Stephen understood better than the preceding ceremonies.

Then he turned to his niece.

"Hilda, my love, a slight token, a worthless bauble to shield from the too ardent kiss of Sol. Permit the old man to make an offering at Beauty's shrine."

And he pressed a long thin parcel, done up with brown paper, into her hand.

Hilda opened it, and produced therefrom a parasol. Truly, the most gorgeous thing in parasols Bullionston was able to produce. It was cream-colour, with a spray of crimson flowers painted on it, and a great deal of lace depending from its circumference. Hilda flushed red, and looked a little distressed.

"Dear Uncle, you are too good to me," she said wistfully.

"But do you like it, dear? That is the question, not my goodness."

"It is very beautiful," she said hesitatingly, "but much too magnificent for me."

"Tut! tut! As if I could in all the world find a thing good enough for you!" and he kissed her hand with chivalrous devotion, then trotted from the room.

"Just as I was saying to you," said Hilda, turning to Stephen with a slight mist before her grey eyes. "He is so good to me; he never goes to the city without bringing home something to give me pleasure. But this is dreadful. I never could use a parasol like that, and he will be hurt if I do not."

"I've seen my sisters carry parasols like it," Stephen said dubiously, eying the gaudy affair critically, "at a flower-show, or place of that kind. But somehow, it does not seem your style."

"I never go to flower-shows. And it is not my style. That distresses me. But I would wear anything sooner than hurt Uncle Drury."

She stopped short as Master Drury re-entered the room, with his face aglow.

"I have told my brother you are here, Mr. Wray," he said, speaking in a rather faster tone than usual, "and that you have put up at the Alexandra. He says that is absurd. I say so too. Come to us. We have a room. We like you. We make you welcome."

Poor innocent Master Drury, thus welcoming the wolf into the fold!

Stephen declined, apologised, protested, but all to no avail. Dr. Romney bustled in to see him, and shook him warmly by the hand. He wanted him to give him the names of some leading London publishers, he said. Stephen's objections were overruled, his excuses not listened to, and finally a servant was despatched to the hotel for his effects.

Before he knew where he was, so to speak, he found himself installed a guest at Biffey Parsonage. As he idled away the rest of the long sunshiny day in the garden with Master Drury and Hilda, the old father of the family joining them there for afternoon tea; sat with them at the well-appointed dinner-table; took a hand at chess in the shadowy drawing-room with the old doctor, and Hilda close by him laughing at his bad play; and finally, was shown to a dainty bedroom, hung with dimity and smelling of lavender, under the selfsame roof with his beloved, he felt that this indeed was a wondrous whirl of "fortune's wheel," and could but presage success and happiness.

CHAPTER VII.

HE AND SHE.

"Love took up the glass of Time, and turned it in his glowing hands."

STEPHEN WRAY was very soon perfectly at home at the Parsonage. Everyone in the house liked the young man, as everyone everywhere always did. His handsome face, boyish, simple manner, and spontaneous gaiety were all potent charms. That much-esteemed lady Mrs. Grundy, and her code of social rules and regulations, were apparently unknown to the Arcadian simplicity of this household. The old gentlemen saw nothing out of the way in Stephen being constantly with Hilda. It was good for the child, they said, to have at last a companion of her own age; and the old faces smiled as her laugh rang through the house more frequently each day.

Stephen was sublimely happy in the first intoxication of love's young dream. The more he saw of Hilda, the more he loved her. Although a young fellow, with more money always at his command than was exactly good for him, he was as yet unspoiled by the world. He was neither used up, nor effete and purposeless, as too many young men in his position become. He had not found, while yet in his twenties, the world a hollow fraud, and life a delusion and a snare. He had a large-hearted, royal belief in happiness, as a gift within the reach of most men. With perfect health, and a cheerful, sunshiny disposition, he always looked on the bright side of things, possessing also a general belief in the goodness and amiability of his fellow-men and women.

At the present moment he was in love for the first time in his life, and earnestly, eagerly, as he did everything, flinging his whole heart and soul into the matter.

He rose with the lark, as they all did at the Parsonage. He learned how to propel the grass-cutter over the trimly kept lawn, and he gathered fruit in the kitchen-garden for Hilda's housekeeping purposes. Or he established himself on the ledge of the open dairy window, and watched her with up-rolled sleeves and gigantic apron, making pastry. Or he would walk in the garden by the hour with Master Drury, talking with a fluency that astonished himself of poetry, or art, or kindred lofty topics. Thus he poeted his sweet apprenticeship of love. In the afternoons he and Hilda would go for long walks by the coast, with the sea running in almost to their feet, or inland through the fields, where the tall meadow-sweet grew by the river-side, and the blue forget-me-nots swayed on the current; or they would sit together in the garden, under the trees, where the apples hung reddening in the sun, and while she would work, he would read aloud her favourite books—his favourites also. And then tea would be carried out, and Master Drury come from his flowers and Dr. Romney from his books to join them. Perhaps after dinner a twilight stroll in the cool of the evening, coming home to chess or some other sober pastime, or conversation in the softly lit drawing-room until the servants assembled, and the master of the house read evening prayers, and another happy day was gathered to the past.

"Where do you disappear to daily, for hours, before luncheon?" Stephen asked Hilda abruptly. He had hired a boat, and taken her out on the sea to enjoy the sunset. The sea was smooth as glass, glowing magnificently with the lights and colours drifted upon its surface from the sky. The sunset was over long since, the great lurid ball of fire had gone flaming down into the west, but the memory of that crimson splendour lingered yet on polished water, and the western sky was zoned with yellow, merging upwards into fairy greens and tender greys.

Hilda smiled as she answered.

"I do not disappear for hours, Mr. Wray," she said.

"I call it hours," Stephen asserted dogmatically.

"I think you might tell me where you go." Hilda's face had been turned towards the west, but now she brought her eyes back from that far glory, and answered him simply.

"I visit some of papa's poor people," she said. "You know, papa hates visiting. His mind is always lost in his book. So, as I think someone ought to see these people, and know about them, I go."

"May I go with you?" asked Stephen. "You can't think how fearfully lonely, not to say neglected, I feel while you are away."

"No, you may not come with me. And," laughing brightly, "I don't believe either that you are lonely. You can read, or write your letters."

"But I assure you I am most abjectly lonely," he replied. "I wander all over the place in the most forlorn manner, much too shy to ask anyone, yet wondering desperately where you can possibly be."

"Now that you know," she said saucily, "your mind will be at ease. That is a great consideration."

"You are very unkind."

"And you are very absurd," she replied; and then they both laughed quite a long time, as if all this were exquisitely humorous; and after laughing together, they felt better friends than ever.

"I like to hear you laugh," he said, bending once more to his oars. "It comes always on me with the force of a surprise."

"I do not laugh much, I think," she answered musingly. "By nature, I am rather quiet; but since you have been here things have seemed far more amusing."

"You look so grave at times!" he said, resting his arms across his shipped oars, and looking at her with grave contemplation. "I often wonder of what you can be thinking when you are silent, and your face takes such sorrowful lines."

"I have sad thoughts," she said, in a voice so low he might hardly hear her words. She leant towards the side of the boat, trailing her fingers in the cool green water, and turning away her face from the light in the western sky.

"You are too young to have sad thoughts," he said. "You look a child sometimes."

"I was twenty last March," she said.

"And I shall be twenty-four in September," he replied. "So I am old enough to give you very sound and wise advice. A young girl like you has no right to have sad thoughts."

"Being young does not keep away sorrow," she answered, still with averted face.

"Sorrow is a strong word. Your life is perhaps not so bright and gay as that of most young girls; but it is not a life to make you sorrowful."

"I am sorrowful," she said unsteadily, "because of what my life shall be."

There was an awed solemnity in her face and manner which silenced him. Much as he longed to know her sorrow, and share it, he dared not question farther. He contented himself by looking at the soft, fair, pensive face, with all his heart in his eyes. He loved her so fervently, so entirely, that for himself he did not count over the mere short days and hours of their acquaintanceship.

It seemed to him the time in which he had not known her had never been, so utterly did she now fill all his life and thoughts. And to him, now swaying on the idle tide alone with her, it would not have been a moment too soon to tell her that he loved her, and to ask her to share her sorrow—whatever it might be—with him. But prudence sealed his lips. It was too soon for her, he knew. There was nothing looked at him from her clear eyes more than utter friendliness and good comradeship. He must wait.

But he felt strangely chilled and disheartened. A vague, undefinable something, a premonition of sorrow to come, seemed to push suddenly between him and her. She was far away from him, lost in musings he might not know, in thoughts he might not share. The warm tints of sunset were all gone now, and sea and land and sky were cold and grey. The glory was gone, the brightness fled, as he rowed in-shore in silence.

"It has all been very lovely," she said, as he gave her his hand to help her to the beach. "I have been very happy."

"Then if you have been happy, so have I," he said fervently.

"How very pleasant for you to have me to make up your mind for you!" she said, with a roguish glance. "Am I to tell you always when you are to be happy?" Stephen laughed as he looked down into her face.

"You see, it would be so very delightful making up again," replied the audacious Stephen, all his good spirits suddenly come back, for she had smiled on him. "Oh!" said Miss Romney, rather limply.

"He established himself on the ledge of the open dairy window."—p. 124.

"You know perfectly well what I mean, so there is not the slightest use in your pretending that you don't," he said.

"I am afraid we are coming very near quarrelling, Mr. Wray."

"I shouldn't mind in the least having a desperate quarrel with you, Miss Romney."

"That is a very nice and kind and altogether friendly statement, I must say."

"So whatever day you feel disposed to quarrel, let me know. I am quite ready," he said.

"Do you quarrel with your sisters?" she asked. Stephen laughed again.

"Not much. On the whole, we get along very well amongst ourselves. Our time is fully taken up circumventing our revered papa, and trying not to allow our precious mamma to have too depressing an influence upon us. So we younger ones band together rather, and seldom, if ever, weaken our forces by falling out among ourselves."

"I don't like the way you speak of your father and mother," she said, with sudden gravity.

"I don't do so from choice, I can assure you," he replied, with a shrug of his broad shoulders. "My father and mother may be blessings in disguise, but they are very much disguised."

"Even if they are—not very pleasant," she said timidly, "I don't think you ought to speak of them as you do. It hurts me."

"Does it? Then I won't do it—never again as long as I live."

"I am sure they love you."

"Perhaps. But if you don't want me to speak unkindly or disrespectfully of them, hadn't we best leave them out of the conversation altogether?"

"But it is not because I wish you not to speak of them in the way you do, that should influence you. It is because it is never right to speak badly of one's parents."

"You remind me of Mary Owens," he said, with a little laugh. "She often preaches her small sermons just like that. I am sorry to say I seldom, if ever, give heed to what she says."

"Who is Mary Owens?" she asked, turning suddenly towards him.

"Mary Owens? Why, she is just the best girl in the world, and a great friend of mine. Did I never speak of her to you?"

"I never heard her name before," Miss Romney answered somewhat stiffly. She drew a little away from Stephen as they went along the narrow pathway homewards through Biffey's streets.

"Her father is my father's partner; and she is his only child, and quite an heiress. I couldn't say how much money she has. She has been brought up with us, you may say: went to school with my younger sister, and used to come to the seaside with us when we were children. She is a very good girl, gives a lot of her money to the poor, and that sort of thing. She is very good to me—puts up with me when I'm out of temper, and helps me generally to get along. When home gets too bad of an evening, I go to Kensington, and take refuge with Mary. She is one of those quiet, sympathetic girls that let a fellow alone, and do not expect him to be for ever kneeling at their feet paying them compliments."

Hilda is not of the sympathetic order, apparently, for she walks along in silence, her small head very erect.

"I wish you and she knew one another," he continued, with true masculine blundering. Stephen did not know he was blundering, and went on fervently wishing. Hilda listened in cold silence. "I am sure you would like each other very much, and be great friends."

"I think it very improbable," Miss Romney answered. There was just a little touch of stateliness in her manner. Stephen did not notice this.

"I am certain you would like Mary," he continued. "She is so good, and true, and honest. Not a bit stuck up, like most girls who have money. And of course she would like you. She could not help doing that."

The tender inflection in his voice when he said this might have told much of his heart's story to a maiden more experienced in the ways of the world than Hilda Romney. But to her it told nothing, and she walked on silently, feeling a little hurt, a little angry, and altogether ill at ease, though she could have given no sufficient reason why she should be any one of the three.

She had been joyous enough when they left the boat. Why now, as they reached the Parsonage door, should her eyes be somewhat dim, and her heart a trifle sore?

She ran up-stairs to take off her things. When she came down again the chess-table was out, the pieces placed, and the old gentlemen impatiently waiting for her to come to take her part in four-handed chess.

Stephen soon felt by some mysterious instinct that something had come between her and him, and in his consequent dejection played exceedingly ill—so much so that Master Drury, as a partner, found him utterly unreliable, and Hilda and her father won easily every time.

Master Drury went to his bed that night sorrowfully shaking his powdered old head, and bewailing his many defeats.

"The young man threw away the games—actually threw them away," he muttered pathetically. "Played into our opponents' hands with as pitiable ignorance as if he had never seen a chess-board before in his life. I shall put him to play with Hilda to-morrow night. Perhaps he might get on better."

Perhaps he might, O sapient Master Drury!

"Just the best girl in all the world," he called her," repeated Hilda to herself, indignantly, as she fell asleep in her little white bed.

"I have managed to offend her in some way," mused the unhappy blunderer in the seclusion of his own room, a great deal too miserable even to attempt to sleep. "I wonder what I could have said or done?"

And over and over again he revolved in his foolish mind the events of the evening—what he said, what she said—like some silly game of consequences without an end.

We'll flock around His banner,
We'll bow before His throne
And sing aloud, Hosanna
To David's royal Son !

3. For should we fail proclaiming
Our great Redeemer's praise,
The stones, our silence shaming,
Would their hosannas raise :
But shall we only render
The tribute of our words ?
No, while our hearts are tender,
They too shall be the Lord's !

"SECOND FLOOR BACK."

BY THE REV. FREDERICK HASTINGS.

"WHAT can you say on 'second floor back?'" said a respectable tradesman to me when I was speaking of it as a subject. To him, having a residence away from his shop, to him prosperous and happy, I knew that it might only suggest the small spare-room, kept always tidy and "well-aired" for country cousins who might come to town. Nor would it convey much to a friend of mine who lives in a house that must have cost a fortune to furnish; where pictures and bijouterie, nick-nacks, and portraits in richly carven frames abound; where carpets are like the mossy smooth-shaven lawn; where tables are of exquisite shape inlaid with marquetry, or massive, and needing machinery to lift them; where lounges are soft, curtains silken and heavy; and where the walls are all richly frescoed or hung with choicest tapestry brought from some old Continental château or lordly castle. To him "second floor back" would only perhaps suggest the "blue room" or a luxuriously fitted dressing-room.

There are those who will readily understand the reference, those who have to make of "second floor back" kitchen and scullery, nursery and bedroom, larder and china closet, bath-room and cellar, dining and drawing room. It is astonishing into how much one small room will develop. "Second floor back" is like a "telescopic table," adaptable to two or twenty. This wonderful room is found in houses that face a main road, but generally it is seen in the perfection of utility in some small side street of a slummy district. Let us go and see one. Mind the stairs; they not only creak, but some of the steps are very loose. Don't lean on the banister; it is likely to give way. If you have a stick, grope your way; there is no window to give light. Knock at the door; this room is as distinct a dwelling as any residence. Six families occupy the other rooms of this small house of seven rooms, kitchen included. Twenty-nine children are the offspring of these six families, and a precious noise they make ever and anon, as they clatter up and down stairs, call or cry, shout or squall. If you are of great sensibility in the olfactory nerves, bring some smelling salts or eau-de-cologne with you. The smell is peculiarly stifling. All sorts of operations and materials produce that fragrance. "Oh! it is washing-day, is it?" you say to the mistress of the homestead. "Indeed, then, 'there is nae luck about the house,' I suppose."—"Yes; sir, there is, only it's very bad luck in respect to drying to-day. We are obliged to dry our linen indoors, we have such a small yard, and there's 'no dry' in it. Besides, it might be dangerous to leave the things outside."

I have had sometimes to creep up-stairs where the linen of someone for whom the laundry-work was done was hanging to get dry and healthy! The alert inmate would hear my steps, come out and hold wet sheets back for me to pass. Sometimes the room has been so closely festooned with damp linen that it has been hard to see the occupant. This "second floor back" has to be wash-house as well as living-room.

But look at the furniture. A rickety table, a chair or two, an aged bedstead, a box or two, and perhaps a small chest of drawers, leave little space for movement. Here, when the linen is down, the room swept up, a bright fire burning, a small paraffin lamp sending its light on the innumerable little pictures and photographic portraits of sons and daughters away, the widow can sit down and be comfortable. Yea, I know some who by reason of a simple faith in Christ's great love to them are as happy in such spots as the Queen when in bracing Balmoral or wondrous Windsor. I have even seen a family of five, bright and hopeful, who have had to dwell in one such tiny room. And the room has been clean, too. The innate love of tidiness in the wife made the one room a pleasant sight in the midst of much that was disorderly and dreary. That husband, too, had much of the Mark Tapley spirit. Both kept from drink, and the children were members of a Sunday-school.

But "second floor back" and the occupants given to drink, what a change! What sights! Go in when the husband is recovering from a night's debauch and "drunk." Bare boards, scanty clothing, a rotten tick, apologies for coverlets, an old macintosh; broken crockery, torn pictures pasted on the wall by some previous tenant, wall-paper in tatters, or black with dust and smoke, and a leaky saucepan on the fireless hearth. In one case an old battered zinc pail served alone to fetch water, wash up crockery, and cook the Sunday dinner. I have known a broken ewer avail to fetch the beer from the public and the soup from the soup-kitchen.

We don't wonder, when the kitchen utensils are so reduced, that sometimes the coal-cellar gets very low, and banisters and skirting-boards are torn out and used for fuel. I have known the floor to be so shaky that one has had to step with care lest sudden daylight from above should be made in "first floor back."

Imagine in such conditions an old man and his wife, his son and his wife with three children, living and sleeping. Such we have known, and have been entreated not to mention it lest the inspector should hear of it and turn them out for overcrowding, or lest the landlord should turn them out from fear of the inspector.

Glance from the window of "second floor back." What a landscape of black, dank walls, chimney-pots, and brickbat-and-dead-cat-covered space! Perhaps there is an uncovered tank and some petty outhouse to add charm to the prospect.

This apology for an outlook, this fragment of an ill-furnished house, this close-crowded room is the only home of many—a wretched place oftentimes. We have been in the huts of the Finlanders, the black tents of the Arabians, and the wigwags of the Indians, and we should prefer any one of them to some of the places in which our own countrymen have to take shelter. It is the "home, sweet home" of which, wherever scattered, they are expected to cherish fond memories. Home, sweet home, indeed! it is often only a hole, foul hole instead. They are places men should leave as soon as possible; but, alas! many of them are too self-indulgent in a certain direction to get out of them. If only some of the men would save that five shillings a week they so readily and charitably contribute towards the support of the nearest publican, they might easily get out. They will not curb a certain appetite, and so they have to remain crowded, stifled, and cumbered in a way altogether unnecessary when the amount they earn is considered. And they are crowded and cumbered even when at times they earn what is called "good money."

*A Second Floor

What homes some are! Recently we saw one who was a School Board officer taking a boy of eleven years old away to a reformatory. His father and mother were constantly drinking and neglecting the boy. He was always begging. At last the School Board took him away to train the boy to better habits. His mother was nearly incapable from drink when the boy was taken from the station. What a home that poor boy had! He seemed to have no regret at leaving his apology for a home and mother, and I could not but feel saddened at the thought that any lad should so readily go away from mother and home for several years.

How often home in "second floor back" only means a place of drudgery and blows to a boy or girl! One of the forms of drudgery is to have to take care of other children; and yet what can a mother with five or six children do but make the elder take care of the younger?

One of the things you often see in "second floor back," just outside on the landing, is a clumsy, broken-down, cast-off perambulator. In the daytime the child of five or six years old will often have the care of a baby, or perhaps two, in this vehicle, and will have to go up and down in the dreary street. And what a task it must be, after use, to get it up those stairs into "second floor back!"

Boxes are plentiful, for large boxes are useful as beds for the children.

It will be evident that much attention to proprieties will not be paid under such conditions. Delicacy of feeling will not find here a very favourable soil. The wonder is that there is so much purity and modesty as is found often in the cramped "second-floor back." The price paid for these places we know is exorbitant. Of course, the landlord, having to run greater risk of obtaining rent from such tenants, puts up the price to cover the risk. "Moonlight" flitting is not uncommon. It is not difficult where there are few children in the family; but if there are, it is very difficult to find another place in which to put the head. The "few sticks" can readily be accommodated, but the children are not welcomed. They are regarded as "impedimenta" and encumbrances, indeed. Of course, some of the class who occupy "second-floor back" in such localities as those of which mention has been made, are not always in work, and they find it hard to pay the heavy rents. To be prompt is as difficult as to be good. We do not wonder that they often suffer from depression, and then, as a result, the little hard-earned money they have goes to the publican for that which by dulling the brain gives a little respite from care. Public-houses fatten on the misery and the overcrowding of the people. The naturally restorative power of the air is eliminated in such dwellings. "Sinkiness" comes over men and women, then artificial pick-me-ups are found in the pewter and the glass. We cannot reasonably expect people with such surroundings to be unselfish, reverent, always temperate, and even religious. We must make excuse for them as far as possible. And yet in many cases—not in all—they are to blame for thriftlessness, indulgence, and intemperance. They have gravitated downwards through culpable neglect. They blame landlords, governments, and society, but they will not help themselves to get better quarters. If their bad tastes remained, evil conditions would still follow them.

Alas! we repeat it, bad tastes result from overcrowding. And is it necessary that so many people should have to live in one room? As conditions are at present it seems inevitable.

Artisan dwellings have certainly wrought a great improvement for a certain class, but their rents are still too heavy. Moreover, they have no bit of garden, and often not even a balcony upon which the occupants can step out. If an epidemic breaks out, it is also very difficult in such huge places to prevent the spread of disease.

Why should not the people be spread over a wider area? If railway companies would increase the facilities for working-men's trains to run rapidly at certain hours to greater distances and at cheaper rates, the "second floor back" might become no longer the only dwelling-place of a family. Three rooms might then be secured at the price at present paid for one.

Until some improvement shall come, we must strive to make the best of circumstances. Let the "second floor back" be the abode of righteousness, temperance, and piety. We would say to anyone dwelling there, It is your home—keep it to yourself. Don't let the bailiff get in, or it will be more inconvenient still. A poor woman said to me, "We could manage very well until the 'man in possession' was put in, and then we knew not where to find room or food."

"An Englishman's house is his castle," and if our home be only a single room on the second floor, it is our "castle." Let it be kept as clean and bright as possible. Let flowers and pictures decorate it. This is a woman's work, but a husband can help. We know men who have made their one room quite charming by home-made bookshelves, brackets, and even sideboards, tables, and overmantels, and a cradle for the baby. "All these are my husband's making," said one proud wife to me. Yes, instead of spending money in drink he spent it in wood, and the time he would have wasted at a counter was spent in making articles that pleased his wife, served the children, and made him more content with his home. Would that many more wives could manifest the same pride in their husbands' handiwork! Not only would it be better for them, but for the husband. With what joy he would return to it at the end of each day's toil, saying, as one has written—

"Shrine of my household deities,
Bright scene of home's unsullied joys,
To thee my burdened spirit flies
When fortune frowns or care annoys.
Thine is the bliss that never cloy,
The smile whose truth has oft been tried;
What, then, are this world's tinsel toys
To thee—my own fireside?"

"Mind the hole at the foot of the stairs."

“Oh! may the yearnings fond and sweet,
That bid my thoughts be all of thee,
Thus ever guide my wandering feet
To thy heart-soothing sanctuary.
Whate’er my future years may be,
Let joy or grief my fate betide,
But still an Eden bright to me,
My own—my own fireside.”

fact, had that arm-chair fixed to the floor, so that his visitors—I might almost say his patients—once in it, he could scan them with such light as the chamber afforded full upon them, while he continued in obscurity, being able, nevertheless, from the darkness, to utter sounds mere or less awful, and to settle the destiny of those who came to him, after the fashion of the oracles of old.

"Certainly," said Mr. Ahithophel: "bonds—mortgages—deeds—stocks—deferred annuities—present ones—postobits—anything—everything—and to any amount. Not that I can do so very much of myself, but friends act with me; and, if they approve, then we carry out any transaction, no matter how large."

"Any transaction?" said Mr. Soames; "then I presume you are not averse to undertaking one somewhat out of the ordinary course, provided only it is safe and remunerative?"

"Those are the two points," said Mr. Ahithophel, "and it is pleasant to find a gentleman understanding the preliminaries and, I may say, the necessities of business so thoroughly. 'Safe' and 'remunerative'! How many a head would rest more easily on its pillow—how many a life would have something noble to show at its end—if those were the principles on which all men transacted business!—and what a deal of trouble they would save gentlemen of my profession!"

"Then I understand you are prepared to entertain the idea of a complicated property transaction, provided only it be safe and profitable. You don't mind being out of your money for a time?"

"Not if I'm sure of being into it again," said Mr. Ahithophel, with alacrity—"into it, and it grown a little while it was out: 'My son, how you are grown since you went away!' is what I like to say to every guinea when it comes home."

"Then you may feel inclined to enter into somewhat a complicated arrangement with me? I will pay what the circumstances of the case demand. Here is the title-deed to an estate. By this deed it would seem that this estate is entailed; and I have a half-brother, who has a child: these two, according to all appearance, must come in for the property. Now my one great desire in life is that they should never get it; and I want you first of all to assure yourself that there exists a flaw in this entail. You can do this at my expense. Take two or three eminent counsels' opinion; and if you are satisfied, then I want to make some somewhat unusual arrangements with you with reference to this property."

"Very good," said Mr. Ahithophel. "What can I and my friends do to serve you?"

Mr. John Soames opened a small black bag, and brought from it several documents, to one of which he drew Mr. Ahithophel's particular attention.

"This," said he, "contains my title to the Manor of Blaystone. Under it I inherit from my father. It purports to entail the estate on my half-brother; and at first sight, and I may say second sight, and third sight too, it would appear that it does so; but, having studied the document over and over again, I have come to the conclusion that there is a flaw in it. I have marked the flaw by a pencil note, and here is my opinion on the matter, and the argument by which it is to be sustained. You see, Mr. Ahithophel, I ate my dinners to some purpose, though I never practised at the bar."

"No doubt you would have made a fortune if you had," said the money-lender, who from the nature of his profession knew a little of the intricacy of legal documents; and not least of that portion of them which has to do with entails, and whether they must stand, or by hook or by crook could be cut off.

"This seems an able document," said Mr. Ahithophel, after he had run his eye over Mr. John Soames' opinion; "but I should like to submit it to regular legal advice. You see, I don't understand the law—at least, only in a very small way—but my friends know all about it. I should like Serjeant Gimlett to give his opinion on it, and a couple of King's Counsel, say Mr. Bushwig and Mr. Andrews; that is, if the transaction you propose is worth going to so much expense about. May I ask what its precise nature is?"

"I am a single man," said the owner of Blaystone (and here a thought darted through Mr. Ahithophel's mind—would he do and could he be got for his daughter Juliana at home, for whom no one up to the present could be found?), "and a man, to whom this property appears to go by the entail, has injured and offended me. I want an arrangement which will secure his not coming in for a penny of it. I want to sell the property, but on certain conditions. I am not to be disturbed in it during my lifetime—no one is to know that it has been alienated—the money must be paid for it at once, and interest will be allowed upon it until I die. If there is a chance of the entail standing good, you must take that risk, which no doubt you will do; for I am sure you will make as sure as man can do that there is not any risk at all. Consult your friends, and I will call in a week's time to know what you have to say on the matter. I want the money paid down; and please do not let the grass grow under your feet, for the sooner the matter is settled the better."

Hereupon Mr. John Soames took his departure, and wended his way to Savile Row to see another professional man, but this time a very different one—a doctor; for he had been out of sorts for some time, and the opportunity of being in town—no small one in those days—was not to be lost.

"You say," said Dr. Bromide, "that you often awake with that peculiar feeling about your heart; allow me to ask you whether you remember hearing that any of your family—your father, for instance, or your grandfather—ever suffered from anything of the kind?"

"My mother did," answered Mr. Soames.

"And can you remember whether she was subject to any swelling of the body, or limbs?"

"Yes; of the legs," said Mr. Soames.

"Well, you will have to be careful. You must keep free from all excitement, you must live quietly, and—"

"Dr. Bromide," interrupted the patient, looking at the physician full in the face, "I am no coward, either as regards death or anything else. If you think I have any deadly disease, tell me so. There are reasons—family reasons—why I should know how I stand.

"This seems a very able document," said Mr. Ahithophel."
—p. 132.

I am at this very moment making certain dispositions of property which may be materially affected by my tenure of life. If you think I shall die within a month—a week—to-morrow—say it out."

"Well, my dear sir, this pain betokens no good; but with care—— But it is uncertain, very uncertain."

"Tell me all, and tell me exactly," said John Soames, in a tone of half-irritation, half-command, which the physician could not but observe. So he thought within himself, "If he will know all, he must; but it is his doing, not mine." So, after a few more hems and haws, he proceeded.

"Life is uncertain to us all," said the doctor; "to some more uncertain than to others—for example, to yourself. You may live long, but you may, if I judge those pains aright, be cut off any moment; and as you have mentioned the subject of property, I should think it would be wise for you to make all needful disposition of yours as quickly as convenient. For precaution's sake, you know, we are bound not to let those we love suffer through any neglect of ours."

At this Mr. John Soames grinned bitterly somewhere in his heart, and, having received his prescription, and directions as to his mode of life, took his departure.

The opinion of Dr. Bromide confirmed Mr. Soames in his determination to push all his property and all his vengeance matters through as quickly as possible. But it was only with the executive part he was concerned—all the planning—subject to Mr. Ahithophel's coming forward satisfactorily, was ready cut and dry in his mind.

Mr. John Soames' next visit was to a dingy kind of quarter. He was in search of a sculptor, a man of the name of Carnatti, whose skill in monumental sculpture was well known. He found the man he wanted in a yard full of blocks of marble and monuments more or less finished, some to be sold ready-made, with nothing but the name and virtues to be put on; and some made and being made to order, for Carnatti's trade was a good one.

The Italian was always, however, ready for a customer; accordingly he laid down his mallet and chisel in a moment to interview his visitor in his little office.

"You want a monument," said Carnatti, "with much room for the good piousness of the one that is dead!"

"No," said his visitor; "with only his name and address, when he was born, and when he died, and who he was. All I want on it is, 'John Soames, the last of the Blaystone Squires; born so-and-so, died so-and-so.'"

"And some sculpture," chimed in Carnatti—"a beautiful angel looking down on the deceased, and weeping that Blaystone has had such a loss."

"You keep your poetry ready made; at least, the sentiment," said Mr. Soames; "but it is different from mine. I do want sculpture, and that the very best that you can execute; but it is no angel that I want, but a skull."

"Ah—a skull! We can do that too, first-rate—a fac-simile of your own, as it will be, if you like."

"That is exactly what I want! but it must have what I have not—that is, a pair of wings, one at each side of it."

"Cherub's wings—wings like Cupid, or an angel, or a dove; something showing that you will fly up some day. Excuse me; I did not mean you, but the gentleman for whom the monument is, whoever he may be."

"No apologies are needed, friend—I mean it for my own, and I want the skull as near a likeness as you can make it. Here! you may measure my skull, or take a cast of it if you please; but whatever you can do, be particular about that front tooth!—Ay," said Mr. John Soames to himself, "he shall ever have that blow before his eyes; the skull that he struck shall grin at him above ground—at least, as nearly as I can make it. Many a time when he and his see that hole in the front of the mouth they'd be glad if it had never been made; they'd stop it up with diamonds if they could. And the wings," said John Soames to himself, "the wings are a sign that that skull shall pursue Henry Soames—him and his—as long as they are on the earth. They are meant to say that he and his shall have no rest; the thought of John Soames of Blaystone Manor, of the place that they shall never be of, shall pursue them and eat into them wherever they go."

And so the skull was made—made so like John Soames's in shape that had anything happened to this gentleman's cranium in life, he might, but for slight inconvenience from the weight, and for the trifling deficiency of a little flesh, have clapped Signor Carnatti's effigy, minus the wings, on the top of his vertebrae, and gone through life sure of freedom from head-, tooth-, and ear-ache, and facial neuralgia of every kind.

Mr. John Soames's journey to London would not, however, have been by any means complete had he returned to Blaystone without having accomplished another little matter which formed an important part of certain arrangements which he contemplated with reference to the Blaystone property.

In order to accomplish this satisfactorily he had to seek the services of a certain firm—"Spring and Tumbler," I suppose the Chubbs of their day. Messrs. Spring and Tumbler made locks and keys of all kinds. They had commonalities and specialities in their business, and it did not matter much to them which they provided, so as business was done and profit made.

At least, this was the idea of Tumbler, who was a man of rather a vulgar mind, and went in for what Mr. Spring called the bread-and-cheese of the trade.

But Spring himself was a man of different and, I presume, much finer stuff, and cast in a much more delicate mould. He was æsthetic in his business. Mr. Spring had a collection of keys from all countries, and, it might almost be said, of all ages. Some twisted in their wards as though they had terrible internal spasms and convulsions of a frightful kind, and as though fearful and mysterious contortions must take place within the lock on which they were operating before they could shoot its bolts. There were poetic and persuasive-looking keys, and dreadful business crowbar-looking things, as though to wrench with the help of a strong wrist would be their great delight.

But Mr. Spring's weakness was for the minute. He loved to compress art, like a Chinese lady's foot, into a small space. He flattered himself that he had made with his own hands and was then possessed of the smallest lock and key in the world. Had the Tom Thumb of those days a Gladstone bag, or what was equivalent to it, Mr. Spring would have fitted it with a lock which would have insured the safety of Mrs. Thumb's jewellery on their wedding tour.

Thus you can see he was the very man for the Blaystone Squire.

"I see what you want exactly," said the locksmith, for such in plain English he was. "You want the poetry and prose of keys combined. What you want is something very delicate, very curious, I may say—something which will defy chance—something that will laugh at all odds and ends of keys that may be tried just because they are the size of the key-hole. I can make what you want, but it will take time and money too. I must do it with my own hands; there must not be a stock piece in the whole affair. Give me my own time and price, and I'll provide you with what will defy everything except violence."

"Oh, never fear that—violence will never be used; but the size. You must keep it small."

"What size will you allow me? I could do with the size of your thumb-nail for the lock; but let us say one and a half. Then the key will be very small."

"That will do."

"No living man will open that lock but with that key; no living man will pick it. I don't know what a ghost might do—it might get in and shoot the bolts in some way I don't know—but mortal man won't do it."

And certainly, when Mr. Spring's handiwork was completed and fitted to the little box for which it was made, it was quite a work of art, though Mr. Spring, having none of Methuselah's blood in his veins, did not live to see its final triumph.

Matters went on swimmingly with Mr. Ahithophel also. His consultation with his friends was eminently satisfactory. He himself entered with, I might almost say, enthusiasm, into Mr. John Soames' plans; and Mr. Soames finally returned to Blaystone with the "Flying Skull," a small, curiously shaped key, two or three sculptor's drilling and cutting tools, and a little box of composition, so like marble when it was put to fill up any little cracks or crevices, that one could hardly know whether it were not a part of the very marble itself. Monument and all complete did Mr. Soames bring to Blaystone with him; the date of death only had to be filled in.

Subsequent reflection induced Mr. Soames to have down one of Signor Carnatti's workmen, who added to the monument the following lines:—

"In life my skull its secret kept,
Both why it laughed, and why it wept;
How Blaystone Manor disappeared,
And sorrow came which no one feared;
A curious tale it could unfold,
But never shall that tale be told."

Which lines, I should have told the reader at the very outset, formed, with their mystery, a part of the glory of the monument of the "Flying Skull." Many had puzzled their heads over them, but almost all had come to the conclusion that John Soames, who must, undoubtedly, either have written them himself, or got them written for him, must have been mad.

In due time the owner of Blaystone Manor died; he died and was buried; and according to written directions which he left behind, the monument was put up, and the "Flying Skull" was fixed on the top of it, bending a little forward, as if it were just about to take wing, but whither (certainly not heavenward) no one could tell.

Henry Soames and his charming wife, and Jacob

(the present old sexton), and other young children, all came into possession of Blaystone Manor; and the house, so long desolate and silent, resounded with laughter and games, and all sorts of romps and human joys. Scarce a sound was heard within its walls so long as that dismal and mysterious skull was there; but once gone, and safely fixed up in the neighbouring church, all went as merry as a marriage bell, and no one took any notice of the statement that the deceased was the last of the Blaystone Squires.

There was at first a great deal of talk about the skull and the lines which were written under it, but all soon became a nine-days' wonder; and as there were not many living in the neighbourhood in those old times, the whole thing as a matter of immediate and active interest was soon forgotten.

But matters did not long run smooth at Blaystone, at least at the Manor House. Some six months had Henry Soames and his family been in possession and enjoyment of their new home when a couple of gentlemen arrived one day and asked to see him on urgent business.

"Certainly, certainly; let the gentlemen be shown into the library."

The visitors were none other than Mr. Nathan Ahithophel and his chief legal adviser; and the errand on which they came was a momentous one to the new owner of Blaystone, there was no denying the truth of it. Anyhow, it had a very ugly look; one, the beauty of which did not improve as Mr. Henry Soames took counsel afterwards with his law advisers.

"You will see, sir," commenced Mr. Ahithophel's legal adviser, after a few preliminary remarks about his fear that their visit would not be a satisfactory one to their host, "that these documents substantiate all which I have said. To sum up their contents in a few words, your late brother sold the estate of Blaystone Manor to my client here, Mr. Nathan Ahithophel."

"Which he could not do," said the present owner of Blaystone, "for the property is entailed, strictly entailed. I fear he would have parted with it if he could, but he could not; and I cannot but regret that Mr. Ahithophel should lose his money, as he must lose anything which he has paid."

"Pardon me," said the legal adviser, "I think on further and full investigation you will find that all the documents are in order; we lawyers make it the business of our lives to see that papers are in order; and I have had the chief part in attending to this matter."

"You will see by them that Mr. John Soames, recently deceased, for some time suspected a flaw in the entail; wishing to part with the property, he put the matter into our hands, so that everything done should be, without any shadow of doubt, correct. We took steps to get the best opinions which London could supply, and these state that, while certain points may be relied on by you with an apparent show of probability, still there can be no doubt that there exists a fatal flaw in the entail; it seems a small thing, but you know, sir, a little hole will swamp a ship."

"My client, Mr. Nathan Ahithophel, has been fully satisfied as to the title, and has paid your brother £20,000 for the property; we have with us the legal opinions—the conveyance—the receipt for the money, and every document which can be required. Moreover, the title-deeds, for which you have no doubt been searching in vain for the last six months, we have here also. This black leather bag contains the whole."

For some moments Henry Soames stared at his visitors as if they were mad, or he himself, one or the other; at last he seemed to awake out of a kind of dream, and said, "But if all this be so, how is it that you did not come and take possession at once, on my brother's death?" A bright idea seemed to come into the bewildered man's head that these were a couple of swindlers, who, hearing of the lone man's death, and perhaps of the enmity which had existed between the brothers, had concocted this scheme, for which they needed some little time. Moreover, how was it that a place of the value of Blaystone Manor was parted with for so comparatively small a sum as £20,000? Mr. Henry Soames instinctively began to think of the village constable, who in those parts was the sole representative of the police.

"Upon these points I can satisfy your mind," said Mr. Ahithophel, who now became the chief speaker, "or rather, without using any words of my own, let me, so to speak, give you the very words of your estimable brother lately deceased—if he were alive, I have no doubt he would utter these sentiments in full. You would recognise your brother's signature, Mr. Soames, I presume?"

"Certainly."

"Is that his?" said Mr. Ahithophel, showing a name at the end of a letter, the contents of which were hidden by the folding down of the sheet.

Henry Soames looked at it for a moment—there was unhappily not much reason for his looking at it long—and said, "No doubt that is my brother's signature."

"And, generally speaking, that is his handwriting?" continued Mr. Ahithophel, opening the letter.

"It is so," answered Henry Soames.

"Perhaps you will be good enough to peruse the letter," chimed in the man of the law; "we lawyers always keep every letter—indeed, every scrap of paper of every kind—a lawyer does not destroy anything of that sort—no one can tell when it will come in usefully as evidence; and this letter will perhaps at once convince your mind, Mr. Soames, and save us much trouble."

Henry Soames took the letter and read it, and what a revelation it gave of the unhappy and long-continued and inveterate hatred of his brother! it revealed the whole situation—it contained all about the sale of the property for £20,000—all about the confirmation of the flaw in the title—all about the agreement that, in consideration of so small a sum paid down, the remainder of the value of the property should be paid to John Soames by way of annuity—all about Mr. Ahithophel's not being at liberty to take possession for six months; perhaps it might have contained some other things too, but Henry Soames' eyes swam, and he could scarce stumble through the document to the end.

"I trust you are satisfied," said the man of the law, "and that my client, Mr. Ahithophel, will not have any trouble in asserting his rights. I may say that I know it was the late Mr. John Soames' fixed intention that you should leave Blaystone Manor as quickly as possible after you received the notice which we are now giving you; and though we should be sorry to put you to any inconvenience, still, we shall feel ourselves bound to carry out the wishes of the deceased as far as possible to the letter."

"Well, gentlemen, you cannot expect me to give an answer offhand in such an important matter, be to be dispossessed of it. He had carried out his hatred and revenge to the bitter end.

But all was not yet lost. True, Mr. Ahithophel's legal adviser said that there was a fatal flaw in the entail, and that on that assumption his astute friend had parted with a large sum of money. But if one set of lawyers said one thing, another set of lawyers could always be found who would say another. There were two sides to every question, and he would try the matter out to the very end.

The parish church of Blaystone was close to the especially as it has come upon me by way of surprise; but I will communicate with you within a week, when I shall have had time to consider the matter."

"We have no objection to a week's delay," said Mr. Ahithophel, "but you will please understand that if Blaystone Manor be not vacated at the expiration of that time we shall take the necessary proceedings." And so the pair took their departure.

For a couple of days Mr. Henry Soames was in a state of complete bewilderment; but presently, when he began to think, the true state of the case unfolded itself before him. His brother had never forgiven him for taking away the woman he thought he ought to have had himself. He had alienated the property from him—at least, he thought he had done so, but it must yet be proved whether he could really do as he wished. He had allowed him to have possession of it just long enough to know how great a loss it would manor, and the Blaystone Squires were patrons of the living, so that it was no wonder that a key to the church was always hanging up at the manor-house; and so the present Squire had no difficulty in getting entrance there, as, wandering about, he kept pondering the present state of affairs. Why, he knew not, but he felt some strange desire to look upon the monumental skull; one would have almost thought that he expected it to speak to him, and give him some information about the present state of things.

Ay, there it was—a restless-looking skull, with those two wings, one at each side of where the nape of the neck would have been, had the ghastly marble any neck at all, and leaning forward as though it would fly down amongst living men again.

Looking long at it, Henry Soames' attention was attracted particularly to the loss of the front tooth. It was the very tooth he had knocked out long ago in that tremendous fight. Why was it out in the skull? Could it be—perhaps, to speak more correctly, must it not be—because his brother wished to perpetuate the memory of that sad affair? The whole thing was a carefully planned act of vengeance.

And then those lines underneath—

"How Blaystone Manor disappeared,
And sorrow came, which no one feared.

JOHN SOAMES,
the last of the Blaystone Squires."

Was it not so now? Yes! the whole thing stood out before him—clearly as in the daylight. John Soames had alienated the Manor—had allowed him to be in it for six months, by planned malignity, so that he might suffer all the more by being turned out of it. But where had the money gone which had been received for the purchase? Ah! that was a problem which Henry Soames could not find out, and which he was not likely to find out either.

Thus was laid the foundation of misery for poor Henry Soames for the remainder of his life, and for the Soames family, at least for this branch of the name, for many a day.

By the advice of his lawyers Mr. Henry Soames fought out the question of the validity of the entail of Blaystone Manor. A decision was come to by a very learned judge, after much anxious thought, that the fatal flaw existed; and on appeal other learned judges, after great heart- and head-searchings, and with much difficulty, came at last to the same conclusion; and so, Henry Soames had to leave the Manor, a thoroughly ruined man, as many a one is who has much to do with law and lawyers.

His story need not be long. He betook himself to a little cottage in the village, and there he spun out the remainder of his days, still painting something now and again, enough to keep himself and his from actual starvation, but spending most of his time in brooding over his misfortunes, and trying to unravel what could be meant by the lines beneath the "Flying Skull;" and also by the "Flying Skull" itself. If he could have learned the truth, it was an emblem of the unbearably malignity of the dead John Soames, who delighted to feel that he would thus vicariously, as he could not actually, look down upon, and grin at, and spite his brother and his brother's heir for, at any rate, many a long year.

But what that skull meant Henry Soames went out of the world without knowing. True! he had a dim view that there was some mystery to be unravelled; but how to unravel it he had no clue.

It would have been well if the mystery could have died with him; but the malignity of his brother was, unhappily, too lasting in its effects for that. That "Flying Skull" seemed to have a life of evil in it—some mission of mischief which it appeared destined to fulfil.

Almost, we might say, as a legacy, the trouble descended from father to son. Henry Soames died a poor, a very poor man; indeed, he might be almost said to have died a pauper—at least he was, so far as his family was concerned, very little better.

Nothing had he to leave to his son Jacob, the present sexton and, indeed, general church officer of Blaystone Church. And how Jacob would have got on in the world, had it not been for the kindness of the vicar of Blaystone, I cannot tell.

This gentleman was under obligation to the Soames family; from them he had received his preferment, and he was glad to show what return he could by throwing whatever lay in his power in the way of any member of the family.

Poor Jacob never did much in life; he spent too much of his time in dreaming about the lost property, in questioning and cursing that skull, in dreaming that some day he should get back what he fully believed to be his own. But year after year passed, and nothing belonging to Blaystone came his way; no, not though he had braved all the horrors of twelve o'clock at night alone in the church, and with a ladder had climbed up to the skull, and by the help of a lantern looked right in through the hole of the lost tooth, so to speak, down the skull's very throat. The sexton was near paying dearly for his rashness, for at one moment he felt, as he thought, a cold flap in the face from one of the skull's wings, and he was as nearly as possible slipping from top to bottom of the ladder in his fright. Had he indeed fallen, and the skull come down on top of him, his life would probably have then and there come to an end.

Blaystone Manor! Well, it passed through many of the changes and chances of this mortal life, which come to places even as they do to individuals. Over and over again during the years of which we have been writing did Blaystone Manor change hands. No one could tell how it was, but, somehow or other, folk when they had been there for a little while did not seem to care to stay there; and the place began to be blown upon and get uncanny. Under these circumstances there ought to be a ghost to account for such a state of things; but no one ever surmised that there was such a thing. Still one and another came and went; and the property was always being sold for less and less, everyone being willing to make some loss, in order to secure a speedy sale. They all seemed as restless as the "Flying Skull." More than one left under the impression that there was some mystery connected with that ghastly emblem of Blaystone's former owner; and that in some way or other they were likely sooner or later to become entangled in it.

The property had now so depreciated that it could be bought for the £20,000 which its former owner, John Soames, had got for it in cash; and, oh! if only Jacob knew what had become of that £20,000, would he not buy it back, and should not the Soameses be the Soameses of Blaystone Manor once again!

All things in this world come to an end, and the mystery of Blaystone Church—that of the "Flying Skull"—was destined to do the like; but the way it came about was very strange.

"Jacob! Jacob!" said the vicar to his sexton, when, for almost the thousandth time, they were discussing the "Flying Skull," "if there is any secret which can be discovered to mortal man or by him—I mean any secret for good—it will never come except to someone fitted to receive it. You and yours have spent your life in cursing that skull and the memory of the man over whose monument it hangs; it may be that if you and your son, whom you have brought up to do as you have been doing yourself, change all this, and enter on a new course of forgiveness and charity, things may change; you will be only reaping as you sow. But as it is, your ill feeling will bring you nothing but worry and distress. Who knows whether the skull has any secret at all? and if it has, and must give it up some day, it will be, I am sure, to the pure and good—perhaps never to you; but it may be to yours."

On this speech of the vicar's old Jacob meditated profoundly. In his mind whatever the vicar said was the nearest to the Bible that could be; in fact, it took possession of the old man's mind. And now the "Flying Skull" entered on a wholly new phase of its history so far as the old sexton was concerned. Jacob Soames' whole mind seemed bent how to get its secret out of it in the vicar's way. For the vicar to think that the skull may possibly have some secret connected with it, was for Jacob to feel sure that it must be so (though he had not said that there was anything to be revealed at all); and for him to say that any good thing could be revealed from the other world only to the good was and must be—at least to him—undoubted truth. And so Jacob began to cast about day and night for the possibility of doing something, and what that something could be.

Days and months passed by, while Jacob Soames' own skull was being racked, and nothing seemed to come of it. Meanwhile, his only son died, leaving the old man with only a granddaughter, little Elspeth, and her small brother. These two and old Jacob now formed the household; and the old man's thoughts were fixed upon this small boy—Elspeth's twin. Could he by any possibility come in for Blaystone Manor he would die in peace. And perhaps he might. The children were too young to have become defiled by his own cursing spirit, and their father, who had been instructed in it, and imbibed it to the full, was now dead and gone.

Surely the time of the unravelling of the mystery of the "Flying Skull" must be at hand. Old Jacob's own spirit was becoming somewhat mellowed; for six months he had not cursed the "Flying Skull" nor the memory of the man whose part effigy it was. The sexton, in his mixed character of undertaker and sexton, had seen much death; he had coffined many a body—many a one of his own friends; but it was a long time since he had seen one of his own kith and kin—nay, his own very flesh and blood—lying waxen and white and cold.

The sight of his dead son had left a great and unwonted impression on his mind. He had studied those marble features—the tightly closed lips, the fast-shut eyes; he had allowed the silence and solitude of death to strike in upon his mind; he had, so far as his blunted faculties would permit, heard some of the utterances of those other-world voices, which are ever speaking in the immediate presence and the active memories of the dead. The revelations of the other life had come even to such as he. Not that death could make its finer vibrations thrill in the old sexton's soul, but it could wake some better, some other-world thoughts, such as in his son's lifetime had been quite unknown.

The dead were associated in the sexton's mind with little more than cursing; the skull was embodied death, and to curse the skull was a part of Jacob Soames' daily business in life. These maledictions upon the insensate marble, and, if only he could reach the original, upon it, and the one to whom it belonged, were entirely in a personal capacity: professionally, sextonorially, Jacob would have lived with it on the same terms of amity. I may almost say of affection as he did with all the skulls and cross-bones in Blaystone churchyard. Ah! they were decent, respectable, consistent, comprehensible skulls and bones. What more natural than that a skull should have some of its own bones crossed underneath it to keep it company?—it looked neighbourly and friendly; and the cherubs' heads, with the chubby cheeks and curly hair. they, too, looked all right with their wings; 't was only the proper thing that such happy-looking creatures should have something to fly about with; if they had been butterflies' wings Jacob would not have objected to them—but that hideous Blaystone skull! Well, there was one comfort, the wings weren't large; they were only about as big as a pigeon's, and, whatever they might be able to do, they'd never be able to carry that skull to heaven.

But, as I have just been saying, a certain amelioration was coming over Jacob's mind; active hostility towards the dead was beginning to come to an end. That was the first step in the way of improvement, and the first, I may add, to the discovery of the secret of the "Flying Skull."

Dead, dead, long ago, long ago, away in the mysterious land, past all human feelings: why should Jacob hate! he was not to be the judge. And so he came to this—that he was able to keep himself from cursing the skull; but beyond this he could not get. To him, to him, therefore, could never be yielded up the mystery of that "Flying Skull."

Nevertheless this much was very valuable, for it saved little Elspeth, his grandchild, from being forced, by the persistency of her grandfather, into, perhaps, imbibing his old views, and, it may be, in the end following his bad ways. Elspeth was saved from this, and was left to the promptings of her own uncontaminated heart—a heart which loved everybody and everything, and which never could be brought up to the present to curse the "Flying Skull." Elspeth's feeling for the bad man, a part of whom she was told it represented, was one of pity. In her simplicity she thought he must have been very bad to have been so ugly; and now, at any rate, he could not do any more harm, and was it not punishment enough for him, so far, at least, as her father and grandfather were concerned, to be kept up there all that time, and to have to stay there for perhaps all time, looking so ugly, and having all the people who looked at him saying how ugly he was, and how ugly he must have been?

She knew what she herself had felt when she had once been put in a corner and had her face all blubbered over with tears; but, dreadful as her appearance then was, she felt it was nothing to compare with that of that awful-looking "Flying Skull."

Perhaps it was because less was said in her grandfather's cottage against the "Flying Skull," and the one of whom it was so far the representation, that Elspeth Soames was able to grow in kindly feeling to the one whose hideous emblem it so far was. Even to the thing itself she ceased to have any active repulsion, and in her own childish way began to pity it.

"Poor thing! you have been up there long enough; I wish someone could take you down and bury you. If grandfather will take you down, I'll put flowers over the place where he buries you. I hear grandfather say you know a great deal, only you can't speak, and he says you wouldn't speak even if you could; but you know that's naughty; and if you've been naughty for a long time I'm sure you wouldn't like to be so always. But you'll never come down—no, not till the end of the world; but I'll tell you what," said Elspeth: "Grandfather doesn't talk against you any more, and perhaps he'll take you up some flowers if I send them. I'll make you a wreath of daisies and buttercups when the spring comes, and if you have any secret perhaps you'll tell it to me. I'll promise, if you like, I won't tell it to anyone. I'll promise, mind; but even if you don't, you shall have the flowers," and Elspeth tripped lightly out of the church.

Did those kindly words, childish as they were, enter the bony holes where your ears ought to have been, long-since-dead John Soames? had you about you anything of flesh and blood? Was it so that the very marble orifices themselves were obliged to let into your skull words which had about them any touch of love? I wonder if through your effigy, or thus much of it, there passed to the other world—wherever it is—wherever you were in it—the sounds of that magic which ascends like incense and falls like dew—which is in silence which scorns words, and in music which must utter itself in sound. I wonder, John Soames of former days, yet living somewhere still, did that marble skull cry to you out of its ill-toothed jaws, did its secret call to you and say that its time was coming and that it would soon be out? Were your tongue allowed to come back to those lantern jaws, I wonder would you have told out willingly the secret which you must have felt was passing from you for ever; it may be that words of love were too terrible to you, and your marble self could not stand them; or perchance too sweet, so that you did not desire to resist them. I cannot solve the mystery. All I can say is this, that the day Elspeth Soames promised that you should be crowned with buttercups and daisies your secret was doomed, your existence was practically gone. A child with buttercups and daisies could do more than generations of cursers with thorns and briars. The crack of doom was near the "Flying Skull."

(To be concluded.)

BREADTH, LENGTH, DEPTH, HEIGHT.

A SERMON TO THE MEMBERS OF A SCRIPTURE UNION.

BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., VICAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S, Highbury.

"To comprehend the breadth, and length, and depth, and height."—Eph. iii. 18 (part).

YOU have all heard, of course, of the Temple of Ephesus. It was a very large and a very beautiful structure, and in its time was considered one of the "seven wonders of the world." How much money they spent upon its erection I cannot tell you, but the sum was enormous; and two hundred and twenty years were occupied in putting up the gigantic pile. There was one other peculiarity about the building, besides its size and beauty and costliness, which I should like to mention. It had been placed between the foot of a mountain and the head of a marsh, so that it became necessary to lay very deep and solid foundations, and to make vast drains underneath the ground, before the upper part of the temple could be proceeded with. Just bear this in mind, my dear children, for you will be able, if you do so, to understand better the word "depth" which St. Paul uses in the text.

Let me say another word about this temple. It had been erected in honour of a heathen goddess called Artemis. I suppose a great lump of "meteoric" stone, drawn downwards by the attraction of the earth, had fallen in a field near Ephesus. Such a fall sometimes happens when our globe passes through a belt of these stones; and the "shooting stars," which you see on a fine clear autumn evening, are nothing more than such fragments set on fire by their rapid motion through the air. But the people in those days, clever as they were, did not know what we know about such matters; and when the black mass came tumbling out of the sky they thought that their great god, Jupiter, had thrown it down, and they took it and carved it into a rough likeness of a woman, and set it up in a shrine, and then built the temple over it, and worshipped it with sacrifices, and processions, and hymns, and prayers, and spent their money lavishly upon it, and were very proud indeed of their goddess, and of the grand house in which she was supposed to dwell.

Such was the Temple of Ephesus. And as it happened to be the most magnificent object with which the Christians of that city were acquainted, St. Paul glanced at it when he wished to describe to them the love of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is as if he said, "This great building in your town is so vast that you have to examine it carefully, to look all over and study it, before you can quite comprehend it. You notice the height of its pillars, the breadth of its courts, the length of its aisles, and the depth and strength of the foundations on which it rests, and, after a time, you can see what a great and marvellous work it is. But much grander and greater is the love of the Lord Jesus Christ; and, though the more you think about that love the more you will be able to understand it, there will be always something beyond your comprehension—for the love of Christ 'passeth knowledge.'

Now, it has occurred to me, that what St. Paul says about the love of Christ might be said about the Holy Bible, and that we might very properly compare the Bible to a temple, or, let me say, to a huge cathedral—such as we have in London and in other parts of the country. A few days ago, a kind friend of mine, who is a very clever man and a famous preacher, took me and some of my family over Westminster Abbey. He knows the Abbey well in every part, and, of course, it was a great advantage and pleasure for us to put ourselves under his guidance, and to listen to what he had to say about the building; and when I think of the agreeable hours we spent with him, I feel much inclined to make a comparison between the Abbey and the Bible.

Let me do so then.

I. In the first place, our friend told us that the Abbey was not the work of one man, and that it did not reach completion until many, many years from the time when its foundation-stone was laid. The same thing is true of the Bible. It was not written all at once, but bit by bit, book by book; and the writing extended over a space of nearly fifteen hundred years, reckoning from Genesis to Revelation. The list of writers, too, is rather a long one; and in it we find a lawgiver, a soldier, a king, more than one priest, and certainly one man from amongst the ranks of the common people—I mean Amos the prophet, who was a herdsman and a gatherer of sycamore fruit. Then, coming down to the New Testament, there are amongst the writers a pharisee, a publican, and a doctor, and one or two fishermen, and another man, about whose name we are not perfectly sure. What a variety there is! And all these men, under the guidance and teaching of the Spirit of God, contributed each his share to the building up of that wonderful Book, which we call "the Bible."

Then our friend told us that although so many different persons—some of them kings, who gave the orders; others of them architects, who made the drawings; others of them masons and carpenters, who did the hard work—had been engaged in the erection of the Abbey, and although it took so long a time in building—still one plan was adhered to throughout, and there was never any deviation from it at any time. We may say the same thing of the Scriptures. Whatever the writers wrote about, they referred to the Lord Jesus Christ. I do not intend to say that they were conscious of doing so. Probably they were not. But for all that, what they said pointed to Jesus Christ. I have often thought that the Books of the Bible are like so many boxes with locks, the locks being of different size, shape, material, and construction; some of them very old, some not so old, and some of them very unlike the rest. But one key unlocks them all. You know what key I mean—I mean Jesus Christ. See if that key does not fit, and open all the locks.

And then our friend, taking us over the building, showed us many very curious and beautiful things, which we should never have discovered for ourselves: and explained to us the meaning of them. Sometimes it was a tomb, and he told us the history of the man or woman whose bones were mouldering in it below; sometimes it was a statue, and then we had the story of its erection, and the reason why it had been put in that particular place; and sometimes it was a large piece of sculpture, with groups of figures, which we could never have understood without his explanation; and we all thought, as he led us on from point to point, what an advantage it was to us to have such a guide, and how much information and how much pleasure we should have lost if he had not been with us. And then I was reminded that you and I have a Guide who explains to us the Scripture, and enables us to see beauties in it which we should never have found out if He had not shown them to us. Of course you know that I refer to the Holy Spirit whom God gives to those who ask for His gracious help and teaching. Without this Holy Spirit you and I would never really care for the Bible at all. And without this Holy Spirit you and I would never be able to understand the Bible at all. But He is the Interpreter, the Guide. And when we are reading a passage He throws light upon it: He points out Christ in it. And the next time we read the passage He points out something fresh, for there is always something new to be found in the Bible. You remember what we sing in Church—

"Oh, may these heavenly pages be
My ever dear delight,
And still new beauties may I see,
And still increasing light."

The writer is speaking of the "pages" of Scripture, in which the Guide shows us something more, and something more, and something more each time that we read these pages with an earnest and attentive heart.

II. Perhaps some of you have felt a little disappointed about the Bible. It is not so interesting, you say, as you have been led to expect. You read it as a duty, and because you have promised your parents that you will do so, but you find little pleasure in the perusal. If you ever feel this, just remember two things. First, that perhaps you have only yourself to blame. You have, it may be, been too hasty and hurried in your reading. Suppose that on a bright, sunshiny day you were to walk out of the blaze of the sun, and the noise of the London streets, into the Abbey we have been speaking of, and just to run round the building, and after casting a cursory glance at it, to come out again—do you think you would be much the better or the wiser for the proceeding? Of course not. You have to stay long enough in the building to get accustomed to the softened light. Then, you have to observe the building thoughtfully, to dwell upon it, so that the features sink down into your mind. And so with the passage in your Bible. Just to look at it hastily, just to run it over, is not enough. You must think about it; meditate upon it; try to understand it thoroughly, to get at its inner meaning. The second thing I wish you to remember is, that even if you are a careful reader, and a reverent reader, as I hope you are, you will require time to comprehend a great subject. Travellers who have been to Egypt tell us that they have been much disappointed at the first view of the great Pyramid. It seemed so small, they said, compared with their anticipations of its size, though, as perhaps you know, its base is as large as the area of Lincoln's Inn Fields, and its summit is far higher than the golden cross at the top of St. Paul's. Only when they came up to it, and measured themselves against one of the vast stones of which it is composed, did they really see how enormous it was. And I have heard the same thing said of the wonderful Church of St. Peter's at Rome. At first sight it fell far short of the idea which the visitor had formed about it. But by-and-by, after he had got accustomed to the building, and compared one part with another, and had given attention to it—in fact, after his eye had become educated to take it all in—his opinion completely changed, and he was no longer disappointed.

Remember, then, that you require time to learn to value the Bible as it ought to be valued.

III. And now let us draw to a close. What shall my "practical application" be this afternoon? I think I see what it ought to be.

On former occasions I have urged upon you to read your Bibles regularly. Not, perhaps, long passages at a time. A short passage, well understood, will do you more good than a long passage just read over, and little more done. But, anyhow, form your plan of reading, and stick to it. You take your meals regularly, and at regular times; why should you not take regular meals of the spiritual food of the Word of God? I think you would feel obliged to do so if your soul were in a healthy state. The other day, perhaps, you could not eat your breakfast when breakfast-time came. Why not? I ask. "Oh!" you say, "I wasn't well." Exactly so. But when you got well again, you relished your breakfast as much as ever. And when you find you do not care for your Bible, and begin to neglect the regular reading of it, just ask yourself, "Is not my soul out of order? Is my soul in sound health?" In religion, my dear children, as in other things, be on your guard against a fits-and-starts way of going to work. Let everything be regular, orderly, and systematic. Now all that, I think, is good advice.

Then I have asked you to remember that you must take pains in reading your Bible, because no good thing in this world is to be got without trouble. And I have counselled you to do as the Bible directs us to do, to "seek for wisdom as silver, and to search for her as for lost treasures." And that, too, is sound advice.

Then, on former occasions, I have pointed out to you the very great importance of obeying the precepts of the Bible. "Be ye doers of the Word, and not hearers only," says St. James. Why do we use the Bible? For this reason amongst others, that we may ascertain what God's will is, and may submit ourselves to it. And if we love God, we are glad to know what He expects of us; and we are glad to do our very best to please Him. So I have advised you to practise what you know; to say to yourself, "God tells me to do this thing. By His help I will do it. God tells me to avoid that other thing. By His help I will avoid it." And this advice, too, has been good advice, I am sure.

But my advice to-day refers to a different subject, although I have not altogether forgotten the subject when I have preached to you before. To-day, however, it comes to the front. I ask, when you enter that great Cathedral, the Bible, for the purpose of understanding the breadth, and length, and depth, and height of it, that you should take with you the great GUIDE whom God has provided for you and promised to give you—the Holy Spirit—that He may lead you into the knowledge of all the truth which it is necessary for you to know.

EYES TO THE BLIND.

HE was eyes to the blind, he was feet to the lame,
To the light of his brightness the wise-hearted came,

Till it paled in the glow of the Wonderful Name!

Of the meek man of Uz I incredulous heard,
While the spirit within me to anger was stirred
By a cross of no moment—a look or a word.

But, when my impatience our Father would mend,
He plunged me in darkness my soul to befriend;
Then I heard and believed, and I wait for His end.

The One I confide in is eyes to the blind,
He has borne all the sorrows and sins of mankind,
And blessed are they who have drunk of His mind!

Oh, far more than rich is a child who reveres
The mother that bare her. One weeps with my tears,
And lays on her shoulder the weight of my years;

The child of my true love—no daughter of Heth—
And visions of Life, as it tramples on Death, Shine faithful and true when they float on her breath.

My soul is in prison, yet still I can say,
His will is perfection, 'tis sweet to obey;
'Twas a Love passing knowledge that darkened my day.

When one friend forsakes us, some other draws near;
Though sealed are mine eyes, I can see, with my ear,
And the things of the Kingdom looked never so clear.

And it may be by blindness my darling I train
How life shall be Christ, and how dying be gain:
O God, to Thy lovers no lot comes in vain!

GEORGE S. OUTRAM.

"LIFT UP YOUR HEARTS"; OR, WORDS OF GOOD CHEER.

THE DESPONDENT.

BY THE REV. W. MANN STATHAM.

THE counsels of Holy Writ become at once sacred commands to the Christian, and the first practical question is, How can we fulfil the duties demanded of us? That these counsels are right and wise we do not stay to debate. That they are Divine words, and therefore right and wise, is axiomatic with us all; but that our blessedness is concerned in them we are sometimes more slow to perceive. The Bible is a book of consolations as well as counsels; indeed, they are joined together, and no man can put them asunder. No thoughtful student of human life can fail to notice that despondency is a very frequent state of heart. "Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me?" are queries that belong not alone to the old time before us. We all, indeed, utter such soliloquies to our own souls in these modern times. As the poem has it—

"We are tired,
My heart and I."

Our meditations, therefore, in this paper will run along the line of present need. We are not debating old-world problems, or puzzling ourselves with philosophic prelections. Ours is emphatically a living subject. Like St. Paul, we too are often in heaviness through manifold temptations and tribulations, and it may do us some good to ponder a counsel so Heaven-breathed as this, "Lift up your hearts."

First of all, then, is it SIN that troubles us? Is the conscience hot and the spirit full of the sting of sin? Is MEMORY at work, raking up the embers of past faults and failings, of old shortcomings and sins? If this be so, let us not try to drown remembrance in the waters of Lethe, for no oblivion of the past is really possible to us. Rather let us exercise memory in another direction. Let us remember that "where sin abounded grace did much more abound." We can come nigh and touch THE CHRIST and THE CROSS, and we can listen to the music of those old prophetic words, "Comfort ye, comfort ye, My people, saith your God; speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her that her transgression is forgiven, that her iniquity is covered, for she hath received at the Lord's hand double for all her sin." With penitent contrition and the profound peace of faith, we can once more receive the Divine absolution, and rest upon the promise, "The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth from all sin." "Lift up your hearts!" Yes, "Be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee; go in peace."

Or perhaps it is disappointment that clouds the spirit. Our purposes have miscarried; but God's purposes are higher than ours, and these have not miscarried. Where would the flower-strewn path we wanted to take have led us? That we know not. Perhaps we are not so saintly as we thought we were; perhaps the temptations connected with a more prosperous temporal weal would have overcome our heroism. Perhaps the wizardry of the world would have cast a spell over us as fatal as it is fascinating. Perhaps associations would have been formed with those whose flattery born of favour would have drawn us into distance from God and delight in sin! Lift up your hearts! "The finger is more than the ring," says an old proverb. The soul is more than the estate. You may have suffered in the one, but you have saved the other.

Or it may be that habit has become a tyrant, not indeed in relation to vice, but in connection with what we ignorantly call trifles, until these silken cords have turned into iron chains. Little exercises of self-denial have been neglected; the oratory of devotion has been turned into the chamber of sloth; the incipient indulgences of the table, not perhaps in wine, but in luxurious repast, have quickened the edge of appetite to the detriment of a wise self-discipline. We sit loose-braced to the world. We are the easy prey of the minor temptations of life, and self-denial and self-sacrifice are experiences of yesterday. Our "Jeremy Taylors," our "Goulburns," our "Kebles" we do not exactly know where to lay our hands on, and our Bibles and books of devotion are somewhat dust-covered through disuse. With the decline of the soul's health there comes decline of the soul's happiness too: our joy in God, which is our only true joy, is gone; but temporary eclipse is not destruction of the Sun, and in the gloom of the darkness we cry out, "Return, O Lord: how long?" Then we remember that "He is not far from every one of us," and that He will "restore unto us the joy of His Anointed," if we but seek His face again. Lift up your hearts! The morning beams are shooting up into the horizon. With new life in God will come new conquests over self and sin. We have fallen from our high estate; but to fall is not to be lost. "Rejoice not over me, O mine enemy, for when I fall I shall arise." Lift up your hearts! Why? The answer is complete. "Greater is He that is for us than all that can be against us."

"Lift up your hearts," then, is a manifold counsel, for it applies to all our experiences of depression and sadness and unrest. We must, however, be cautious, in our philosophy of conduct, concerning obedience to this counsel: for certainly it is not meant that we should forego sobriety of heart and sanctity of life. In our need EXCITEMENT is not to be the panacea for either grief or gloom. What we want is equability of temperament—a joy that is profound and permanent, not one that is ephemeral and empty. We are never to be lifted out of the range of religious feeling—the divine is always to dominate the human; for religion, as Archer Butler beautifully says, is "not to diversify our life, but to be our life." Many "lift up their hearts" through the wine-cup and the ministries of fun and frivolity, only to "let them down" afterwards into still more abysmal depths of depression. It is one of the "notes" of true religion that life's inner joy is permanent; for "My joy no man taketh away from you." We claim on behalf of the Christian faith, that asceticism finds no shelter under its wing—that belongs to Egyptian gloom, not to the changeless light of the Gospel. Our Lord, in giving us a "holy lapid" in the heart, has given us a "happy land" there also, and He has transfigured the life "that now is" by filling it with the prophecies and promises of the life that is to come. Lift up your hearts; this fatherland of yours is a parable of the Great Fatherland—this Home is a foreshadowing of the Father's home—this citizenship is the preparation for the City not made with hands, for the Kingdom which is eternal in the heavens. Life is thus emancipated from the dread dominion of DEATH; for the Christian life even here has in it the elements of the life eternal.

Let us not, then, be foolish enough to refuse our blessedness, and let us remember that a daily cheerful gladness of heart is to a large extent a matter of cultivation. We ought to cherish such a view of God as Our Father as will lift life out of undue care and anxiety. Our Blessed Lord intended us to do this. "Your Heavenly Father," He said, "knoweth what things ye have need of." "Take no anxiety for the morrow." "When ye pray, say, Our Father which art in Heaven." I have noticed in life the too occasional character of our cheerfulness. Some people who are bright at night are budgy in the morning, and some who are brilliant in society are sad when they are solitary. Now we ought to cultivate a faith in God, and a "joy of faith," as the Holy Scripture has it, which will fill all life with the music of a Father's footstep, and cover it with the bright sky of an immortal hope.

But why ought we to lift up our hearts, we ask again? God wills it, and that is our reason, and surely we may see that it is for our soul's health as well as our soul's happiness. But there is yet another reason. We ought to consider others, and as we provoke to love we ought to provoke to gladness too. Some Christians have this faculty in a wonderful degree. They are not wits or humorists, or punsters or jesters, for these people are often failures, and seem to be "pumping up" their supplies out of very empty wells. No! the souls I refer to have cultivated a happy spirit of dependence upon God—have learned, by the experience of others, the faithfulness of God to His promises, have remembered His mercies and loving-kindnesses which have been ever of old, and have put away from them as unworthy of their Christian faith all doubts concerning the love and care of their Father in Heaven. What welcome is given to those who carry with them the sweet and simple flower called "heart's-ease," and whose very presence irradiates the sick-chamber as with light from Heaven!

"Lift up your hearts": the more at first this meets us as a difficulty should we earnestly set ourselves to fulfil it as a duty; and we should remember that the spirit of life is more than material possessions or magnificent attainments, and this spirit is, as I have said, a communicable gift. "Heaviness in the heart of man maketh it stoop, but a good word maketh it glad." It is easy to have pianos in the house and never to use them, and it is easy to have golden treasures on our little closet tables, and never to carry out their counsels. What we all want is the grace of God's Holy Spirit to fulfil the petition: "We humbly beseech Thee, that, as by Thy special grace preventing us Thou dost put into our minds good desires, so by Thy continual help we may bring the same to good effect; through Jesus Christ our Lord."

I quite admit that despondent people have great claim to consideration as sometimes the subjects of phlegmatic temperament and of a physical nervousness which only the superficial and the heartless talk flippantly about. Men and women have sore burdens often to bear, and often bear them bravely, with a quiet endurance which is better, after all, in the sight of God, than the brightness of those who have unbroken health and buoyant spirits. And yet it remains true of them also, that religion is their best anodyne, and that the Christian faith, with its perfect revelation of the Fatherhood of God, can put a brightness even into their lives such as no merely human force can do. Finally, the Holy Book says to all of us, "Lift up your hearts," as the last days come upon us, for after pain of body, loss of health, departure of friends, and solitude of estate, Home is awaiting us in the great Beyond, and our redemption draweth nigh. Despondency might, and did, belong to the children of so-called light-hearted Greece as eventide drew nigh, for their faith was corrupted and their hope was dead; but the Christian, even "unto this last," can rejoice with a joy unspeakable and full of glory.

THE REV. HUGH PRICE HUGHES ON THE WESLEYAN WEST-END MISSION.

AN INTERVIEW WITH MR. HUGHES BY OUR SPECIAL COMMISSIONER.

N the northern verge of that labyrinth of squares lying between Oxford Street and the Euston Road is the quiet little London street where the leader of the Forward Movement in Wesleyan Methodism has lately made his home.

Dull and possibly dreary it might be, but for the trees of Gordon Square and Endsleigh Gardens which wave at either end. Yet the dulness may not be without its compensation, for it is quiet; and up-stairs in Mr. Hughes's dwelling is a little room—quite silent for central London—where, surrounded by his books, and with an outlook on a little enclosure which does duty for garden, he thinks out his work or transacts his business as director of that novel religious movement, the Wesleyan West-End Mission.

The position is characteristic. While by no means insensible to the charms of aestheticism and of what may be called the hallowed romance and tender poetry which cling around many a minister's life and home, yet everything must be sacrificed for the successful prosecution of the work to which he has been called.

And what is that work? Briefly, it is the management of the new Evangelistic Movement which Wesleyans have recently begun in the West End of London. Further, he is one of the leaders—if not the principal—of what he calls the Forward Movement. This is a movement of which aggressive mission work is part and parcel, and which, as he himself expresses it, strives to show the people that Jesus Christ is the best Friend they ever had, and that His principles will do more for them than Socialism; that Christianity should influence all aspects of social life, and is not “played out,” but that it has a message for men and women now, to-day, in this life as well as for the life that is to come.

He seems just the man for the new Mission. Full of enthusiasm, earnestness, “go,” he unites culture and learning with a popular style and a sympathetic voice. A somewhat tall, spare figure dressed in ordinary clerical garb, with a fund of feeling and kindness in his calm eyes, which yet can flash out finely on occasion, he is just the man to attract and control large audiences, without repelling the refined or sensitive. He is emphatically what our American cousins would call a “live man.”

He is yet young, having been born in 1847, at Carmarthen, in South Wales, where his father is to-day a highly esteemed medical man, and like himself a staunch Wesleyan. His grandfather was a Wesleyan minister, and notable if only for this, that he was the first Welshman ever elected a member of the Legal Hundred. After preaching in various towns, and for some time at Oxford, Mr. Hughes was removed to Brixton, in the south of London, and in the autumn of 1887 was relieved from the charge of a pastorate in order to devote himself to the special evangelistic work in the West End. And it is perhaps characteristic of the man that he then set to work to find a house, as he himself told us, within walking distance of St. James's Hall, Piccadilly, to avoid Sunday travelling.

"You regard the new Mission work of Wesleyan Methodism as its most important phase, Mr. Hughes?"

His eyes flash out with rare enthusiasm as the answer instantly comes—

"It is the vital phase! And this West-End Mission upon which we have entered is the key to the position. It is our Malakoff! Everyone feels that. During the last twelve years we have witnessed a revival of the old enthusiastic aggressive Methodist spirit. A new generation had arisen which had not passed through that paralysing strife and schism of '49, which seemed to cause the feeling that our race was run and our day was over. Older members were fearful of innovations, remembering that schism. But the new generation does not dread change, and so gradually a feeling arose that we must be aggressive. Ten years ago Conference accepted temperance work and Bands of Hope as an integral part of our Church activity. Then laymen were admitted to Conference for the first time—a great blessing, which has largely helped the Forward Movement. Again, we were the first body which protested against certain Acts of Parliament which we believed to be immoral. All these things brought us more into touch with the time.

"Ultimately there were three marked developments in the Forward Movement:—

"(1) An extraordinary interest in the villages; (2) a growing feeling that we have not been holding our own in the great centres of population; and lastly, (3) the great enterprise in London.

"Now, with regard to the first. We have been making exhaustive inquiries, and we are now publishing more complete returns as to the state of our villages than have ever been published before. We find there are about 19,000 small towns and villages in England, each having less than 3,000 inhabitants, and there is some branch of Methodism in 10,000 of these. Thus there are 9,000 of such villages in which Methodism is not represented; but during the last twenty years we have occupied 500 villages. Of course, in some of these 9,000 the Church of England, and other Nonconformist bodies than ourselves, are represented. But while carefully avoiding all competition with every other evangelical Church, it is now our fixed resolve as soon as possible to preach the Gospel in every village. Our organisation, utilising the aid of our local preachers, enables us to do this, and to do it at small cost. We feel a special responsibility in this work, and under our new Home Mission Secretary, the Rev. J. E. Clapham, we are beginning a new campaign in the villages, the like of which has never been seen since the days of Wesley. The Rev. Thomas Champness, too, has started a new order of evangelists—paid lay agents of a new class—and the Home Mission Committee are utilising these men with much success.

"Then with regard to our position in large provincial towns. We find some of our large chapels in the great centres of population half-empty. (This, it may be remarked parenthetically, does not appear to be an experience with which the Wesleyan denomination is alone familiar, for the same causes seem to be at work in all.) Some of the people have gone to the suburbs, and the services are not adapted to those who dwell in the neighbourhood. Therefore, we are going to alter everything to secure the ear of the people. A splendid experiment has been crowned with success at Manchester. There, we had Oldham Street Chapel, which used to be crowded; it became nearly empty. The place was pulled down and rebuilt in an entirely altered manner at a cost of £50,000. There is a fine hall up-stairs, holding 1,500 people, and it is always crowded. Underneath, facing the street, are several shops, which are let to good tenants.

"It is the alteration in the services which has wrought the change. Seat-rents are abolished. We have a band, short prayers, hymns printed for each day, and bright, brief, pithy addresses. From elaborate inquiries made by the Rev. S. F. Collier, the director of this Mission, it has been found that seventy-five per cent. of the attendants never went before to a place of worship. This is the kind of thing we mean to do in the large towns. Some of us have been agitating for it for years. A similar experiment is now to be made in Birmingham, and we have been equally successful both in Clerkenwell and in the East End of London. Thus, you see, in addition to our ordinary work, which suits some people, we are going to have a distinctly different kind of service, of a popular type and evangelical in character.

"But, thirdly, our great enterprise is—London, the greatest city in the world, a little world in itself. Now, Wesleyan Methodism has never flourished in London as in some of the country districts. It took but little root until, some twenty years ago, some excellent laymen started the chapel-building fund. Since then some ninety chapels have been built, at a cost of about half a million of money. But we felt these were all for the middle-class; they were not in inner London. We felt we ought to do more for the masses. After prolonged discussion, therefore, we started the London Mission.

"Now, I would like to say here that the Wesleyan London Mission is one and indivisible. The enterprise of which I have been appointed director is simply the West-End branch of that Mission. A beginning was made at St. George's-in-the-East, near Ratcliff Highway. The chapel there used to be deserted. It was handed over to my friend the Rev. Peter Thompson, who has done there much the same as has been done at Oldham Street, Manchester. A number of ladies and gentlemen come from wealthier quarters to help in the work, and thus the rich and the poor are brought together. For in this Forward Movement we recognise that we must provide for social wants as well as spiritual, and among other triumphs, Mr. Thompson and his friends have captured 'Paddy's Goose,' a notorious public-house, and use it for the rational recreation and benefit of the people.

"In Clerkenwell, the Rev. Edward Smith has again done much the same thing. The idea being to adapt the place to the people, and to care for them socially as well as what may be called 'spiritually.' Near by also is the Whitecross Street Mission, carried on by boys and old scholars of our Leys School, Cambridge. This is also doing a good work.

"But, as I have said, the West-End Mission is our Malakoff. There we found a greater Methodist wilderness than anywhere else. There live 400,000 people without any Methodist chapel. The West End seems to me the headquarters of wickedness. Satan's seat is there. It is the Vanity Fair of the world.

"Now there are thousands of young Methodists employed in the West End for whom we have done nothing. Further, it is a cosmopolitan spot; political refugees congregate there; everything seems to gravitate there; and without disparaging the work of other Churches, we believe we have a work in this cosmopolitan district, in this centre of the realm.

"What do we propose to do? Well, we do not exactly know. That is our glory. We place ourselves in the hands of God and say, 'Lord, what wilt Thou have us to do?' The problem is so complicated, we must keep our minds open; we will not be tied by red tape.

"But I wish to say that the Mission will be very catholic in its basis. We shall heartily welcome the co-operation of all Churches, and any converts whom we hope to make will be at perfect liberty to join any Church they may please.

"Further, music will play a prominent part. We shall have a brass band and an orchestra, and we shall endeavour to secure the most suitable agents in various branches of work. My first application was to Mark Guy Pearse, who is so well known by his books. He will take certain services, but he will not share the responsibility of the Mission. He will preach on Sunday mornings and on Fridays, when we hope to have such a noonday service in the West End as Dr. Parker holds every Thursday at the City Temple. Then on Sunday afternoons we propose to have a somewhat peculiar service. It will take the form of a Conference, when we hope that many Christians, belonging to various departments of life, will be able to testify to the value of Christianity in the business or profession to which they belong. There are many, perhaps, who could not preach or write, who could yet take part in such a conference. Such a service will be attractive to men. We want to show that Jesus Christ is the best Friend the human race has ever had. This is a side of Christianity that must be presented.

"Well, then there are thousands of young people in the West-End shops. What have they to do in the evening? We want to get hold of them, and encourage them to join choral societies and social evenings, and so forth. Also, we hope to have a Medical Mission, and likewise a Christian Workers' Home, where Christian ladies, who will give themselves up to the work, might live. I have long felt that ladies might give themselves to such work as do the "sisters" and nuns, etc., in the Churches of England and of Rome, without, however, taking the vows, and so on, considered necessary in those communities.

"As to buildings, we have taken St. James's Hall, Piccadilly, for Sundays and Fridays only, at a rent of £1,200 a year, and in addition to this the London Congregational Union have in a most brotherly manner placed their hall in Wardour Street at our disposal. We intend to have something going on there every night—for young people and artisans principally. On Saturday nights we intend to have a really first-rate concert there. You see, the principle of social provision for the people will be fully illustrated. But it must be understood that all arrangements are for the present temporary. What we must aim at is a great central building in the very heart of the West End, which will cost at least £30,000. But at present we must generate the enthusiasm in St. James's Hall, and from there we want to go into every back street and cranny. I myself mean to hold open-air meetings in Trafalgar Square and Hyde Park, and wherever the Socialists go. I want to show the people that Christianity is not "played out." Jesus Christ is their best Friend yet.

"I have been led altogether by a way I know not to this. It would be difficult to give you an adequate conception of the steps which have tended to it or of the interest it has aroused. Persistent advocacy in the paper I edit helped it on, no doubt; but I had not then the slightest idea that I should be chosen to direct the scheme. Whether we can cope with the difficulties remains to be seen. Our Church is a most elaborately organised Church, and consequently a very conservative one. It is therefore a very astounding sign of the times that such a conservative and highly organised Church should adopt such a new departure. There is no Church which has entered upon so novel an enterprise. Yet at the last Conference there was not a dissentient voice."

Most thinkers, if not all, who consider the subject will agree with Mr. Hughes that the unanimous acceptance of such an enterprise by so conservative a body is indeed a remarkable sign of the times, a sign that Church organisations, as well as others, can and must adapt themselves to the varying needs of humanity without compromise of essential principles. And as the visitor takes leave of Mr. Hughes he feels that he has been conversing with one who is eminently fitted for such an endeavour.

A WORD ON "MELANCHOLY CHRISTIANS."

BY THE REV. R. H. LOVELL, BROMLEY, KENT.

THE character of the Christian is intended to be perhaps the mightiest agent in spreading the Gospel. Christian life is God's best advertisement, when it is attractive. Assuredly there is no greater hindrance to the extension of the Christian religion than unlovely character. As character is formed slowly and often unconsciously, we are usually little aware of the impressions we produce on others. "To see ourselves as others see us" is indeed a rare attainment. May I then urge this inquiry?—Is it not possible that our representation of the Christian religion may be less bright and attractive than it ought to be, and than we should even wish it to be? May we not be unconsciously representing the religious life under too sad an aspect, and so, without intention, doing mischief to the spread of the Kingdom of Christ?

It is impossible for us to live apart from the society of others. Social life is both a necessity and a Divine ordination and instrument. We are bound up in families. We are obliged, in business life, in recreation, and in almost all the enterprises of life, to act with our fellows. No one can admire sadness. The human heart was made for joy. Delight is in itself a fascination. Men gather round brightness and shun sorrow everywhere. The secret of the success of much that is most wicked is the brightness and fascination with which it attracts men. Surely, of all things in the world, the Gospel of the love of God, the fact of salvation, ought to wear the most beautiful and attractive of appearances! We can never honour God, win men to Him, or glorify His love, if we represent religion as a sad and gloomy thing. What a difference in its influence amongst young men has a bright and open character as contrasted with one of a reserved and gloomy nature. What a mischievous effect on family life, when one member is cold, formal, and forbidding, and that one perhaps specially accounted the religious member of the family. How easily the most innocent enjoyment of a circle is destroyed by the frown of one out of sympathy with all gladness. It is a pleasant sight to watch the lamplighter on a dark evening going along the streets on a hill-side and kindling light after light, leaving behind him a pathway of marked illumination, instead of unrelieved darkness; but what homes, what schools, what businesses, would the world have for brightness, if only each Christian were a steady, constant light-bearer, revealing the beauty of Christ, and giving light, and help, and guidance to others who are in darkness. No mightier agent can exist for the spread of the Gospel than a bright, pure, glad life.

The very best test of what our character and life really are is not to be found by seeking to look into and at ourselves. Rather, we may more surely discover it by asking what effects we are producing on others. To look back over a few years of life, and ask ourselves this question, What is the fair outcome of my life in its influence on others? will be found to be an exercise at once most healthful and full of self-revelation. The lives of those around us may thus become a most instructive mirror: a mirror in which we shall often find delineations of our own characters, as to features we little thought we possessed. Sadness, discontent, and the absence of delight in our portraiture of the religious life, will then often be seen to have been a great hindrance to others becoming Christians.

Many reasons of a very subtle character may easily give a tone of sadness to the religious life. These may be neither suspected nor felt to be wrong. Few good people as yet confess the sin of being sad, or even think that it is a sin. Few regard delight as a most sacred duty and obligation. To rejoice in God is esteemed a luxury, but not a binding command and duty. To openly express our gladness for the world of beauty, for friendship and love, and Divine bounty and care, is not always regarded as an imperative obligation as to be honest.

We may become melancholy by carrying our sins and cares, rather than casting them fully and entirely into the gracious hand of Christ. We are so apt to think we give them to Him, and yet still to bear their burden ourselves. Thus we destroy the reality and fullness of the Divine love and pardon. We may take upon ourselves burdens in relation to the world's sin and wrong which are God's, and which He does not intend us to carry. We may thus seem to be more concerned about the sorrow of the world than God Himself, and appear more earnest than He seems to be to rectify at once all its mischiefs. The love and temper of many an earnest soul is thus "sicklied o'er with a cast of wearing solicitude." This is not trust, but distrust; not faith in God, but doubt.

Many imagine falsely that the highest goodness consists in an ideal in which sorrow is the prominent feature. An undertone of sweet melancholy is thought to be most consistent with piety, and that, in a sinful world, a bright, glad, expressive life is not either right or possible. Surely if this idea were the true one, then sunshine and flowers, and children's faces, and stars, and all beautiful things, ought not to find so large a place in the creation of God as they do. It is quite true that the highest life cannot be lived in a crowd. Isolation at times is necessary for the fullest communion with God. The sacred quiet of the morning, the hush of night, the stillness of the woods, all these have their charm and help for spirits which are bent on high purpose and effort. The mountain peaks cannot in the nature of things have much company with the valleys. In all new and great plans loneliness is largely a necessity. But when this is the case, there will be some great object before our minds. It will be quite right and safe for us to be much alone with God, if our concern is that, as the result of that isolation, we intend to be much more active amongst and for men. It is the melancholy that is born of merely personal disposition, and not the isolation that results from seeking some nobler level of life, that I am anxious to discountenance.

Too much self-introspection, indulged in merely for the sake of looking at self, will undoubtedly lead to a morbid life. We may have too much theoretical knowledge, and too little practical power. Our fingers may be too much and too often on the spiritual pulse. We may look so often at the roots of growth, and so disturb them, that no beautiful flower, or fruit for others' eating and joy, can ever grow. Melancholy is usually a most selfish attitude of mind. Self is its one thought. Too often its eye rests on nothing but the sad and dark. Imaginary evils fill its sad fancy. Supposed slights and neglects from others help its growth. It never can consort with anything but weakness. When health and vigour return, this sad disposition flees away. It is like mist and fog where there ought to be the sunshine of God's love. Like all clouds, it is earth-born, not heaven-sent.

It is inevitable that melancholy should narrow the mind, contract the vision, and warp and destroy sympathies and broader views and aims. What travel does for the mind, that a spiritual gladness will do for the heart. It will make us familiar with the beauties and joys of many other experiences and lives, and so give us ever increased reason for thankfulness and confidence. If we allow ourselves the habit of taking gloomy views of things, seeing the dark side of people, and growing to doubt whether this can succeed, or that ought to be attempted, such a habit of mind will feed upon itself, until at length the absence of all joy, all enterprise, all courage and hope, will be the experience of that old age, in which, of all seasons, cheerfulness is its own best reward and its most delightful ornament. To live in a world which seems all unlovely, to find in it few to love and trust, is indeed a penalty most terrible. It will come to those who persist in the culture of melancholy. They can neither love nor be loved.

If melancholy has any place in the Christian life, let us remember it has only a very partial place. The cloudy days when all is rain are few compared with the bright ones. Life is surely not to be built up by chiefly eating bitter herbs. Never let us suppose that December is more spiritual than May; the naked forest more beautiful than the spring woods; the raven more pure than the dainty robin. If we would only remember that it is the one special aim and design of Satan to cause gloom and sorrow, and the one great aim and end of Christ to cause joy and song, we should be more careful how we ever helped the Evil One to realise his wish. Christ's Gospel is our life's sunshine; the daily festival of the Spirit, the advertisement by us of our delight in the bounty and goodness of God. Even if sorrow comes to our life, the aim of Christ is to transfigure it, and make it beautiful with the brightness of His sympathy, and care, and far-reaching blessing.

If it be urged that we are to take up our cross and follow Christ, I reply we are to take up our cross only against what is weak and evil, not against the good, and bright, and lovely. Our very sorrow is to bring us higher life and fuller joy. We fail to see its object, and we defeat its purpose, and God's aim and wish, if we do not let it bring us blessing. We are then worshipping the medicine, not seeking health.

Christ tells us, in the Gospel by St. Matthew, that the Kingdom of Heaven is like young ladies going to a wedding. Surely, a very bright, attractive, and conspicuous picture! Everyone knows a bridesmaid. There is nothing but brightness and joy in her demeanour. The melancholy and depressed servant, who doubted his lord and did nothing with his talent, is cast out from the Kingdom into darkness. If melancholy and depression did no other mischief than both prevent us from working and hinder others, this alone would be ample ground for our determining not to appear sad, lest thereby we hindered work for Christ. Nothing hinders work and damps enthusiasm like melancholy.

The great cure for melancholy is to let God rule in all our life. Commit it all to Him, and then, as someone has well said, for one look at self let there be many a look at God. Less of self and more of God must bring joy. To leave all to Him and look much at Him will give us constant and abundant reason for brightness. Too often we take other Christians for our ideals rather than Christ. Paul is not our ideal, nor James, nor even John. They, at best, are only partial revelations of the perfect life. Christ, who is more than Paul, or James, or John, He in His fulness is our example and ideal. In the life of Christ there is not a trace of morbid or sad sentiment; not an imperfect line, nor a one-sided development; all classes and all true life received His glad, sympathetic welcome.

Two cities in our world may well stand for opposite types of human life—Paris and Venice. Paris stands for the symbol of idle gaiety and thoughtless pleasure, often far removed from innocence or purity. Even if Paris were as innocent as gay, I would not ask you for a moment to make her a type of your life.

Venice in the fourteenth century rose from the barren lagoon—rose from the sorrow of her persecuted people. Mark her origin. The people, in their sorrow, set to work to make Venice the noblest of cities. Colour, grace, beauty, are not only in the catndral, but everywhere. Whether the building be for pleasure, trade, or worship, it is beautifully ornamented with the Peacock, the Vine, and the Dove; these are the symbols of the Resurrection of Christ and of the Comforter. Here, then, home, trade, pleasure, civic life, religion, were all wedded to art, colour, beauty, and energy, and all ruled by great Christian truth and purpose, with nobility of aim and breadth of view. For a moment contrast Venice and its lofty buildings with the low mud drab walls of some African village—the houses colourless, graceless and unseemly. Which is the nobler ideal and type? What I plead for, then, is this: Our life's quest and ideal, not a life of thoughtless pleasure, not a life without earnestness, heart-sadness, and patient self-denial, not a life blind to life's tragedy and bitterness, and sin and strife; but, for all that, a life bright with God, entering into all His gifts and purposes, wide in its sympathies, gentle in its tolerance, charitable in its judgment, thankful to use all beauty as God's gift for man's use and help; confident of Christ's presence in life, and of His love; restful in the belief that He will triumph over all error and sin and sorrow. And because this is our belief, a life ready to enjoy every child's smile, every maiden's dream, every youth's game or ambition, every artist's ideal, every labourer's toil, every philanthropist's purpose, every nation's contribution to human good—a life broad and bright, and beautiful and busy, as Christ's own life was.

HALF A DOZEN HEROINES.

A STORY IN ONE CHAPTER.

BY THE HON. KATHERINE SCOTT.

HERE was a dulness about the town of Hornside which could only be described, like the Egyptian darkness, as a dulness that "might be felt."

There was one straight street, which contained square, grey stone houses, neither imposing nor ugly. There was a very grey, plainly built church, and a still more plainly built, dull-looking "Mechanics' Institute." There were shops at one end, but many of these had wire blinds, and concealed their charms like city warehouses. The men hung about listlessly at the corner near the inn, where stood the 'bus when it was not slowly grinding to the station; and past the inn there was a street leading to the non-fashionable part of the town, where the boys loitered playing marbles, and the mothers looked unkempt and weary.

The house with which we are chiefly concerned stood at the end of the street, and a little back, with a tiny strip of garden in front. It was a low house, with a sloping, red-tiled roof, and seemed the one and only remains of a picturesque beauty which it was reported had at one time belonged to the whole street, but which it certainly no longer possessed. The red-roofed house had belonged to a mysterious old bachelor, who was rarely seen, and whose death only caused a commotion in Hornside from the many suppositions as to what would be done with St. Hilda's.

The bushes grew very tangled in front, the little bricked path grew green with moss, and the jasmine over the door wildly luxuriant, before any of the numerous reports as to its future were fulfilled.

At last, on a showery June day, the 'bus from the station ground along the road, unusually loaded with boxes, stopped at the little gate, which had ceased to be any particular colour, and deposited the boxes and two ladies.

The genteel elderly ladies of Hornside peeped from behind their blinds, the young ones invented commissions which would oblige them to sally out at once, in spite of the damp, and the maids-of-all-work would gladly have made an unbidden afternoon attack on their respective doorsteps to gain a view of the arrivals at St. Hilda's.

How strange that they should have arrived so unexpectedly, and with apparently no preparations whatever!

True enough, there were no preparations whatever; the elder of the two produced a key, unlocked the house door, and requested the 'bus-man to deposit the boxes in the bare little hall; the younger stopped to gather some of the straggling jasmine, which caused the opposite neighbour, Mrs. Black, to exclaim—

"Bless my heart—gathering flowers to furnish an empty house! I wish my spectacles would enable me to see in, and see whatever they can be going to do. Two women and boxes set down like that! strange folks, and no mistake!"

Mrs. Black, with her orderly little parlour, her mats, her cushions, and all the little et ceteras which she had accumulated round her in twenty years of solitary gentility at No. 10, High Street, would indeed have been astonished had it been possible for her gaze to penetrate into the privacy of St. Hilda's and see how calmly indifferent the new inmates appeared. The taller but younger of the two was divesting the other of her cloak, at the same time sticking a spray of jasmine into the front of her dress, and bending to kiss the fresh, pretty face.

"Well, mother—many happy returns of the day of your entrance to your own new abode! It looks nice, but let's explore at once. Mother's drawing-room!" throwing open a door on the right. "No! it's the kitchen, and chairs on their heads which had better learn to stand on their feet at once," and before mother had got in, the chairs were off their heads, the table pulled forward, and the shutters opened.

"Exploration No. 2: dining-room and cabin, I think we'll call it. Fuff! but we want air;" and with a mighty struggle the coloured glass door at the end of the little passage which ran through the house was burst open, and the sweet summer air blew in.

"Now for the higher regions; and here's your drawing-room, and what a nice one! sloping ceiling, snug, delightful, and two windows looking over the fields, and 'over the hills and far away,' and only a loop-hole to that very dull street!"

Two bedrooms completed the explorations; and in less time than it would have taken Mrs. Black to prepare for a dinner-party, mother and Dolly had lighted a travelling stove in the kitchen, boiled a kettle, frizzled bacon, and had all the requisites for a comfortable tea—bread, milk, butter, cups, plates, even a clean table-cloth, were spread on the kitchen table; and the dusty chairs rubbed down with a clean duster, which came out of the same handy receptacle from which all the rest had appeared. Mother, in a black gown, with a white cap, collar, and cuffs, looked as if she had been comfortably residing at St. Hilda's for months; and Dolly, with her Galatea stripe, shining, fair hair, and rosy face, was anything but a travel-stained figure as she stuck her bunch of jasmine into her waistband and seated herself at the tea-table.

"Four o'clock, mother. We have four or five hours of daylight to get straight; but we mustn't loiter."

"But we must get some tea," said mother calmly, "and lay our plans while we take breath."

"Take breath! That's taken all mine," groaned Dolly, throwing herself back in her chair, as a shrill-tingling bell quivered and quavered through the empty house.

"What can that be? Oh, mother! a visitor! Answering the door did not come into my programme."

"Then I'll answer it," said mother, smiling; and Mrs. Black's little maid-of-all-work, conscious of rough hair, and black hands, and not over-clean apron, nearly sank into the ground before the clear, kindly face and fresh attire of "the lady" who opened the shabby door.

"Missis's compliments, and could she do anything for the ladies on first arriving?"

"Missis" was on watch behind her blind, and at the apparition of anyone so perfectly "settled"-looking and so brightly lady-like, popped right up and displayed her best afternoon cap and her blue shawl, which was a want of gentility she had never before been guilty of.

"Mrs. Spencer's thanks, and she is very much obliged, but does not require anything."

Mrs. Black had re-seated herself before Nancy returned, and was trying to look quite indifferent; and when Nancy had delivered her message, suffered her to retire, as there was nothing to be discovered beyond what she had herself seen; and she had at any rate found out the new-comer's name; also that she was a "Mrs." and not a "Miss"—mother and daughter they must evidently be—so if anyone called she had two pieces of information ready, and had the consciousness of having only shown neighbourly kindness in obtaining them.

Hornside people were not given to early rising; at least, not the inhabitants of the High Street who had scarcely enough to do to make it desirable that their days should be unnecessarily lengthened; and next morning Dolly had had four good hours' hard work by the time the maids-of-all-work were engaged in the process of whitening the doorsteps and conversing with the milkman.

Most marvellous! but the little gate and front door had both been painted a dark chocolate during the night; the windows were shining, the jasmine's wild sprays trained up against the house, something red and white appeared at one open window, and a creamy cloud at the other; and by the time the ten-o'clock 'bus returned from the station and again stopped at St. Hilda's, the house had quite an in' abited look. More boxes, and—most exciting of all—a young man in a sailor-like garb descended from the 'bus and vanished into the house. Mrs. Black and the Misses Simon, who lived next door, were inundated with visitors that afternoon, all anxious to have seats near the windows; and there was quite a buzz of gratified feeling when, at about five, the figures of the smiling elderly lady and the young man emerged from the door and walked off into the town.

In every house in Hornside that evening conversation was lively, and Mrs. Spencer, Dolly, and the sailor had little idea what a boon they were to the flagging minds—asleep for the want of new ideas. By the end of the week the clergyman had called at St. Hilda's, and all the world followed his example; and having seen for themselves the internal arrangements, and learnt from Mrs. Spencer herself who they were and whence they came, the flow of conversation rushed in a perfect torrent. "Been for years in the Colonies." That accounted for eccentricities of all sorts; but all the same, some of the mothers in Hornside would have been glad to send their daughters to the Colonies if they could have had them back again as useful individuals as Dolly. Dolly, assisted by Jack, had painted, papered, stained floors, hung up pictures and curtains, and, what was more wonderful still, considering her ladylike appearance, did all the work in the house, and produced cakes and fancy breadths which were the envy of all. As Dolly humbly acknowledged, mother's neat fingers pieced the carpets, made the curtains, and clothed the chairs. There was plenty of hard work; but the result was a snug, tasteful little home, with odd cupboards, shelves, comfortable window-seats, and all so shining and fresh that the sleepy, stuffy atmosphere which pervaded most of the heavily furnished Hornside houses found no existence here.

Besides the comfort of the abode, which the old ladies persisted in calling "peculiar," there was a comfort in Mrs. Spencer's kindly welcome which, by November, had gone far to make all the inhabitants agree that she was a very pleasant neighbour. Dolly had just drawn the curtains and shut out the chill November fog; the firelight was playing over the room; mother was meditating in her easy-chair; and Dolly sank into one opposite, and stared into the fire. It was Sunday afternoon, and a good time for meditations, but Dolly's were never of very long duration.

"Mother! wake up! A penny for your thoughts."

"I wasn't asleep, Doll. A penny for yours."

"Mine were stupid, mother! I feel myself getting rusty and fusty."

"To tell the truth, dearie, that was exactly what I was thinking we were both doing. It won't do, Doll. This is not a very lively place; but all depends on the lives we live more than the place, and we mustn't go to sleep."

"Well, mother, you never go to sleep, and you've done a good deal here already, but I know I am getting sleepy; and as for the other girls here, they are so dolefully dull. When Jack comes back he won't find one with an idea beyond the river on one side and the ploughed fields on the other;" and Dolly burst into a good laugh.

"Now, Doll, I won't have you uncharitable. There are advantages in knocking about the world, and you've had them, and now we must use them."

"Mother, dear, come on! You know you've thought of something, and are only paving the way to the disclosure of your scheme;" and Dolly seated herself at mother's feet and waited.

The result of the Sunday evening's cogitations was that Dolly despatched neat little cards, adorned with bees in various positions, inviting Miss Agnes Lambert, Miss Forbes, Miss Janet Somers, and Miss Penelope Hopwood to a "Council." Then she arranged the "sky parlour" as tastefully as possible; and drew the table near the sloping windows so that they might have the full benefit of the winter afternoon sun. Next she put mother's "working-chair" at one side and her "hive" basket by her. Having no floral decorations, she placed a green glass goblet in the middle, and all the working requisites she could think of round.

She proposed to bring down Uncle Simeon's sky-high mirror, but, as it had hung there all his days, mother would not allow such desecration. Moreover, everything looked crooked in it, and, as Dolly observed, it might distort their ideas. Two little books were placed in front of mother—"Mother's Extracts" and one for the "Minutes of the Proceedings," explained

Dolly, who, by mother's orders, having arranged the party, seated herself and began an interesting paper from a magazine, on "Self-Culture."

Meantime, as mother deftly cut and shaped, she studied the half-dozen heads before her. Dolly was always wide awake, and inspired with a love of action of any sort. Penelope Hopwood, on her right, had plenty of good stuff in her, and talent too, but she looked bored. Annie and Rosie's pretty, empty faces betrayed that their thoughts were more taken up with different modes of doing their hair or altering their gowns than anything else. Janet Somers, she was sure, had something in her if she could get the opportunity of developing it; and Agnes Lambert, cutting-out in the background, had a gentle, good face, but was decidedly one of the half-awake.

Mother was a keen observer, and her great powers of sympathy hardly ever failed to draw people out. But her own Dolly opened the proceedings by exclaiming, "Mother, I call this a selfish paper. What made you choose it?"

"Selfish! why, Dolly? If we are to be of any use in the world we must be good ourselves; and self-improvement in any shape, whether it be in knowledge of practical things, or culture and beautifying of our minds and spirits, must always react on other people."

"Beauty is much to be desired," sighed Rosie.

"What nonsense it is to think so much of beauty!" responded Janet.

"I am sure, Janet, we all get sick to death of ugliness in Hornside," began Penelope. "Mrs. Spencer, you don't think it wrong to make your house or things beautiful; do explain why, for some people think you frivolous," and Penny reddened.

"I daresay, my dear; but my idea is that to keep our minds and bodies healthy and happy, we must have bright and cheerful sights and things. Think of nature, and how true it is that 'He hath made all things beautiful in His time'—things great and things small, and even what we call only useful things, are also all beautiful. Let us get the love of the good and beautiful in our hearts and minds first, and then both our homes and our faces will improve, for I have seen girls whose dress was faultless, but who were not worth looking at because their faces were as empty as a doll's."

"But what next, mother? We want first to be inspired with the desire of self-culture; and next, to know the way to attain it."

Mother took up one of her little books and read:

"You were an eternal thought of God; for your life He has an ideal—there is the inspiration. 'To prepare us for complete living is the function which education has to discharge'—there is the way to attain it." Mother's reading aloud was never long, but always to the point.

"Is that all, mother?"

"I am sure it is quite enough, Dolly dear. If there is such a height before us, we had better begin climbing at once, and not disappoint Him," said her mother reverently. "Looking at your half-dozen heads, I think what is required are some practical methods of cultivating those brains, and—those hearts."

Now, please think, and each make a suggestion—you wish to educate yourselves for 'complete living.'

"Reading," suggested Janet.

"Very good. We had better settle on some subject, and all of you read, say, half an hour a day, and once a month we would discuss it here; how would that be?"

"How about books? I have such dull ones," sighed Agnes.

"We might amongst us subscribe to a library, and get two or three books by post, or we might club together and take a "Popular Educator," or a magazine, couldn't we, mother."

"A very good plan; you six must settle about that."

"Now, mother, my turn! I propose that Penny and I should try and get somebody to teach some of the stray boys, which would benefit us as well as them; and, I think, some lessons on sick-cookery would be nice."

"You are very 'mixed up,' Dolly, and you've made two suggestions; pass one on to Rosie. But who is to give the cookery lesson?"

"Why, any of us who like will take lessons, and you'll give them, mother."

"Very good; I agree."

"We should cultivate our musical talents," suggested Annie.

"Quite true; don't turn up your nose, Dolly; you know Jack always says if women are to be home rulers, they must have some nice music worth their men-folks' listening to."

"I think we should do some sewing for the good of other people. I don't mean just our own," sternly remarked Janet.

"Yes, decidedly."

"Now, mother, note these proceedings in your book; certainly not minutes, but hours!"

"Mother, you must undertake the subjects for reading, Janet and Agnes the work—to be done either at home or here—Rosie and Annie must settle on glees and songs, and we'll contribute our voices. Penny and I will together settle about our boys' class, and we'll all join the cooking classes."

"Very well; and, with your home people's approval, you must take your respective efforts to the sick folks yourselves. Finally, all I stipulate for is regularity and perseverance, and every month I shall expect a short account from each of you of what you have been doing."

The proceedings ended with a happy tea, and a fire-light conversation after; and the six parted in a much more wide-awake frame of mind than they had met.

"Rome was not built in a day," nor Hornside renovated as speedily; but at the end of a year "Mother," who never lost interest in anybody or anything, looked with pleasure on her half-dozen "Heroines," as she called them, who, bright and active themselves, had made their own homes brighter and happier—fathers and mothers, and brothers and sisters, all acknowledging the difference. Sick people had been cheered by many little attentions besides soups and puddings; the mischievous little boys tamed and enlightened by readings, works, and gardening; and the loitering men inveigled into the "Mechanics' Institute," where Jack gave recitations and readings, and the shop-boys and girls, headed by the "Heroines," gave concerts.

Nobody thinks of calling Hornside dull now—"a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump," and even if the "Half-dozen" are, by degrees, carried away by Jack and his friends, they have plenty of ideas in their heads now, and will have transmitted plenty to the heads they leave behind them.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

"RICHER THAN ROTH-SCHILD."

TS sole object is the spiritual and eternal welfare of the ancient people of God;" so say the managers of the British Society for the Propagation of the Gospel among the Jews—a Society that seems, in its committee, representative of Presbyterian, Wesleyan, Congregationalist, and Baptist alike, and names three bishops as patrons and sympathisers. The Society's missionary has lately visited Jerusalem, and, describing his voyage, he relates that he met with many poor Jews hastening to the land of their fathers, driven out from Russia by conscription and persecution. He spent many hours on board, conversing with them concerning the truth as it is in Jesus Christ. In Jerusalem, many asked him as to the extent of his purse, and, to the question "Are you rich?" he answered, "Yes, the richest man in England."—"What, richer than our great Rothschild?"—"Yes, a thousand times richer; I have found the Pearl of great price;" and he told his listeners of the eternal treasure that is found in the Redeemer. The Lord is giving increase to the seed sown amongst the children of Israel.

FOR THE LONG EVENINGS.

When the dark evenings of our English winter are upon us, it is pleasant to turn to a description of sunnier lands than ours, especially when those lands are Bible lands, or were the scenes of Bible stories. Many years ago Dr. J. R. Macduff published an account of Rome in connection with the Apostle Paul's life there. Now he has followed this by a similar volume, entitled "St. Paul in Athens" (Nisbet and Co.). Opening with a graphic description of the city, he goes on to expound the Apostle's wonderful address there, and finally to trace as far as possible the growth and history of the Church founded at Athens as the result of the Apostle's visit. We commend this work to all teachers and members of Bible-classes. "Sukie's Boy" (Hodder and Stoughton) is a very pretty story, by our old friend Sarah Tytler, suitable for girls. Mr. F. M. Holmes's name must be familiar to all our readers as that of a constant contributor to our pages. We are glad to welcome an excellent book for boys from his pen, in "Winning His Laurels," published by Messrs. Nisbet. "Cripple Joseph," issued by the same publishers, is a touching little story told by Miss Maria V. G. Havergal, sister of the poetess. The Dean of Peterborough has written a tiny volume on the "Doctrine of the Lord's Supper"

(Nisbet). There can be no denying the importance of a true understanding of the ordinance, and we are glad to see so competent a guide as Dean Perowne undertake the task of explaining what needs explanation, and in such simple, direct terms. In quite another field is "The Domestic World," a revised edition of which has just been published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, and which should be in every household. Mr. Spurgeon has now completed the publication of his valuable "Sermon Notes" (Passmore and Alabaster), the first volume of which we referred to some time ago. The second volume, containing the New Testament notes, is now before us, and fully bears out the promise of its predecessor. To preachers this work will be most useful. Scottish preachers have long been famous for the power and eloquence of their sermons. A distinguished Scotchman now settled across the Atlantic, the Rev. W. M. Taylor, D.D., has gathered into a series of lectures the characteristic facts in the lives and work of the great "Scottish Preachers" from the time of the Reformation to our own day. Dr. Taylor has entered upon his task with patriotic zeal, and there is not a single dull page in his most interesting work. The publishers are Messrs. C. Burnet and Co. We have received two little volumes of skeleton lessons on the "Names and Titles of our Lord" and the "Work and Claims of our Lord," published by Messrs. Nisbet, which we heartily commend to Sunday-school teachers.

"'I wish we had velvet stairs!'"—p. 156.

HOW THE WEST END CAN HELP THE EAST END.

At a meeting of the Ragged School Union, the Rev. Prebendary Billing remarked, "Those who live in the West End might do much for East-End children by inviting them to spend a few hours in their homes." Some may argue that this would unfit them for their positions, and cast a glamour of unreality upon their own daily lives, rendering them discontented and repining. Poor little things! to our mind it can do nothing but bless them, to open to them once in a while what might seem a veritable fairyland—a glimpse of Eden—and to prove to them that those who possess this world's goods desire to count them as kindred, and share the beauties thus provided. "I wish we had velvet stairs!" said one some to whom it must be a lonely season; lonelier, perhaps, because of the surrounding brightness, bustle, and pleasurable excitement. Those who love Christ are never satisfied while their brethren and sisters are "out in the cold;" we would fain that the blessing of the Yule fell alike on young and old, rich and poor, the wanderer and the sheltered. Does not one of our great writers describe how a lonely individual travelled about to avoid, or rather to pass briskly away, his birthday? Even so, to some, it is little fellow, returning from a visit to a sick gentleman in a pleasant house; but the sigh was transitory, and a look of pity for the invalid overspread the little face. "I wish he could have a powder as I did, then he would be as well as me;" and the little mind seemed to reason out that good gifts are not so unequally bestowed after all! The clergyman at the meeting in question truly remarked that many girls think of domestic service as drudgery; if—in comfortable homes—they could understand the real position of well-cared-for servants, they would change their minds. "Anything but service," seems to be the cry of our growing girls, and yet the demand for good servants increases daily. It will be a double-sided gain if we can get these young maidens to understand that they are safer, healthier, better fed in comfortable service than pursuing the underpaid toil they choose for the sake of evening "liberty." Who will open "fairyland" to a few little children this winter, for His sake Who says, "Whoso shall receive one such little child in My name, receiveth Me"?

CHRISTMAS LETTERS.

Christmastide is usually associated with happy meetings, plenty, and good cheer, but there are always almost a relief when the time of gladness is over, and the surrounding joys of Noël are no longer witnessed afar off by those in shadowed circumstances. To such the "Christmas Letter Mission" would fain prove that, whatever their condition, they are not forgotten before God. Bright messages of hope and peace are wafted hither and thither to the sick, the poor, the miners, the navvies, sailors, dock-men, women, children, etc. There are also "Midnight Mission Letters," and a correspondent says she hears "of lives purified and homes made happy" by means of these letters. Seven thousand Christmas messages winged their way among the Deep-Sea Fishermen last year. Miss Bewes, 67, Ladbroke Grove, W., is central secretary of this movement, which now counts its workers even in India. "Many hands make light work," and it is suggested that those who undertake more letters to fold than they can manage might arrange a folding bee, a cheery gathering of friends now and then for an hour or two of orderly work. On receiving an addressed wrapper Miss Bewes would forward "Hints to Workers," describing the method of folding, etc. A young man came to thank a Bible-woman for a letter he found on the doorstep of his lodgings. "I was just giving up caring for anything, and thinking nobody minded what became of me," he said, "and then I got this. I shall read it a few times more, and then send it to my old mother," and, from three wrappers of brown paper, he carefully produced the treasured Christmas letter. From South Wales a lady writes: "The head nurse at the workhouse has distributed them for ten years. The old people look forward to them so, for it is the only letter many of them get for the whole year. They are often found treasured up, worn with reading, amongst the few things these poor souls leave when death calls them hence."

"WATCHING FOR SOULS."

This is the title of a little work recently issued by Mr. Russell Hurditch, of the Evangelistic Mission, giving a record of the spread of Gospel work under the auspices of that Society. In sending us a copy of his interesting work, Mr. Hurditch says, "We have much cause for thankfulness to God for the blessing He has graciously vouchsafed to the present; but the death of our truly generous friend Mr. Samuel Morley, and other liberal helpers, renders it imperative for us to pray and look about for new friends." If all our readers who can do so would send for Mr. Hurditch's book (published by Messrs. J. F. Shaw and Co.), and see for themselves what he and his friends are doing, without doubt many of them would be moved to help him.

"INTO EVERY CITY AND PLACE."

Truly in the spirit of our Lord's commands to the seventy disciples do the missionaries from the East London Mission Institute go forth "into every city and place." From the three colleges and mission homes of the institution bands of devoted and self-sacrificing men and women are setting out month after month, trusting entirely to Him in whose name they go for their support in their far-away corner of the vineyard. And now we hear from Mr. Grattan Guinness of a new session begun with an "absolutely empty treasury," while at one, at any rate, of the colleges there is pressing need of special help. The severe drought of last summer proved that the water supply for the institution at Cliffe is not to be relied upon, and it will be absolutely necessary to inaugurate new engineering works before another warm season comes round, and the expense must be considerable. Mr. Grattan Guinness pathetically pleads for help to secure a constant supply of the first necessary of life for those whose aim it is to open new channels wherein "the water of life may flow freely." His address is Harley House, Bow, E., and we are sure he will thankfully acknowledge any contributions towards this special object.

"HOLINESS UNTO THE LORD."

In a grey old church, beside the blue waters of a sunny bay, we were present at the close of last season, when the preacher delivered an earnest address, appropriate to the time when pleasure-seekers were flocking back to their homes, and the townspeople counting their gains—their provision, in some cases, for the winter ahead. Speaking of those words, "In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses Holiness unto the Lord, and the pots in the Lord's house shall be like the bowls before the altar," he remarked that among the Jews the use of horses would be esteemed a luxury—something quite out of the ordinary—and he emphatically called upon the people to consecrate even their pleasures and luxuries to God. "If you can do that," he said, "there is nothing wrong in your pleasure; this year's change has been blest it across it has been written, Holiness to the Lord." And those whose life means work—humble, uninteresting work, perhaps, on which the daily bread depends—may be certain that no toil is too dull, too lonely, to be brightened by the same inscription. If we do our God-given work for Him, how can angels themselves do more?—

"A servant with this clause

Who sweeps a room as for Thy laws, Makes that and the action fine."

HARLEY HOUSE, BOW.

"I WILL TAKE HIM IN."

The Foreign Aid Society (of which the Rev. H. Browne, M.A., Barnet, is secretary) assists with grants several Protestant associations on the Continent. The workers are asked to avoid controversy as much as they can, but of course this is not always possible. In priest-ridden districts the Protestant religion is quite misunderstood; some think that Protestants do not even believe in Jesus. "Salvation through Christ" is the message carried home to many a prejudiced heart, and the light has poured in wondrously by means of the opened Bible. A man, receiving a Bible, told his sister he did not care to keep it. "If you turn the bon Dieu out of your house," she said, "I will take Him in;" and she got her little girl to read it aloud to her, the result being that she has taken her child from Romanist teaching, and she attends the Protestant services. The "Société Évangélique de Genève" (helped by our English association) has summer stations in several charming localities, where magistrates and those in influential and prosperous circumstances hear the words of eternal truth proclaimed in such places as Thun, Lucerne, etc. We are sorry to find the financial support of the "Foreign Aid Society" so small, for England is indebted to the Continent in memory of the great Reformation light.

"A DEARER SPOT THAN ALL THE REST."

Some think that in the present day the home life is declining by reason of the many outside calls to duty and pleasure, just as the art of letter-writing is becoming rare because of easy communication, the rush of business, the bridging-over of what was distance in the past. No outside work, however, will atone for neglect of our own homes—our first duty, our first privilege is here, alike for man and woman. Give the children some memories of the father who is known not only in public, but in the domestic circle, reading aloud that which will help and interest the group of happy listeners, and with heart and ear for the bairns' concerns as well as for the philanthropic world. "I wish I were an orphan," said a little maid wistfully, to the mother wrapped up in orphanage business; "then I'd see so much of you, mamma." We hope the neglected little heart had never cause to wish itself orphaned after that. It is a fact, however—and bitter regrets have thus been wrought in after life—that some have looked after everything else of importance except their homes. Let us all resolve, if possible, to keep one or two evenings weekly for our home circle; let the widening stream of sympathy here take its rise; let us value, as Heaven's dearest gifts, the sacred joys of home.

"A dearer spot than all the rest."

"PATTY CONGO."

"Where there is a will there is a way." This was one of the first proverbs to which our juvenile attention was drawn, and experience has again and again proved its veracity. As a rule, the things we "really do not seem able to manage" are those for which we care very little; the concerns that lie near to our heart are usually a genuine success. Our Baptist friends, writing of their Congo mission, in which many devoted lives have fallen, but which still goes blessedly forward, tell of a child of nine anxious to have a share in missionary toils and triumphs. She resolved to become a collector, and she named her hen "Patty Congo," and resolved to give to the mission the value of all her eggs. Patty Congo aroused a little domestic interest likewise, and friends and hen brought the child's collection up to thirteen shillings. The grand annals of missionary heroism may well startle those who put forth no hand to the work. Livingstone said that all that seems to Christians at home disappointment, trial, and disaster should sound a fresh call to duty, and inspire more unselfish service. And there are some who, in face of fields white to the harvest, may feel constrained to answer as a certain young man did when asked, "And what can you give to the cause of missions?"—"Myself."

FOR YOUNG AND OLD.

Readers of THE QUIVER do not need to be reminded of the good work being done by Miss Robinson, Miss Agnes Weston, and Mrs. Meredith, but the life-stories of these devoted ladies must have a keen interest for them. We are glad to see that Messrs. Cassell have added a volume containing these three biographies to their "World's Workers" series. Another volume contains the lives of two other noble-minded women—Mrs. Somerville, whose name is associated with the cause of higher education, and Miss Carpenter, whose noble work in the reformatories can never be forgotten. The good Earl of Shaftesbury is the subject of another of these useful little books, and the two great electricians, Morse and Edison, divide the interest of another. For the little ones, Messrs. Cassell have brought out a charming series of illustrated books, picturing and describing in simple words the common objects of home and garden, farm, shore, and forest. We commend these admirable "Illustrated Books for the Little Ones" to all parents. But, speaking of works for the little ones, what can be better for them than Little Folks or Bo-Peep? The latest volumes are before us, and are veritable treasure-houses of stories and pictures, interwoven with entertaining and instructive little papers. For children no more suitable Christmas gifts could be found. "Æsop's Fables" lose none of their interest as time goes on, and we are glad to see the cheap edition of this work issued by Messrs. Cassell, with Griset's clever illustrasufficient money."—"Oh," was the answer, "bricks and mortar are paid for. The debt I mean is our debt to the souls of men—to show them the love of God, and the power of Christ's grace." In face of this most solemn debt has arisen the Church Army, carrying on Gospel work aggressively in quarters where the ordinary modes of religious teaching might find it less easy to obtain a hearing. "Our younger brothers straying from our Father must be saved"—such is the watchword of the Army, and the prayer of the "soldiers" is to be not only fearless warriors, but also good Samaritans, bearing "the oil and the wine." The Headquarters and Training Home are tions. Teachers should bear in mind that parallels drawn from these old fables are always popular with children. "Seeking a City," published by the same firm, is a pretty story by Maggie Symington, that well deserves a place on the shelves of every Sunday-school library: where "The Cost of a Mistake," an excellent story for boys, by our old friend Sarah Pitt, should also find a home. Messrs. Cassell have also given us, in "Ships, Sailors, and the Sea," another admirable book for boys, the purport of which is amply explained by its title. Shortly before going to press we have received from Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton a volume of addresses to children, by Dr. Richard Newton, which we heartily commend to all superintendents and parents. Clear and forcible in teaching, these addresses are brimful of anecdotes, and cannot fail to be popular with, and do good among, our young friends.

THE CHURCH ARMY.

"Will the church be in debt?" a bystander asked of a pastor, watching his newly built church.—"In debt? Yes, heavily."—"It is a pity to build without at 128 and 130, Edgware Road, W., and the hon. sec. is the Rev. W. Carlile, who is the speaker in the Council Meeting which we illustrate this month. "The officer is a power for good among the navvies and other working men," writes the vicar of a parish, echoing the sentiments of many other clergymen. "His presence relieves me from a terrible feeling of inability to reach those among whom he works." University men have testified their interest in the Army by an association to promote it locally and generally. A friend lately told us of a carpenter, changed in heart by the instrumentality of the Army services, who, through the summer, travelled from place to place in a van, preaching the Word, full of zeal for Christ. The interesting report of this movement relates striking cases of conversion, amongst them being that of a skittle-sharper, the dread of his family, who has been brought under the power of God, and witnesses for Him with life and lip. The success of the Church Army may well prove to all ranks of believers alike that Christ crucified is the mightiest of themes, and that the Gospel that some treat as "old-fashioned" is still the power of God unto salvation.

THE "KING" OF OUR ORDER.

The bard of Avon, enumerating "king-becoming graces," includes among them verity, temperance, stableress, perseverance, fortitude, patience, and devotion: w. give this month the portrait of Alexander

ALEXANDER BEATON, KING OF THE ORDER OF HONOURABLE SERVICE, AGE 101 YEARS.

(From a Photograph taken in his thirty-fourth year.)

Beaton (now in his 101st year), concerning whom we have thus Shakespearian warrant in doing royal honour. Alexander Beaton is the "King" of THE QUIVER Order of Honourable Service. Legend and history have often attested the loyal fidelity of Scottish dependents, and it is from Aberdeenshire that we receive the record of a service lasting eighty-five years. Beaton entered the employ of the family now recommending him for membership in 1802, when a boy of fifteen: he has served under five generations, and, though now bed-ridden, he has all his faculties, "and may still," says our correspondent, "be in some sort considered the servant of the family he has served so long and faithfully." We may add that our form of application for enrolment has been personally signed by the "King" of the Order, in writing clearer than many of our acquaintances (not yet centenarians) are accustomed to use.

FOR CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.

At this time of year, when parents and teachers alike are looking for suitable presents for the little ones, the publishers vie with one another in making the choice difficult. The problem is not where to find a suitable book but which of the many suitable ones to choose. We can only mention a few which seem to us most appropriate for Christmas gifts and school prizes. Of "The Fugitives; or, the Tyrant Queen of Madagascar," it is sufficient to say that it is from the pen of Mr. R. M. Ballantyne (than whom there is no more popular writer for boys), and is what his books always are, stirring and instructive, without being nonsensically sensational. "Miss Con," by Agnes Gibberne, is a charming story for girls, somewhat spoiled by the weak illustrations which accompany it. "Cross Corners," by Anna B. Warner, is another work very suitable for girls. "Nellie Graham," by Ella Stone, and "The Old Violin," by Edith C. Kenyon, are smaller works that might well find a place in a Sunday-school library. "The Lads of Lunda," by Jessie M. E. Saxby, is a good book for boys, with spirited illustrations; while "Daphne's Decision," by Emma Marshall—primarily intended "for children"—deserves the highest praise. "A New Exodus; or, the Exiles of Zillertal," is a story of the Protestants of the Tyrol, by Catherine Ray, and is most interesting. All the foregoing are published by Messrs. Nisbet. From Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton we have received "Harry Milvaine," a most striking book for boys, by Dr. Gordon Stables, R.N. As an old sailor, Dr. Stables knows his subject well, and his book is therefore all the more interesting and reliable. "Barbara," from the same publishers, is a pretty story for girls by Clara Vance; and "Eunice," by the author of "Christie Redfern," fully sustains its writer's reputation. "In Cheviot's Glens" (Edinburgh: Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier) is a charming little tale by a new writer—Miss Jane T. Stoddart, of whom we hope to hear more—and which will well repay a reading.

A LIFE FOR A LIFE.

(See p. 236.)

A STRANGE COINCIDENCE.

BY JESSIE MACLEOD.

"Have you a shelter for to-night?"—p. 166.

PART I.

ON the morning of last Christmas Day the chief doctor of the little county town in which he resided received a telegram while at the breakfast-table. It ran thus:—

"Mrs. Swaby, Mexstoke Grange —to Dr. Hattrell, High Street, Fulton.

"Christmas morn, 7 a.m.

"Come at once. Mr. Ranlyn has spoken."

"Wonderful—wonderful!" cried the doctor, starting up, and ringing the bell sharply.

"What is it?—is anything the matter?—an accident?" asked his wife, much startled; while his pupil and assistant, a handsome young man, put down the cup he was raising to his lips.

"Old Richard Ranlyn has spoken, after being speechless for eight years. That means death!" said the doctor; then to the servant who entered the room, "Tell Adams to saddle Kitty directly. I must ride over to Mexstoke at once."

"Go to Mexstoke in this dreadful weather—do you mean before you visit your other patients?" said Mrs. Hattrell, in dismay.

"None of them are dangerously ill; a few hours later will not signify, my dear. But what a wonderful thing it is that old Ranlyn should have spoken again—wonderful!" cried the doctor, who could not get over his astonishment, finishing his breakfast standing, then hastening from the room.

"Paralysis, I suppose," said the pupil, who was a new-comer.

"Yes," replied the lady. "Death, to him, would be a happy release, although he is rich and surrounded with every worldly comfort. For years he has been speechless and helpless."

"A soul imprisoned in a case," observed John Avery. "Has he any family?"

"He never married, and, as far as I know, is without kith or kin." Then, lowering her voice, and speaking confidentially across the table: "He has been a hard man in his time—and an unprincipled one in his earlier days, I believe. Queer stories are told of him."

"Is he a gentleman?"

"I can hardly tell you. By position as master of Mexstoke Grange, he is called 'Squire' Ranlyn; they say he was an attorney and money-lender in London. The Grange became his through a mortgage."

"Then I presume another family has a right to it?"

"Not now; they are no more—ruined long ago. But there—the bells are beginning to ring;" and Mrs. Hattrell rose from the breakfast-table.

In the meantime, the good doctor, well buttoned up in his riding-coat, with a yard or two of warm woollen comforter round his neck, and a wideawake hat with a broad brim to keep the snow out of his eyes, was steadily pursuing the high road towards Mexstoke, which lay about seven miles distant. His horse was a strong one, but in consequence of the icy road it was impossible to ride at a good pace. The whole country round lay under an unprecedentedly deep snow. Hoar-frost marked out every branch and twig of the trees like exquisite frosted silver, most lovely to behold, and the air was opaque with a greyness which foretold that more snow was coming. Four miles down the highway Dr. Hattrell turned off into a more rural district, and finally rode through fine old gates of wrought iron, up a well-kept drive, to the hall entrance. Along the snow and before the door were the impressions of horses' hoofs and wheel-ruts, intimating a previous arrival.

"Who can it be?" thought Dr. Hattrell to himself. "Oh, no doubt Owen, the solicitor from Wyberton." This was a town in an opposite direction, and considerably nearer than that from which the doctor came. The house itself was built of red brick, with white stone copings; some portions of it were ancient, with gables and twisted groups of chimneys, but it had been added to in more modern style. A groom was waiting to take the horse to the stables, and the hall door was opened, as he alighted, by Mrs. Swaby, the housekeeper herself, who had been anxiously on the watch for him. From her Dr. Hattrell heard the account of the patient while he divested himself of his snow-clad vestments, which were instantly despatched to the kitchen. Declining the offer of refreshments, he was at once conducted to Mr. Ranlyn's room. The stairs were of oak, covered with Axminster carpet into which the feet sank as into a soft turf.

In a room of fair dimensions, situated immediately over the hall, with large bow-window commanding a view of the distant road, the drive, and therefore of all comers—in this room lived Squire Ranlyn. Every comfort, every requisite, and every appliance of the latest invention for an incurable invalid was there. A trained nurse, and a man-servant who had been with him for years, and was a good reader, were in constant attendance upon him.

In the centre of the room was a strange and a terrible-looking apparatus. At first sight it looked like an instrument of torture, but in reality it was a most ingeniously contrived iron chair. Its four legs were formed by rounded iron bars, descending from the ceiling, across which was diagonally fixed a groove, in which it worked. The arms of the chair were cradles to receive the limbs from the elbow; from the back were supporters for the waist and arm-pits, and a collar for the neck; these were all padded and lined with kid, and were of exquisite workmanship.

When the paralysed man wished to sit up he was carried to this cleverly arranged seat, placed, as it were, within a cage, with the supports adjusted to his body, without which it would collapse. This chair could be run along the groove in the ceiling either to the fireside or to the window, as required. For many years this unfortunate human being had endured such an existence, and, in addition to the dreadful affliction, was—speechless!

At the present moment he was in bed, covered with a splendid blue satin coverlet. A pale face lay on a frilled pillow, surrounded by well-kept grey hair that shone like silver. Mobility the face had none; its only life was in the unnaturally bright, black eyes, which had acquired an extraordinary power of expression—his only means of making his attendants understand him, aided by strange moanings, which they by custom could distinguish as negative or affirmative. On this morning of Christmas Day, as the early bells of a neighbouring village church rang out a joyous peal, for the first time in eight years Richard Ranlyn spoke intelligible words, and electrified his nurses.

"The bells!" he had said.

Squire Ranlyn's bead-like eyes brightened as the doctor entered the room, his face red with the cold. A favourite with all his patients was Dr. Hattrell, for he had a cheery voice and sympathetic touch—was ready-witted, inspiring confidence in many a poor invalid.

At a table near the bedside was Mr. Owen, the solicitor from Wyberton, a little wiry man, employed in spreading papers out open before him, taken from a silver and ebony cabinet. Dr. Hattrell nodded to him, and advancing to the paralytic, felt his pulse: it was terribly low.

"Glad come—doc," murmured the unfortunate man, in a voice that sounded far away, or like that of a ventriloquist; "witness will."

"Then you cancel your last will altogether, sir?" said Mr. Owen, untying it as he spoke.

"Yes—burn."

"I will look through it first, Mr. Ranlyn. . . I see that there are several legacies to your servants; are these to stand?"

"Yes, all."

Mr. Owen at once copied out these bequests into a new will. It was a very short one, and he was a rapid writer; besides, he noted by Hattrell's face that there was no time to be lost—life was ebbing.

"With the exception of these legacies, you bequeathed your estate and funded property to Her Majesty the Queen. Whose name am I to insert?"

"Miles Clitherow."

"He has not been heard of for years and years, Mr. Ranlyn; the probabilities are that he is dead."

"No, no—I tell you!" gasped the dying man, and then was exhausted with his efforts in speaking.

Dr. Hattrell gave him a restorative.

"I have seen him—Miles—old—a beggar."

"Where?" asked the lawyer and doctor simultaneously.

"In my dreams. I leave everything to him—do what—likes with—restitution—restitu—now pen."

Mr. Owen looked doubtfully at the doctor, but that gentleman placed the pen in the feeble, delicate hand, and supported the frail arm. The solicitor held the will. Very, very feebly did Richard Ranlyn take the pen between his finger and thumb. Strange to say, after a few trials he not only succeeded in holding it, but in scratching his name sufficiently legibly. The signature was duly witnessed, for both his nurses were present.

"Burn—old will," said the Squire.

The lawyer threw it on the fire. The Squire's eyes never left it until it was quite consumed.

"Restitution," said he; "sleep now."

Dr. Hattrell gave him a restorative again. With a sigh of relief he sank at once into a deep sleep, which lasted sixteen hours. Then he opened his eyes and tried to speak again. In vain; afterwards he lapsed into silence—for ever.

Richard Ranlyn was dead.

PART II.

THAT Christmas night was unparalleled in its severity; a strong east wind was now blowing, which seemed to penetrate even to the very marrow of the bones. The roads were iron-bound by a week's hard frost, the fields, hedges, and buildings all covered with a white mantle. The country houses and farms, grouped about here and there, were rendered conspicuous by the windows being ablaze with light from many happy firesides. From the villas that skirted the town, a red glow from behind crimson curtains gave a most inviting air of comfort, that strongly contrasted with the desolation without. The streets were deserted, and the shops shut up, the tradespeople mostly entertaining their friends in the rooms above them. All was silent, excepting a tune being thumped on a piano, with other sounds of revelry, and the bell of Christchurch chiming for evening service. Who goes to church on a Christmas night? Few would care to face that cutting wind, and brave the ice and snow to attend evening service. The incumbent, wrapped up in a heavy cape, came hurrying as fast as the state of the road allowed him. He had left a happy circle of young faces around his hearth.

It was a large church, but the galleries were closed, the nave being open to all comers. The curate was away for a holiday. The organist had a party. There was a young Sunday-school teacher to play the harmonium, but no choir to sing the hymns. One verger was in attendance.

A few people drifted in from the snowy streets; with a few exceptions they belonged to the poorer class, who humbly kept near the entrance of the church. It was a melancholy service, vividly contrasting with that of the morning, when the building was crowded, and the sittings were occupied by parents and children, all in full feather. The decorations were elaborate; pretty in daytime, but in the dimness of the half-lighted church now looking dark and funereal. The joyous "Adeste fideles," and Gounod's "Bethlehem," had been sung by the whole congregation; then hand-shaking, and good old-fashioned Christmas greetings, and away to cosy rooms and well-spread tables.

That night all that remained of the morning service was the warmth and comfort of the church; with which was mingled the faint perfume of the flowers and holly decorations.

The old and friendless, the poor widows, the single women—lone ones stranded on the banks of life's river—had crept out from their solitary homes, not only for comfort to sad hearts, but to be with their fellow-creatures this night of the great Christian festival. There were also the old men from a neighbouring almshouse in their grey capes, leading one another carefully—the halt, the lame, the blind. There was also a mechanic, with orape bound round his hat. He had buried his wife a week before; he came to church from a home where the light had gone out.

A Christmas evening service is in fact the very reverse of what we are accustomed to associate with joyous Christmas-tide and its association of ideas—inexpressibly sad and depressing in the contrast. A few of the better class of persons were seated near the reading desk. One of these was an elderly lady, a pensioned governess, living upon an annuity from the Governesses' Benevolent Institution, to which she subscribed when starting on her pilgrimage, years and years ago. She sings a shrill treble, and comes to church to return thanks for the peace of her declining years, and that she has a roof over her head and a fire to sit by.

There is an old sea-captain, with a loud bass voice; the clergyman's was a tenor, and these three had the hymns pretty nearly all to themselves, while the Sunday-school teacher scrambled after them on the harmonium, in what he was pleased to call "an accompaniment."

The clergyman delivered a short sermon from the reading-desk, appropriate to the occasion. Before concluding, he earnestly implored his hearers not to sleep that night without forgiving in thought, word, and deed, all those who had trespassed or sinned against them; to pardon all, to be that Christmas night in peace with all men. Then the service concluded. Before dispersing, the few persons forming the congregation timidly wandered about the Church to look at the decorations.

A man who had sat just within the doorway limped up to the chancel: a man in rags, with old, wretched boots, burst, and tied on with string. He seemed a stranger, evidently a wanderer and a wayfarer, broken down with fatigue. Perhaps he had been induced to enter the building, attracted by its light and warmth, to rest his weary body where it could be sheltered from the cutting wind.

He carried a tattered cap, and a stout oaken stick in his hand. He had a lined face, stamped with marks of many passions, like the ridges in the sand which as the ocean-tide goes out it leaves behind—the traces of the restless waves that have rolled over it. He was strong-featured, with wild eyes, iron-grey unkempt hair, and neglected beard; his age might be about fifty. Stopping before a monument inlaid with many-coloured marbles, he gazed at it intently, with a drooping head. It recorded the deaths of three generations.

So lost was he in thought, that though the people had departed, and the verger was turning off the gas, he appeared to be unconscious of it. The clergyman, who had been watching him, approached, and touching his arm said, "My good man, we are going to lock up the church."

The forlorn creature started violently, as if waking up from a sleep, and stared with wide-open eyes at the speaker.

"Tell me—that is, sir, if you will—who lives at that house now?" And he pointed with a trembling forefinger to the emblazoned escutcheon, which announced that the family of Clitherow, of Mexstoke Grange, owned the tomb.

"Mr. Ranlyn."

"Its possessor?"

"Yes; he owns the estate."

The clergyman and the wayfarer then walked side by side to the entrance. The verger turned off the gas. At the door the outcast stopped and spoke again.

"Is Richard Ranlyn a happy man—has he a wife, children, any dear ones to inherit this estate?"

There was a cultured tone in the man's voice which arrested the clergyman's attention.

"Mr. Ranlyn is unmarried. For eight years he has been afflicted with paralysis, and is speechless. I have no idea to whom his property may go. Tell me, why do you ask?"

"Because the man is a demon; he ruined my life, perhaps my soul! He made me a gambler, a black-leg, a reprobate. Through him I am a vagabond and an outcast. Over these same flagstones on which we stand, I have walked, scores of times, an innocent lad; many weary miles have I tramped to visit this church once again, and to die. Sir, your words to-night have not been spoken in vain; through them I can say, 'I forgive him!' My enemy lingers in a living death, in paralysis; it is a mightier hand than mine which has smitten him. I can say, 'I forgive him,' with all my heart, as I humbly trust to meet myself with forgiveness! The ways of Providence are mysterious!" The wanderer extended his arms to the sky as he spoke, then threw on his tattered cap, huddled his rags closer about him, and passed through the churchyard gate. The clergyman followed him swiftly, overtook him, and stopped him, saying, "Have you a shelter for to-night?"

"I shall seek the workhouse—I, who kept my hounds!"

"Wait a moment," said the clergyman. "This is a time when they will be busy there. I will write a line which will insure you admission and immediate attention."

Taking out his pocket-book, he wrote a few lines upon his card, by the flickering light of the lamp over the gate.

"I will come and see you to-morrow. What is your name?"

"You shall know when you come, sir. I thank you."

The clergyman turned homewards, and the tramp limped away through the snow, up the deserted street.

PART III.

LEADING off from the High Street, nearly opposite the church, was a long, narrow street of mean houses. On the whole they were neatly kept, and occupied by decent people, such as Post-office and railway employés, shop-assistants, and others. Most of the little parlours were lighted up, and in several of them shadows of figures, bobbing up and down, passed and repassed on the blinds, to the time of music played on an accordion or violin; from others there was laughter and singing. The houses being small, the songs were perfectly audible to anyone in the street, even to the other side of the way, where, in an opposite dwelling, conspicuous by its quietness and utter darkness, two persons sat by the fireside listening to this so-called singing. A shrill soprano had sung "Effie Sunshine," and a bass of uncommon power had roared out at the top of his voice the song of the "Irish Emigrant," "I'm sitting on a stile, Maryee," without the slightest feeling—in fact, as if it were the best fun in the world to be saying good-bye to his sweetheart. Of course enthusiastic applause followed each solo.

If the furniture of a room gives an indication of the tastes and occupations of the person who lives in it, one of those small parlours, as far as could be seen in the fitful firelight, had a stamp of refinement and culture that was not in accordance with its exterior or locality. Each side of the fireplace was filled with well-bound volumes, reaching to the ceiling. Water-colour drawings hung upon the walls; some of the chairs were covered with exquisite needlework; there was a pianette of plain wood, such as is made for the school-room; a violoncello stood in a corner, and an unlighted reading-lamp with green shade was upon the table.

A tall, thin man, with a pale face, careworn with premature wrinkles, a mild grey eye with an intelligent and educated expression in it, reclined in an arm-chair, his attitude denoting sadness or weariness. Beside him, seated on a low stool, was his daughter. She held one of his hands and bent her face upon it. These two were alone this Christmas night, listening to the singing of their opposite neighbours.

"It is pleasant to know that some people are happy," said the girl, lifting her beautiful liquid eyes to her father's face. "Perhaps we may be so some day."

"This is indeed a melancholy Christmas for us. I feel it especially for you, my darling—you ought to be so differently situated. Our friends—or I had more appropriately call them, acquaintance—have flown away from us at the approach of poverty as the swallows do at the advent of the cold weather."

"Books always tell us that so-called friends desert people in adversity; but if they are not real friends, they are as well lost as found. What is the use of their making believe?" said the girl bravely. "But, after all, father, there are more unhappy people than we—for, God be praised, we have each other; we are neither of us alone."

"What weighs down my heart is the fear that we shall be obliged to give up this little home, humble as it is. People can manage, even if it be penuriously, on a little; but how can they economise nothing at all?" replied the father.

"Let us go into the humblest lodging, so that we are not obliged to separate. I feel sure I shall get some teaching when the snow is gone," replied the daughter, who, being young, saw the future hopefully. "Your throat will get well with rest, then you will go on again."

The tutor sighed: for some years he had plodded backwards and forwards, morning and evening, to a large grammar-school at some distance from the town. He had also prepared girls at a ladies' school for the Oxford and Cambridge examinations in return for his daughter's education. She had only left it ten months ago; now acting as a blithe, cheery housekeeper—a ray of happiness in Thomas Kendrick's hitherto dull home.

He was a man who had never prospered. A good classical scholar, a good man, he had in early life been surety for a brother-in-law, who, as is too frequently the case, deceived and ruined him. The death of his wife followed. After these misfortunes he lost heart. Being well-read, and a B.A., he took up the profession of a private tutor. It had always been a struggle to keep his head above water, and now he had a relaxed throat, had lost his voice, and with it his appointment. This had happened in the fall of the year. His slender resources were this Christmas—after paying the small debts (for both father and daughter would rather starve than live at the expense of tradespeople)—well-nigh exhausted.

"I think the concert over the way has been enough for us, Thomasine. Suppose you pull down the blind, and I will light the lamp."

Thomasine arose, displaying a tall, graceful figure, a delicate oval face, a small head with a fine coil of nut-brown hair. She had scarcely reached the window when she uttered an exclamation.

"What is it?" asked her father.

"Oh!" cried Thomasine, "just as I was about to lower the blind, a wretched-looking man came across the road through the snow, and on reaching the kerb he fell down facing our door. See, there he lies; he does not move!"

"Perhaps he has been keeping Christmas," said Mr. Kendrick, going to the window.

"No, father, he did not look like that. I saw him by the lamp-light as he passed under it, a starved-looking man. Oh, I hope he is not dead!" She pointed as she spoke to where, within the lamp's radius, lay extended, flat on his face, what looked like a heap of grey rags. "Look, he does not move!"

The father and daughter stood side by side for a few moments: the heap in the snow remained motionless.

"This must be seen to," said Thomas Kendrick; "we cannot let the man lie there," and he hurried to the door.

"Here is your cap!" cried the young girl, hastening after him.

On opening the street-door a strong blast of cold wind, accompanied with sleet, blew in their faces, the music, laughter, and dancing in the opposite houses sounding perceptibly louder.

Mr. Kendrick bent over the prostrate figure in the snow, raising him easily enough, for he was of light weight, and so limp that he appeared to be dead. The Kendricks were not the people to allow a fellow-creature to die at their threshold for want of assistance; so the man was carried into the kitchen—which was on a level with the parlour, built out at the rear of the house—and laid on a travelling-rug, and the usual remedies were applied for reviving a fainting person. The wanderer, for it was he, remained some time before he showed signs of returning animation. Mr. Kendrick was shocked at the emaciated condition of the unfortunate man. He removed his wet coat, so patched that its original colour could not be distinguished. A pillow was placed under his head, a blanket thrown over him. The restorative given him at last took effect; then bread dipped in soup, which Thomasine warmed in haste, revived him. He opened his wearied eyes, gazed around surprised at the kind faces beside him, gave a deep sigh of pleasure, and sank into a sleep.

"What is this?" said Mr. Kendrick, picking up a card which had fallen from his hand, and reading as follows:—"Rev. C. Kirkwood, Christ Church Parsonage." There was written in pencil below it: "To the Master of the Workhouse.—Oblige me by admitting this poor man immediately, and giving him care and attention."

"Then he was on his way to the workhouse. Thomasine, we must keep him here to-night, for the streets are all ice, and the cold more intense than I remember it for years; even were there any vehicle available, I believe he is too exhausted to be removed. We must endeavour to communicate with Mr. Kirkwood early to-morrow morning. I wish Kitty would come back from her mother's. We must make an impromptu bed in the box-room, and have a fire there."

Kitty was the little servant-girl, who had gone out for the afternoon, and was to return punctually at nine o'clock. Until then the father and daughter hurriedly prepared the adjoining little box- and cloak-room for the occupation of the unexpected guest. Yes, indeed unexpected; momentous events generally happen suddenly. While these two sat by their parlour fire that evening, trying in vain to see their way through the darkness of adversity which surrounded them, the finger of Providence—by some called fate—was about to lift that cloud.

The servant came back to her time, when a fire was lighted in the small room near the kitchen, which few lines to Mr. Kirkwood would also be advisable," said Mr. Kendrick to his daughter, as they gravely talked over the man's state. "Mr. Kirkwood perhaps knows something about him, as he was evidently sending him to the workhouse."

"Mr. Avery will be here at ten o'clock, father," replied Thomasine; "he said he should look in every morning until you were well."

"I am very much obliged to Mr. Avery; and a

was used as a receptacle for disused furniture, boxes, cloaks, umbrellas, etc. An old couch was hastily converted into a bed, the unknown man, again carried by Mr. Kendrick, deposited on it. He woke up at this transmission, when he was given some warm milk. He murmured a few words of thanks, then became quiet—whether sleeping or not they could not tell, for he appeared to be prostrate with weakness.

Several times in the night did the good Samaritan rise from his bed, and come down-stairs to keep in the small fire, and give some nourishment to the unfortunate man, who in the morning light appeared the wreck which he was; but Mr. Kendrick noted that there was a look upon his countenance that heralded what would be to him a welcome deliverance—death.

"We must send Kitty to fetch Dr. Hattrell; and a relaxed throat is within his scope; but this man's is quite a different case, and requires more experience. Mr. Avery is only a pupil-assistant, though I think he has a good deal in him."

"Yes, he is very clever—and so open and straightforward," added Thomasine. Now, why should a faint blush pass over her face and white brow even up to her hair?

Because John Avery had been backwards and forwards now during three months. He was most kind and attentive, bringing with him most of the delicacies he prescribed for his patient; besides newspapers and periodicals for his amusement. He was the oasis in the desert of this young girl's life; while on his side he had determined to work up in his profession, and that no purpose should turn him from pursuing the path he had marked out—which was to lead him to wealth, a happy home, and Thomasine to reign in it. No words had been uttered, but the young people perfectly understood each other; their hearts had spoken, and had telegraphed to the eyes, and the lingering touch of sympathetic hands—these were enough.

Kitty, the little servant, had not the slightest fear of either ice or snow; indeed, she went triumphantly down all the slides that lay in her road quite as well as the boys, thus probably expediting her progress, for Mr. Kirkwood and the doctor appeared simultaneously at Thomas Kendrick's modest dwelling.

"No," replied the clergyman, to Mr. Kendrick's question; "I know nothing of him. He came to evening service last night, and I was touched by some words he spoke."

"What is your opinion of the case, doctor?"

This gentleman was examining his patient, and holding his pulse. He did not reply in words, but shook his head. A powerful cordial was dropped into the wanderer's mouth; strong beef-tea was being prepared for him—all too late. The action of his heart had failed through starvation, over-exertion, and exposure.

The three gentlemen left the room, but Thomasine sat beside him, gazing sorrowfully at the pallid, worn face, thinking how sad it was that this life should be ebbing away among strangers, and wondering if he had children in distant parts; also, what events had brought him to this state of terrible destitution. She came in contact with it and death for the first time in her life, and felt a deep compassion and reverential awe at being within the shadow of the Reaper's wings.

The outcast seemed to sleep, but his breathing was laboured; she poured a few drops of eau-de-cologne upon her handkerchief and bathed his forehead. Presently he opened his eyes and gazed upon her with a gleam of pleasure in them. He was perfectly sensible.

"You are good," said he. "Who are you, and where am I?"

"In our house; you fell down just before our door. My father carried you in here, and we will take care of you until you are better."

"That will not be in this world; my weary pilgrimage is finished. My dear, feel in my wallet; there is a packet."

The young girl complied. It contained a dry crust, a penknife, and a small parcel in brown paper.

"Open it."

She untied the twine which fastened it, taking out an old-fashioned pocket-book of faded blue watered silk; its clasp was of gold, as was a heart-shaped plate on the reverse side, engraved with initials. He held out his hand for it.

"This," said he, "contains papers—certificates—telling who I was—once." He tried to sit up. "Ink—a pen!"

"Let me call my father," said Thomasine, running to the parlour, and returning with the three gentlemen, who were in consultation.

"Lift me," said the wanderer.

Dr. Hattrell raised him on the pillow.

"Thank you; I have been absent from this, my native county, for seven-and-twenty years—in Australia. Why I went there is of no consequence to others. I was a ruined man! In that space of time who knows but some legacies may have been left to me? If so—it is too late! Ah! I was a tool in a bad man's hands!"

"It is never too late for repentance," said the clergyman.

"I have repented, and I have forgiven. Sir, will you write down that I give and bequeath all that I might inherit—to this dear child. I had—a good mother—for her sake this—" He stopped.

"His mind must wander," whispered Mr. Kendrick.

"Humour him," said the doctor, who thought what a strange coincidence it was that he should within the space of thirty-six hours be again at a death-bed and witnessing another hurried will.

"No," said the wanderer feebly, "I am perfectly sane. My mind does not fail me. Have you written it?"

"Yes," replied Mr. Kendrick; "but surely you have kith and kin?"

"They deserted me—in my disgrace. Lift me higher—I must—sign it."

They complied with his request, and he was supported to a sitting position, the pen was placed in his hand—he wrote his name clearly and firmly.

"Hark! listen," he exclaimed. "He is calling me!"

He gazed round the room.

"It is his voice!—Yes, Richard Ranlyn—I forgive you."

These were his last words; he sank back on the pillow—dead.

The name he had signed was Miles Clitherow!

BIBLE TRADES, AND THE LESSONS THEY TEACH.

PERFUMING.

BY THE REV. J. HILES HITCHENS, D.D., AUTHOR OF "ECCE VERITAS," ETC.

THE ancient Hebrews and Egyptians devoted considerable attention to the construction of perfumes, and God Himself gave minute instructions as to the ingredients of certain ointments and oils which He designed His chosen people to use. In Exodus

xxx. we see how the Almighty not only gave directions as to the components of the perfumes to be employed in His service, but also strictly prohibited any similar oil or perfume being made for any other purpose, declaring that if any person transgressed His law in this matter he should be excommunicated from His people, and forfeit all rights and interest in the Divine promises.

Myrrh, cinnamon, sweet calamus, cassia, stacte, onycha, galbanum, and pure frankincense were used by the perfumer, or "apothecary" as he is termed in Holy Writ, but they were used in varying proportions, according to the purpose to which the perfume was to be applied. There are three special uses to which perfumes were put in ancient times in Eastern lands, as referred to by the inspired penmen.

There was Anointing. The first instance of this will be found in the Book of Exodus, where the High Priest and the vessels of the Tabernacle were all anointed. The use of perfumed oils and ointments was equivalent to our crowning at a regal inauguration, and similar also to the laying-on of hands at the ceremony of induction to religious office. To this the Psalmist alludes when he writes of unity, and says, "It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard; that went down to the skirts of his garments." It is in allusion to this custom that Jesus is called the Lord's Anointed. The Psalmist, referring to Christ, says, "God hath anointed Thee with the oil of gladness above Thy fellows." True followers of God are also spoken of as "the Lord's anointed." "Touch not Mine anointed, and do My prophets no harm." They are such because God has poured upon them the oil of Divine grace, and set them apart from the world to testify for Him. The use of perfumes for consecration and inauguration simply emblemised sanctification of heart and separation from the evils of the world.

But there was another anointing which took place when a stranger was welcomed, and the host desired to show respect to his guest. Thus the woman in the Gospel welcomed Christ by breaking a costly box of spikenard and anointing Him therewith—the smell of the perfume filled the house, and drew attention to the act of homage and honour which the woman performed. It is in allusion to this custom that the Psalmist says, "Thou anointest my head with oil, and my cup runneth over." God not only supplies the necessities of life, but He supplies the luxuries also. He cheers our spirits. He refreshes our bodies. He makes us feel welcome in His presence by His gracious anointing.

There was a second use to which the perfumes of the East were applied: namely, to the service of the Tabernacle and Temple as incense. The spices we have already mentioned were offered by the Jews twice every day, morning and evening, by the officiating priest. On the great Day of Atonement the High Priest himself took fire from the altar in a golden censer, and, having received incense from one of the priests, he offered it on the golden altar. Incense is said to have been offered by the ancient Egyptians. Plutarch alleges that they offered incense to the sun—resin in the morning, myrrh at noon, and an aromatic compound in the evening. The use of incense in connection with the Eucharist in the Christian Church was unknown till the latter part of the sixth century. The rites of the ancient Jewish Church were only preparatory to something better. The Law was our schoolmaster, to bring us to Christ. When the One Sacrifice was offered and the veil of the Temple was rent in twain, all the types were lost in the Antitype, and the ancient economy made way for the Christian. We but go back to nonage, to infancy, to bondage, when we go back to the observance of the old ceremonies. We then overlook the real spirit in the letter. We become mere formalists when we rely upon the presentation of aromatic perfumes rather than upon what the incense emblemised. That incense of old typified the precious merits of Christ. To them alone belong a fragrance answering to that of the incense offered in the holy place. In the Revelation of St. John, an angel is represented as standing at the golden altar, with a golden censer, into which he puts much incense, which he offers with the prayers of the saints. Now, that angel is none other than Jesus, and it is the abundant incense of His merits that makes the prayers of the saints acceptable to Heaven. Without the admixture of that incense—the Saviour's merits—our prayers, instead of rising as a fragrant offering before the Divine Father, only descend, like thick vapour, encompassing our hearts with deeper darkness than before.

There is a third use to which perfumes were put as referred to in the Scriptures—embalming. Nowhere was this work better performed than in ancient Egypt. There were trained professional embalmers, whose special calling it was to prepare the spices and scientifically preserve the bodies of the dead. Some of the mummies of the Egyptians are still found in good condition. One, said to be that of a princess, and to be 6,000 years old, was not long since sold in London. The earliest allusion to this process is found in the Book of Genesis, where we are told that Joseph "commanded his servants the physicians to embalm his father;" and in the last verse of the same book it is written, "Joseph died, being one hundred and ten years old; and they embalmed him." The Jews imitated the Egyptians in the process of embalming to a large extent. They, however, substituted a simpler and less expensive method. They anointed the body with aromatic spices, and swathed it with numerous folds of linen. The more profuse the use of perfumes on such an occasion, the greater respect displayed for the deceased. Josephus says that at the funeral of Herod five hundred of his servants attended as spice-bearers. So, after the crucifixion of Jesus, Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea, two men of wealth, testified their regard for Christ by bringing a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about a hundred pounds weight, whilst also the Marys, with their friends, made preparation to render the same mark of affection at the dawn of the first day of the week.

So much, then, for the nature and uses of Scripture perfumes. Let us leave the subject impressed with the thought that we are traders in perfumes.

There is our reputation, of which the poet well sings—

"O reputation! dearer far than life,
Thou precious balsam, lovely, sweet to smell,
Whose cordial drops, once spilt by some rash hand,
Not all the owner's care, nor the repenting toil
Of the rude spiller, ever can collect
To its first purity and native sweetness."

Nothing is so vain and joyless as the feverish pursuit of empty applause; but to secure a good name by integrity of conduct, purity of life, and fidelity to noble and holy principles, is deserving of our constant and earnest effort. That good name is as ointment poured forth. That good name charms, attracts, and influences for good untold multitudes. It is a precious and perennial perfume. But it needs guarding. When the apothecary has compounded his ointment at the expenditure of much care, skill, and time, and by the use of the rarest and choicest spices, it is all spoiled if, by lack of vigilance, flies fall into it, and there putrefy. The pleasant fragrance makes way for what is most offensive. So Solomon says—"Dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savour: so doth a little folly him that is in reputation for wisdom and honour."

There are our prayers, which are perfume to the Divine Heart-searcher. The Psalmist says—"Let my prayer be set forth before Thee as incense." So Cornelius heard the supernatural voice from heaven saying, "Thy prayers and thy alms have come up for a memorial before God"—"come up" as the clouds of incense curl up to the skies; "come up," as a "sweet-smelling savour."

Let us not forget that the perfumes of the East were made by either crushing or burning the spices. So our reputations, to be lastingly precious, must be secured by crushing within us the evil propensities of our natures; burning up, as a sacrifice, all that is injurious to ourselves or to others, and all that is obnoxious to God. Our prayers also, to be acceptable to the Infinite One, must be marked by the crushing of our stubborn will, till it be brought into hearty subjection to the unerring will of our Eternal Father.

CHRISTIAN POLICE.

A WORD ABOUT THE CHRISTIAN POLICE ASSOCIATION.

EAR me!" someone will say; "here is another new society. Surely there are enough agencies at present in existence to meet the spiritual needs of every class of men." This by no means uncommon remark shows how little the public understand the life or duties of policemen, and how far outside the public ken lies the work of this Society. Yet that the experiences of those who labour in this fruitful field are of more than ordinary interest will readily be believed.

It may, however, be observed that this Association is in one important particular distinguished from all other kindred societies:—viz., that it is not merely a mission to policemen, but it is a union of Christian men in the force, banded together for the purpose of carrying on evangelistic work amongst their comrades.

Few people realise how isolated is the life of a policeman. They are a class of men who, being on duty seven days in the week, have far fewer opportunities of receiving religious instruction than the rest of the community. It often happens that for months together the only opportunity a policeman has of attending a place of worship is when he has the privilege of being on duty outside the door. Worse than that, the minister inside prays for the welfare of the soldier and the sailor, but he forgets the poor policeman, who has a soul to be saved too. Surrounded as policemen are by special and terrible temptations, separated from their fellow-men by the foolish prejudice which has for so long attached to them, sorely needing encouragement in the path of duty, they deserve the prayers and kindly help of every earnest Christian; uncared-for and neglected for many years, policemen were looked on as a hardened class, quite outside the pale of Christianity. "You have no chance of going to heaven—no policemen go there," was said to one the other day; and at last they themselves have begun to think that it is impossible for a policeman to be a Christian. One man lately, who was asked as to his salvation, said, "Oh, no, I am not a Christian; don't you know I'm in the police force? I hope in a few years to retire, and then I shall become a Christian." If this Association has done nothing else, it has brought out the fact—which of course was a fact before—that there can be as bright Christian men in the police force as anywhere else. After a meeting at Exeter Hall a stranger came up to a Yorkshire policeman, and asked him whether the Association had done any good. "This here Christian Police Association," said the Yorkshireman, "has been the saving of hundreds of us constables."—"How so?"—"Well, it's this way: none ever seemed to care a bit for us; they never said a word to us about our souls."—"Was that the general experience of policemen?"—"I believe it was. I had been nigh twenty-five years in the force, and I do not remember once having been spoken to about my soul's salvation—not till this here Christian Police Association stirred some ladies to look after us."—"You had seldom come across Christians, I presume, in your beat?"—"Well, I know

I have been on duty many a time at religious meetings, and I can well remember wondering all the time, when I could hear the singing and speaking, if they ever thought of us men at the door. I've been like to cry sometimes with wishing someone would say a word to me; I was not converted then, but I had a curious longing now and then to know what it all meant, and if it was for me; but no one seemed to care."—"Then, how did it come about?—your conversion, I mean."—"When the Policemen's Bible-class was started, I says, 'Here's something for policemen now; I'm in for the class; I'll see what's in it.' I went, and it weren't many meetings I'd been at before I just saw two things—that I were a sinner, and that Christ were a Saviour—and that was enough for me. I took Him for better or worse, and better it has been for me."

The spiritual needs of policemen had been laid on the hearts of some Christian men in the force and others outside, and for many months, and in some instances for years, there had been much earnest prayer that God would open a way for promoting the spiritual welfare of the force. We believe the Christian Police Association was the answer to these prayers, and certainly during the short time that the Association has been in existence God has wonderfully owned and prospered the work.

At a conference of police officers and others interested, held in the West End in February, 1883, by the invitation of Miss Catherine Gurney ("the Policemen's Friend," as they now call her), being the outcome of other meetings held previously at Mildmay and other parts of the metropolis, the desire was expressed to form an Association, having for its objects—(1) to unite in Christian fellowship and mutual prayer all policemen who love the Lord Jesus Christ, and who, knowing Him as their Saviour, desire to serve and follow Him in their lives; (2) to seek, by the establishment of Bible-classes, meetings, etc., as well as by the circulation of Christian literature or other means, to extend the Kingdom of Christ among the members of our police forces; (3) to invite the co-operation of every Christian policeman, to whatever denomination he might belong, the intention being that the Association should be entirely unsectarian, and that its rules should demand nothing more than is required by the Word of God from all those who are followers of Christ. In accordance with this wish, and with the full approval of the Commissioners of the Metropolitan and City Police Forces, the Christian Police Association was established in February, 1883, Mr. J. Mathieson and Mr. J. H. Tritton, who had taken a warm interest in the movement, acting as trustees. Classes were formed, and branches started in the metropolis, and later in various parts of the country. In a few places where Christian policemen had already been united in the Lord's work, they became affiliated to the Society.

As yet the work is only in its infancy, but it is impossible to measure the good already done by the Association. Several chief constables have given their testimony to the good results of the work; and one in a large northern town has stated that since a branch has been formed in his town the whole tone of the force has been changed, bad language in the mess-room is entirely stopped, and the members are showing an excellent example in the faithful discharge of their duties.

The Association has now over a hundred and twenty branches, twelve in connection with the Metropolitan force, one with the City force, eighty-seven in the provinces of England and Wales, thirteen in Scotland, and eleven in Ireland, and it has upwards of three thousand enrolled members. Its new office is at 18, Adam Street, Adelphi, London. No subscription is required, the only condition of membership being true conversion to God, as testified by an open confession and by a consistent Christian life and walk. At first the provincial branches established were chiefly in the boroughs, but now some have been started in the counties for the benefit of the county constabulary. This work is done for the most part by correspondence. Some earnest Christian lady undertakes to act as honorary secretary of a county, and having obtained the consent of the chief constable, she sends a letter to each man in the county force, together with a packet of papers, etc., and each quarter this is repeated. As to whether these efforts have proved beneficial to them may best be shown by the testimony of one of themselves. "Wherever there is a branch of the Christian Police Association it causes Christian policemen to come out and declare themselves on the Lord's side, whereas previously it was scarcely known amongst their comrades that they were members of the Church of Christ; and a man having thus come out himself, he becomes anxious about the souls of others, and the light that has been dim becomes brighter, so that his comrades begin to think that after all there is something in religion worth having. Then he is able to speak a word for the Master occasionally, and God only knows what the result will be. Anything that causes a man to be a better Christian is of the utmost importance, and that is what the Christian Police Association has done in many instances for members of county police forces."

More than two hundred Bible-classes are held weekly in different parts of the country. Sometimes the wives also attend, and in addition classes are held especially for the wives. "Thank God this class was started for me!" exclaimed a policeman's wife lately, who had just learned through its instrumentality to rejoice in God as her Saviour. Bright, hearty meetings are also held once a month, when the members of several Bible-classes meet together, and any man in the force who likes to come is welcomed, the wives also being invited. About a year ago a policeman was deeply impressed at one of these meetings. His wife, who was with him, noticed it, and when her husband went on duty after the meeting, she asked another woman to join her in prayer that her husband might be converted that night; and at the devoted to matters which interest the police. It seems to be much appreciated, the men often writing articles for it.

Christmas letters and motto cards are also sent out to the men by the ladies interested in the Association, and they have proved a blessing to many. One reached a young Irish constable in a lonely country station, and it was the means of showing him that he was on the broad road to destruction. He went next day to church, and asked the Lord to take him to Himself. He says, "I heard that beautiful hymn 'Take me as I am.' I knew I was a sinner, and very time they were praying, the answer came, for the husband, out on duty, lifted up his heart to God. He sought and found pardon for his sins, and is now leading a consistent Christian life.

The Policemen's Bible Reading and Prayer Union is another source of much strengthening and encouragement to the men. It was established to promote the regular study of the Word of God, and now numbers several thousand members. It has proved a blessing to many. One man in particular, who was very reluctant to join, was afterwards most thankful that he had done so, because through this means he was brought from darkness to light. A Gospel Temperance Union, which has also been established in connection with the Association, is doing good, not only by making many total abstiners, but from the influence these men have on their comrades who are not abstainers.

A few halls and reading-rooms, specially devoted to the use of the police, have been opened in various places. A library has also been formed to supply the country branches with books. The Association has its own paper, styled On and Off Duty, specially a wicked one, so I asked Him to receive my soul and take me away from sin and Satan. Before, I was running headlong into everlasting damnation, drinking, gambling, etc., and now I can say, Thanks be to God, I am on the Lord's side; and now I can sing—

"'Oh, Christ, in Thee my soul hath found—
And found in Thee alone—
The peace, the joy I sought so long,
The bliss till now unknown.'"

Having been brought to a knowledge of the truth, the policemen desire to go and tell others "what great things the Lord hath done" for them. Some have united to go wherever they are invited, in their spare time, to proclaim the glad message of salvation. We know that manifest blessing has attended their labours. Others, again, engage in the temperance cause, and much good has been done in this way. The public seem astonished to hear policemen warning them against the perils of drink. Some conduct Bands of Hope and children's meetings. Some, too, are deeply interested in rescue work. Many poor wanderers have been restored to home and friends, and led into a better life, by the kindly, earnest words of some Christian policeman. A certain young woman, who was repeatedly in custody for disorderly conduct and drunkenness in the street, was spoken to very seriously by a Christian inspector about the terrible consequences of her manner of living; so much was she impressed that she resolved to forsake her sinful life. By the kind efforts of the inspector the woman was sent into a Home—with the consent of the magistrate, who highly commended his endeavours to reclaim the unfortunate. Another young woman, while being taken in a cab to the police-station on a capital charge, was spoken to about her soul. She was brought to the Saviour by those few words, and now, in penal servitude, she is giving evidence of true conversion to God. A man who attempted suicide was converted by means of the policeman who was put to watch by his bedside, and he is now a bright Christian.

If every policeman were a Christian, what a mighty change might be wrought among our criminal classes! A little "word in season" to those whom they have arrested would assuredly lead many to forsake their sins and turn unto the Lord. "Thank God for the words you spoke to me when you run me in," said a prisoner the other day, when discharged, to a policeman. "They have been blessed to my soul. I never forget them." The Christian Police Association knows neither party nor sect. It extends its operations as far as its limited means permit. Its sole aim and object is to win policemen to Christ, to help them in every way to live useful Christian lives.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE COURSE OF TRUE LOVE.

"As the delicate rose
To the sun's sweet strength
Doth herself unclose
So spreads my heart to thee!"

C. G. ROSSETTI.

THE happy days of July rolled on and vanished into the past, and August shone out, not a whit less happy to those young hearts in the Parsonage down by the sea. Bright as dawn these days were, hopeful as spring, and serene, with unspoken promise of future joy. Echoes of that old song begun in Eden, and which runs down along the ages like a golden thread in a mourning garment, made melodious these summer days, when the birds sang, and the flowers bloomed, and two tender young human hearts leaned each to each.

Those walks together, those half-spoken, disjointed words, that joy in discovering similarities in thoughts and fancies, those timid questioning glances so sweet, so thrilling, those long silences that spoke more loudly than any words, those twilight walks beneath fair summer skies: life may hold much that is sweet, much that is bitter, but naught that cometh can ever equal the unexpressed happiness of these days, nor dim their fragrant memory.

Sometimes after breakfast Stephen would accompany Hilda to the town to do her shopping and marketing. He would docilely lade himself with her small parcels, and encumber the pockets of his faultlessly cut coat with her little army of account-books.

One morning, when these performances had been accomplished in a shorter time than usual, he begged for a little stroll on the pier before returning to the house.

The pier was a short erection of rough stones, running out for some distance, and then curving across the little bay, forming a small harbour, and an anchorage for fishing-smacks, coalers, or even vessels of heavier tonnage than these, under stress of weather. A rude breakwater of loose stones bordered the pier towards the open sea. Stephen always liked to get away quite to the end, where many tides had worn the rocks to a level slope, and the broad sea spread itself out for solitary miles, with hardly ever a sail in view.

"Let us sit down here, and watch the tide coming in," he suggested as they reached the end of the pier, and stood by the lighthouse, looking out over the water.

"It is late," she demurred.

"On the contrary, it is very early," he replied, politely contradictory. "And it is so delightful watching the tide coming in."

"The tide at this moment is running out, and running out very fast," she said, smiling.

"Well, let us sit down and watch the tide running out," said Stephen, in nowise daunted. "That is only one degree less entrancing."

"I do not suppose it needs our encouragement in either performance," said Hilda, with aggravating obstinacy.

"You are very disagreeable this morning, Miss Romney," remarked Stephen, with lofty displeasure.

"No, I am not," the girl said, suddenly capitulating, and sitting down. Stephen quietly stretched his length of limb on the slope of sun-warmed rocks near by, and resting on one elbow, looked out on the dancing waves.

"I do love the sea," she said presently, with a long, deep sigh of content. "It is always so strong, so inexorable."

"You should see Switzerland," he answered, "and then you would acknowledge the strength of the mountains also."

"May I read my letters?" he asked, after a silence had fallen on them, bringing in his eyes from the sweep of blue waters to her face where she sat above him, rooting small stones from the crevices of the rocks with the point of her umbrella.

"Yes, I shall graciously give you my permission," she replied.

But he seemed in no particular haste. He tilted his hat a little farther over his eyes, and scanned the horizon once more.

"Well, why do you not read your letters?" she asked presently, when she had poked up all the pebbles within reach. "Do you always treat your correspondents with such disdain?"

"They are not interesting," Stephen said, producing a couple of unopened letters from his breastcoat pocket, and laying them on the rocks beside him. "One is from an old college chum; the other from Annette. Now, if I were to get a letter from you, I should read it."

"How extremely condescending!" she exclaimed. "I feel quite flattered! It is very unlikely, however."

"What? That I should read it?"

"No. That I should write to you, I mean."

"Unlikely things happen every day," he replied coolly. "In fact, unlikely things invariably happen. If we are friends—and we have agreed we are—I am sure I cannot see why you should not write to me."

She was silent.

"Then I am to understand that our friendship is limited up to, and no farther than, the day of my departure from Biffy? After that I am to drop out of your life, and have no place in your remembrance?"

"I did not say that."

"But you implied it. If you wash your hands of me once I leave, and have no more to say to me, I don't think much of your friendship. Mary Owens writes to me constantly. I heard from her only yesterday."

"Miss Owens is best judge of her own affairs," Hilda said proudly. "I do not see that I am to shape my conduct in imitation of hers. Come, let us go home—we are wasting time most shamefully."

"I was just going to read my sister's letter," he said, in injured tones, as she rose. "But of course if I must go, I must."

Hilda laughed merrily.

"Read your letter," she said, re-seating herself. "I never met anyone so hard to please as you are."

"I am most easily pleased, if you only go the right way about it. But you don't; in fact, you don't try to please me in the very least; on the contrary, you tease and provoke me at every moment."

"Poor fellow! I am sorry for you!"

"May I read this effusion aloud?" he asked, ruefully looking over the two closely written pages his sister's envelope disclosed to view. "It will be more endurable so."

Annette's letter was of the prosaic and uninteresting type most girls manage to write. There was a good deal of writing, and cross lines, and postscripts even, and in the end not a syllable that could interest or amuse any human being.

Stephen laughed and looked at Hilda when one postscript inquired if he were not very dull at Flashford. But Hilda did not meet his gaze, only turned away her eyes, and coloured a little.

"I wonder, too," she said, "why you should elect to spend six long weeks at a stupid place like this, when you might travel, and go abroad, and see so many places worth seeing."

"I have been abroad, and seen everything," he said, with the wearied air of a second Alexander the Great. "My father always used to insist on my travelling about during the Long."

"I think your father must be a most good, kind man," she said.

"I think my father must have retained you as special pleader," he said. "You are always chanting his praises."

Stephen wondered if his father would chant her praises one of these days in the near future, and receive her with open arms as his daughter-in-law. He was not quite so sure of this, and his face grew somewhat grave. The waves rolled in with slow pomp, sending curves of seething foam upwards over the sea-weedy rocks of the breakwater. The curlews wheeled and screamed overhead, the wide expanse of glittering sea stretched out before them, vast and solitary, not a single tiny sail of fishing-smack in sight. They two seemed alone on the margin of the world—a second Adam and Eve in a solitary sphere of sunlight and sea-music, with none to trouble them.

Stephen wished it were indeed so. He sighed as he thought of what his father would say to a portionless bride won, and a wealthy heiress lost. He knew there would be trouble, and he hated the thought of it. His was a nature that shrank from domestic storms. But Hilda was worth it all, and more.

"I wonder what you will think of my people when you see them?" he said, after a long silence, forgetting how extremely unlikely it was her thoughts should have gone over the same road as his.

"I think it very unlikely I shall ever meet them," she answered quietly. Stephen's cheek reddened a little under its sunbrown.

"I should like you to know them," he said, refusing to be snubbed, if to snub him had been her intention.

"I fear the girls are not much in your style. They are very good girls on the whole, but they dress rather violently, and they do not care for reading, or any of the things you like. I am afraid you would not approve of them—I don't sometimes."

fair, she'd wonder did you paint; if dark, dark girls are invariably bad-tempered. She is a person who believes herself and her opinions infallible. And one must come up to her standard to be at all endurable. But then, no mortal ever does come up to it, and

"May I read this aloud?" he asked.—p. 176.

"I think it more likely your sisters would not approve of me," she replied, yet with a little touch of proud indifference as to whether they approved of her or not, that pleased him.

"Then there's my mother. She would not like you, I know; but then she never does like anyone. If you were tall, she'd call you gawky; if short, she'd say what a pity you were such a dumpy girl; if therefore no one pleases her. We, her children, are the most special pieces of imperfection in her sight."

"I think she is right about her son," Hilda said audaciously.

Stephen turned to look at her with eyes which meant to be exceedingly reproachful. But she only laughed in answer.

"Does she like Miss Owens?" she asked.

"Oh! Mary? Yes, on the whole I think she finds less fault with Mary than with anyone else. I must say Mary is the only person who ever tries in the smallest degree to please my mother."

Hilda was a maiden wondrous wise. She had been reading between the lines, or thinking she had (which is all the same thing to most people), these last few days, ever since Stephen had first mentioned Mary Owens' name. And she had come to the sapient conclusion that Mary Owens was Stephen's destined wife. He praised her, he had called her "the best girl in the world." Hilda had not forgotten that little fact. They wrote to each other. They had grown up together. She was very rich, and without doubt very lovely and fascinating as well. She tried to please his mother—evidently she loved him.

It would be happiness—if one cared for a fellow like Stephen—to try to please his mother, no matter how "cantankerous;" and all belonging to him, no matter how repulsive.

And the upshot of the matter was that Hilda Remney came very near hating Mary Owens: not openly—not avowedly to herself: that would be very wicked and base. But there came a tightening at her heart when the name of the heiress crossed Stephen's lips.

"Miss Owens appears to be of a very charming disposition," she remarked, as his last speech seemed to require an answer of some sort.

"She is a very good girl," Stephen replied warmly. And shortly afterwards they went home.

CHAPTER IX.

UNDER THE STARS.

"I have said, a dowry I want not, O maid, but thee only!"
—From the Albanian dialect.

"AGE, sir," remarked Master Drury, "age is synonymous with beauty. Do you take my meaning, Mr. Wray? The French, the rakes, speak of what they call la beauté du diable: what is that? The beauty of youth—mere flesh and blood—animal beauty. The true beauty is of the soul, and comes with age. Good violins are cases in point. Look at the degenerate literature of your day. Compare the frivolities of your modern poets with the majestic cadences of Pope and Dryden: your moderns are mystical solely to disguise their lack of meaning. Compare the spirit of your age with the spirit of mine. Do you apprehend my meaning? Do you follow my line of thought?"

Master Drury might well pause in his disquisition to ask, for Stephen was evidently not attending to a single word he said.

In fact, that young man was like the schoolboy who watches the slow hands of the schoolroom clock travel round to the hour of freedom. Hilda and he were to make a little expedition this afternoon out into the country, to visit her old nurse, who lived with a married daughter at the foot of a range of low hills some few miles from Biffey.

They were to drive there, have tea at the cottage, and drive home in the cool of the evening. The little phaeton was ready in the lane, outside the Parsonage gate, and Stephen was so anxiously awaiting Hilda's appearance, that he found it difficult to reply to Master Drury with as much accuracy as usual.

Presently Hilda came towards them as they sat on the lawn waiting for her. She was dressed in pure white—delicate, filmy stuff that floated about her like a cloud—and wore a large hat of coarse straw, with some real pink rosebuds pinned daintily into its lace trimmings.

"You must not expect great things from Joseph," she said, as they drove out from the streets on to the level country road. "He is old, like the rest of us at the Parsonage, and has seen his best days. I give him his head, and let him go his own lazy way, as a rule."

"I am in no hurry," Stephen said, leaning back with a comfortable sensation of laziness, while Hilda sat erect to guide the erratic footsteps of Joseph, a fat old grey cob. "The days are long, and the country is too delicious to hasten through."

"Old Susan will find us tea at her place, and I left word at home that father and uncle were to go to dinner without us if we were not home in time."

"Let us be late, by all means."

"And can your lordship go without your dinner, and content yourself with cottage fare? It will be very good: home-made bread and honey, and fresh butter, and delicious cream. Susan's daughter knows how to make one comfortable; but I thought a man must always, at all hazards, have his dinner."

"You have very hard thoughts of us poor men, Hilda. It is very cruel of you."

He had never before called her by her name, and now he seemed to do so unconsciously. Hilda got rosy red, and whipped up the ancient Joseph, who seemed far more inclined to browse by the wayside than to go forward on his pilgrimage.

"Susan is a dear old creature," she said, irrelevantly. Stephen did not much care what she talked about, so long as she talked to him and to no one else. "She is the only mother I have ever known. I missed her dreadfully when she went to live with her daughter. But it would have been selfish of me to keep her still with me, when her heart was wrapped up in her daughter and her little grandchildren."

At the end of an hour Joseph drew up of his own accord outside a trim vine-covered cottage by the wayside. There was a neat small garden, well stocked with flowers, in front, and at the side a yard where hens and ducks strutted about in a superior well-fed manner. Behind the cottage stretched a meadow, and from the meadow the hills rose gently upwards, covered with gorse, and pink with heather, now in full blossom.

An old woman in a snowy cap and apron, seated in the porch knitting, and rocking a cradle with her foot, rose up with eager welcome of voice and face for Hilda.

"My darling child!" she said, kissing the girl tenderly, yet respectfully; "this very day was I saying to Kate, 'I wonder what Miss Hilda is doing, and why she does not come out to see us!' And Kate's good man said that you had visitors at the Parsonage, he had heard say the last day he was to town."

"Here is our visitor, Susan," Hilda said, indicating Stephen with a bright smile. "Mr. Wray, from London."

"Long as I have known you, Miss Hilda, I never knew of a friend of the family of that name; not but what I am humbly glad to see you, sir." She looked at Stephen critically out of her clear old eyes, even while she curtsied low to him.

"It is really impossible, Susan dear, to account for Mr. Wray, and who he is, or what he is," Hilda replied, laughing. "None of us quite know; but yet we all feel quite friendly with him, so I hope you will do the same."

Then Kate, Susan's daughter, a comely dark-haired young woman, with a smiling face and rosy cheeks, came out to welcome Hilda. Two small children held to her skirts, and had to be kissed by Hilda, and made joyful with a gift of sweets.

"We are going to walk to the top of the hill, Kate," Hilda said pleasantly, "and then I am going to bring Mr. Wray back to enjoy some of your nice tea, with real cream in it, and your home-made bread."

Kate looked pleased in the extreme, and the old woman laughed for pleasure.

John, Kate's "good man," at this moment made his appearance, with a sturdy dark-haired lad of seven trotting at his heels. More greetings had to be exchanged with him, as he sheepishly saluted Hilda, with genuine pleasure at seeing her beneath the awkwardness withal—and the sweeties shared with Master Bobby, and then Hilda set off with Stephen across the field towards the hillside.

"How fond all those people are of you," Stephen said, half-jealously, as they passed onwards and upwards through a little grove of firs and larches that belted the hill-side. "I feel quite left out."

"You could hardly expect them to testify as much joy at seeing you as they felt for me," Hilda replied, stopping to gather a spray of woodbine waving above a clump of undergrowth. "I am afraid you are of a jealous temperament, Mr. Wray."

"I am where you are concerned," he said, with a sort of half-fierce abruptness.

Hilda coloured, but made no reply. On they went, and upwards; the path they followed ceased to be a path, and became only a mossy track up through the gorse and heather, with here and there a great lichen-covered rock strewn in the thick undergrowth of hill-side plants and brambles cropping up in their way. Hilda's light dress caught upon the thorns of a blackberry trail lying across the path. Stephen had to go down on his knees in the grass to endeavour to disentangle it without tearing the fabric.

"I am sure we look very picturesque in this attitude," he said, smiling up at her, with his blue eyes full of boyish fun. "I on my knees at your feet. Shall I kiss the hem of your robe?"

"If you like, only you will look rather idiotic."

Stephen laughed, and stood up, the dress being freed from the bramble.

"You are very matter-of-fact," he said. "You spoil all my little attempts at sentimentality."

"I dislike sentimentality," she replied.

"So do I, except as the exponent of real feeling. Then it is not silly, but eminently natural and right." At this instant something caught his eye, and he stepped aside into the heather. He came back to Hilda with a spray of white heath in his hand.

"Now, will you call me sentimental if I offer you this?" he asked, holding it towards her.

"No," she said. "It is very pretty, and I like to have it."

"But there is more in my giving it to you than meets the eye. I am afraid you will call me sentimental, so I shall keep it for myself."

"Tell me the hidden meaning," she said lightly, "and then I shall decide about the sentimentality."

"Here," he said abruptly, "I shall give it to you in exchange for this piece of woodbine you gathered just now." And he captured the hand which hung loosely by her side, holding the forgotten woodbine spray. She submitted without demur to the exchange of flowers, inquiring no further into the mystery of the white heather.

The ground became more broken now, with rocks piled confusedly together, and ranks of tall upstanding fern amongst the gorse. Hilda had to accept Stephen's help now and again, the grassy path was so slippery from the hot sun beating on its surface all day long, and drawing all the sap from the leaves.

"We shall be at the highest point of the range when we reach the summit of this heap of rocks," the young girl remarked breathlessly, as they paused an instant. Stephen sprang lightly from point to point, and gave his hand to Hilda whenever she came near him—which was not often, as she seemed to prefer finding her own way to the top. Once there, the view was wide and fine, and they sat down to enjoy it. In the far distance the blue line of sea, then the white houses of Flashford shining in the sunshine; away north the golden cloud that showed where Bullionston lay, with its factory chimneys; and all around, coming to the foot of the hills, the wide stretches of green downs, along which the hedgeless road from Flashford lay broad and white. Inland the country was wooded, and looked more fertile and park-like than towards the sea.

"It is delightful up here," Stephen said, tilting his straw hat far over his eyes, as he looked out across the fair sunshiny prospect. "I am glad we came."

"I am glad you like it," she replied. "It is one of my favourite expeditions. Long ago, when I was a child, Uncle Drury used to come with me; but of late years the climb is too much for me. I have come here in the winter, when the ground was hard with frost. You can't think how lovely it looks when the fields down there are unbroken sheets of snow, and those little trees below have each branch laden with it also. I like to come up here, and sit and look at it all, so that I may remember it."

"You so often speak of remembering a place," he said. "Do you, then, not expect to spend the rest of your life here at Biffey?"

"I do not know," she replied, with a sudden tremor in her voice.

Stephen turned sharply round and looked at her. Her face had taken on the lines he had come to know so well, expressive of utter hopelessness and sorrow: a deep shadow lying heavily in her eyes, a weary expression about her lips, and—another thing he noted at these times—a convulsive little gesture of the hands. This sudden shadow that fell upon her so often irritated Stephen, and chilled him. He did not know what it meant, and it seemed to push him far away from her, to settle down between his soul and hers like some chill curtain of doubt.

"Hilda," he said tenderly, laying his hand gently upon hers, as it rested palm-upward on her lap. "I wish you would tell me what it is troubles you. I have not been with you now day after day without seeing and knowing there is something. Am I not enough your friend to help you?"

"No one can help me," she said bitterly, and taking away her hand from his.

"Try me," he urged.

"It is no use," she said. Then, with a light laugh, with little mirth in it, "Let us be pleasant—we did not come up here to be mournful."

"I don't see anything mournful in telling one's troubles to a friend, and letting him share them," he persisted. "I have always found it such a comfort, for instance, to tell mine to Mary Owens."

She moved distinctly farther away from him as he said this. Stephen looked surprised, then suddenly a new light seemed to break in upon him, and he smiled to himself, as his gaze went out to the blue sea-line and remained there steadily.

"I should like to tell you about Mary Owens," he said, after a long pause.

She was silent, which at least was not encouraging.

"Why don't you speak?" he asked presently.

"I thought you were going to talk to me," she said, trying to make her voice seem natural and easy.

"Not if I bore you."

"You do not bore me. You were going to tell me something about your friend Miss Owens."

"Yes—I hope I shan't say anything a gentleman ought not to say," he began, plaiting a blade of grass into the lace edge of one of the flounces of her dress lying on the path near him, with an unconscious air, and as though he did not know that it was her dress he was ornamenting.

"You will see, as I go on, that it is rather difficult for me to express myself correctly about this matter. My people, specially my father, want me to marry Mary Owens."

In and out went the blade of grass through the lace. She could only see the side of his sunburnt cheek, as he bent his head over this engrossing occupation which he had invented for his idle hands to do.

"Well?" Hilda asked, after a long, long silence. Her heart beat so loud, so painfully. She had known all along what he was going to tell her.

"Well," he repeated, "I think you might help me out a little better than that. I don't want to say what is brutal, but I must, or you will not understand."

"I do not know what you want me to understand," she said.

"Yes, you do," he said brusquely, sitting up suddenly, and facing her. "You know, as well as I do, that I do not love Mary Owens, and that I shall never marry her."

Hilda's eyes fell before the fierceness in his, and she began to toy nervously with the piece of heather he had given her as they came up the hill.

"I did not understand that," she murmured; "I thought, from the way you have always spoken of her, that you did—care for her."

"You must have rather a peculiar opinion of me if you thought that," he said curtly, relapsing into his former position, leaning on one elbow and looking out over the landscape, the blade of grass interwoven with the lace on her dress left unheeded.

"I don't know how you, of all people on earth, could have thought that," he said presently. His voice had a subdued under-current of hurt anger in it, and he did not turn towards her as he spoke.

She did not ask him why she "of all people upon earth"; she only sat looking at his averted figure with eyes full of sorrow, and a half-startled expression on her face.

"I think you ought to do as your parents wish," she said presently, after long looking down over the slopes of russet upstanding fern to the golden band of gorse had brought her no inspiration what to do or say.

Stephen still surveyed the distant prospect in cold silence.

"Do you, indeed?" he said ironically. "I must say I disagree with you. I think marriage is a state so sacred that a man should be allowed to choose when, and with whom, he shall enter it."

"You are very young," she said.

"I am old enough to discriminate between what I like and what I don't like."

"You are a boy, as far as experience goes," she said, forcing herself to speak calmly, evenly—nay, lightly, as though the subject under discussion were not one of much import. "I am sure, from all I hear, that Miss Owens is a very charming young lady."

"Mary Owens is not charming. She is a good, true girl, and I love her too well to ask her to marry me unless I loved her as a man should love the woman he marries."

"Perhaps she would refuse you."

"That is extremely probable—indeed, I am quite sure she would. I am quite sure she looks upon me simply in the light of a rather troublesome brother. But her feelings towards me, whatever they might be, would not lessen my hypocrisy if I, not loving her, asked her to marry me."

"But your parents?"

"Hilda," he said, suddenly facing round on her, where she sat above him, a little farther off than when this conversation had commenced, "I cannot believe that in the depths of your heart you really believe what your lips are saying. You cannot think it would be right, or just, or holy for me to marry Mary Owens: not even to please my parents. I would do much for them. Perhaps, since I have been with you, and known you well, I have learned that I ought to do much for them, simply because they are my parents. But I cannot think that a sacrifice like this is required of any man. It would not be just to Mary, nor to myself, nor to another—for there is another person in the matter, Hilda—someone dearer to me than anyone else the world holds."

"Let us go down the hill," she said, rising abruptly. "It is getting very late, and they will be waiting for us."

He had no choice but to pick himself up and follow her, already springing lightly from rock to rock, until the grassy sward was reached, and there she turned and waited for him.

She gave him no opportunity of resuming what he had been saying, as they went briskly down the hill together, racing sometimes, laughing, chattering, like children at play. Stephen tried to be bad-tempered and dignified at first, but could not keep it up, and had to yield to the infection of her sudden gaiety. They came flying down through the plantation to the cottage much faster than they had gone up.

Tea was waiting for them, neatly spread in the little parlour of the cottage. The children, in fresh pinafores, and with faces shining from recent ablutions, stood watching for them at the gate. One small maid had gathered a posy for Hilda, the other offered a similar one shyly to "the gentleman." Master Bobby, in the background, finger in mouth, and sheepish, like his worthy father, watched these amenities with an appreciative grin. The baby was awake, and being dandled by its grandmother, and Hilda had to take him in her arms to feel how heavy the precious infant was, and stick her finger in his mouth to test how near was the arrival of his first tooth, and he not six months old!

Stephen stood looking on with a smile. He declined the baby, however, with alarm, when Hilda good-naturedly offered it to him. He would never forget that evening, with its innocent, happy laughter, and courtesies of rural life: the small square parlour where they had tea, with its old-fashioned, heavy furniture, its bewildering mazes of crochet-work antimacassars, its shell ornaments, and cheap gaudy oleographs. Their Royal Highnesses of Wales, in gold frames above the fireplace, smiled down benignly upon their lieges merry-making, and a bust of Lord Byron under a tall glass shade represented Art and Poetry.

Hilda seemed beside herself this evening. She laughed and talked incessantly, with a bright, unusual colour in her face.

Old Susan, looking at her nursing with affectionate, critical eyes, noted the change in her, and shrewdly laid it to the visitor's account.

Stephen made himself popular, played with the children, admired the baby—at a distance—scrutinised Bobby's copy-books, and took a peaceful stroll in the garden with John Peters, the master and father of the household.

The summer sunset was over, and the sweet summer twilight begun, when Joseph was harnessed and brought round, and the visitors left for home. They drove along the broad, dusty road in silence. Hilda's good spirits had suddenly evaporated, and she was pale and silent. Stephen had remembered his dignity, and the fact that he was offended with her, and he was silent also. The faded woodbine in his coat sent out its fragrance still, but Hilda's white heather was nowhere to be seen. She had thrown it away, probably.

One by one the stars came out and glimmered in the silent sky. The ceaseless cadence of the sea on its shingly beach came softly to their ears. Slowly the serenity of the eventide, the sense of calm and repose all about them, crept into their hearts. Hilda forgot to be cold, and Stephen to be angry.

"Home at last," she said, with a gentle sigh, as they reached the lighted outskirts of the little town.

"Yes," he replied. "I wish I could drive on so with you for ever, Hilda."

His voice was deep and earnest. She dared not utter the flippant rejoinder that came to her lips. Besides, her own heart was stirred to its inmost depths, and her lips were quivering in the darkness.

"I have been so happy to-day," he said, as they turned into the narrow laneway which led to the Parsonage. "Have you?"

"I am always happy when the weather is fine," she answered. Had it not been so dark he might have seen how her dewy eyes belied her indifferent speech.

Stephen laughed. Clearly he was to have nothing to say to her happiness, or the reverse.

The stable-boy was waiting for them at the door. He came forward at their approach like an apparition out of the gloom, and took the reins from Hilda. Inside the garden door the fragrance of the flowers greeted them. The drawing-room windows were brilliantly illuminated, sending long bars of light over the grassy lawn and flower-beds. The faint twang of Master Drury's spinet came out into the silence of the night. In the dining-room the supper-table was laid, and the shaded light fell on silver and gleaming glass.

"Stay a moment before you go in, Hilda," Stephen said huskily.

But when she had obeyed him he stood stock still at her side, silent, his tall figure lost in the gloom above her.

"I want to tell you something," he said.

"What is it?" she asked, very coldly.

A slight shiver went over her from head to foot, standing in the dewy grass, waiting for him to speak.

"I think you know," he said, speaking very fast and eagerly. "I think you must know. It is impossible that you and I should have been together so long as we have been—every day together these happy weeks past—without your knowing that all I have to say to you is that I love you. I love you with all my heart and soul. Up on the hillside to-day you called me a boy. But I am not a boy. I am a man, with a man's thoughts and a man's feelings. And I know that I love you—that you of all the world are dear and precious to me."

She said no word, only covered her face with her hands, and cowered away from him.

The sound of the spinet ceased, and Master Drury's figure crossed the lighted window. He was coming to the hall door to look out for the wanderers' return.

Stephen suddenly ceased his impassioned pleading, and caught Hilda in his arms.

"My darling!" he whispered tenderly, as he stooped his face to hers, and kissed her. Her cheeks were wet with tears.

No time to ask her the reason of this, for Uncle Drury opened the door. Hilda darted past him into the house, and up-stairs to her own room, leaving Stephen to make whatever remarks to the old gentleman his unaided genius might devise. She appeared no more down-stairs that evening.

CHAPTER X.

THE CEDAR-WOOD CASKET.

"That great procession of the Unloved, who not only wear a crown of thorns, but must hide it."—OLIVER W. HOLMES.

"THAT will do; you may go now. And remember, I shall not see anyone this evening. I am not very well."

The servant who had carried in tea looked furtively at Miss Owens as she spoke. She certainly was not looking well. Her face was white, and her eyes were red and heavy. It was a warm August evening, too, yet she had complained of feeling cold, and had ordered a fire.

She drew her chair nearer to the fire when the man had arranged the tea-things and left the room. She shivered again and again, and drew the light shawl she wore closer about her shoulders. She held in her lap a small cedar-wood box, and a letter in her hand. A long, long time she sat thus, crouched together, looking into the fire. The little ornamental time-piece on the mantel-shelf above chimed many times unheeded ere she at last roused herself from her apparently dismal meditations, and opened the letter she held mechanically in her hand. She read it slowly, carefully, now and again a large tear dropping slowly on it. What was it but a verification in black and white of the vague, uneasy suspicions which had been haunting her ever since Stephen had gone away, nearly six weeks ago, to Flashford-on-Sea?

She had never forgotten how he had spoken of the girl he had met there in the spring, how bashful he had looked, how awkwardly he had parried her questions. Like an "Elaine" he had said Miss Romney was. Mary tried to picture to herself the girl who had won Stephen's heart. Doubtless very beautiful, very fascinating. But would she—was it possible she could, or did—love Stephen as, she, Mary, loved him? She, who could look back over the years of her life, and not find there a moment when she had not loved him better than anyone else on earth—she, who would gladly give up everything for his sake: friends, position, fortune, all—she, to whom he was the very centre of existence? This other girl, this stranger, who had only crossed his path so lately, what was she that he should hold her dearer than the one who had always loved him, always been his closest, nearest friend?

For the twentieth time that miserable day she now read Stephen's letter. To her he had first turned in his happiness, as had always been his custom all their two lives long. He told her how he loved this fair strange girl—how, for the love he bore her, it seemed as though he had always known her. "When you see and know her, Mary, you will love her for her own sweet sake, as I do. But now, won't you love her for mine? You will stand by me, Mary, as you have always done? for my people will not welcome Hilda."

The letter was not much more coherent than that of most lovers, but the tidings it brought struck cold to the heart of the poor girl who read it.

He had not treated her badly. He had never by thought, word, or deed, given her cause to believe he cared for her otherwise than as a brother might love her. But now, in the agony of awaking to the fact that he was gone from her for ever, that his love was now irrevocably given to another, she found there had always been, very deep hidden in her heart, the secret hope that one day he would come to love her—that, in its own time, patient, enduring love, such as hers, must win a response. Now that secret hope had got its death-blow, and small, and paltry, and unsupported by reason as it had been, it died very hard. "Love without return is like a question without an answer," someone has remarked somewhere. And she felt that from henceforth her life must be but a maimed one, as she might no longer have even the poor pleasure of loving him in secret. Henceforth he must pass out of her heart, and passing, leave it cold and empty.

Stephen had not yet proposed to Hilda, he mentioned in a casual postscript, but meant to do so on the earliest opportunity. The idea that Miss Romney might refuse him never crossed Mary's mind; and even had it done so, she would have derived no satisfaction from the thought of something happening which would make Stephen very unhappy. When she had read the letter through she put it into the fire, and watched it blaze and burn, shrinking before the flames like a sentient being. Then she took a tiny golden key from her watch-chain, and opening the cedar-wood casket, emptied its contents into her lap.

Not flashing jewels, not priceless gems, neither gold nor silver, made up this little treasure-heap. There was nothing there of the smallest value to any human being save and except Mary Owens—each little paltry thing the token of some happy hour in the past, the memorials of a loving, foolish woman's heart, the trivial records of a secret, hidden love. They must go now, all the store of years, every one of them. What a little boy he was when he had given her this—a ring shaped from a peach-stone. They used to play at being little husband and wife in those days, and Annette used to be their visitor, coming gorgeous to see them in borrowed plumes of grown-up finery. This small red hymn-book he had given her one Christmas, her name scrawled on its fly-leaf in his boyish, uncertain hand.

Then here were his letters from school—very uninteresting—and his letters from college, and letters written from abroad, only a degree less dull than the schoolboy letters. Stephen had never dealt with the pen of the ready writer. A withered rose—fragrant yet—wrapped in a piece of note-paper, with a date written on it: that he had given her the day she and his sisters went to Oxford, at his request, to be present when his degree was conferred. How bright, and manly, and handsome he had looked that day, head and shoulders above the rest, with brave, fearless eyes, and frank, upright bearing; and how proud she had felt of him! Now she had not even the poor right to feel proud of him any more. He belonged to another from henceforth.

Every little token went, one by one, sorrowfully, slowly into the fire. It does not take long to destroy the gathered hoard of years.

There were around her in her drawing-room many gifts of his—vases, foreign pottery, photographs, costly trifles gathered up in his travels, but there was no need to banish or destroy them. They had been frankly offered as the gifts of a friend to a friend.

But these small secret treasures, which her own foolish heart had invested with a halo of romance—these things, each with some dear remembrance connected with it, some word he had spoken, some fragrance of that vanished time when there had been no sin in her loving him, some recollection of how he had looked and done on a particular occasion—all these must go. To these she had no longer any right. He loved another. He would never, in all the years to come, be more to her than a friend—perhaps, henceforth, not even that. She must give him up; she could never cease to love him, but she must school herself to forget that she did so.

Now the last link with the past was gone, and she sat gazing into the fire sorrowfully, with the empty casket on her lap.

"Will you see Mr. Davenent, ma'am? He is downstairs; he thought perhaps you might see him, if you knew he was here," the butler asked, softly entering the room.

"Certainly. I am always at home to Mr. Davenent," Miss Owens replied, closing and laying aside the empty casket, and pushing her chair back from the fire.

The old clergyman seemed anxious and worn, his thin face thinner and keener than ever. He looked sharply into Mary's face as she greeted him, but the room was only dimly lighted by one shaded lamp, and he could not see her very well.

"You are not well, they tell me," he said.

"Not very," Mary faltered.

"The idea of a fire this evening, my child! What possessed you to have one? It has been a breathless, sultry day, in my part of the world at least; out here the air seems almost country-like."

"I was chilly—I wished a fire—I think I must have taken cold."

Mr. Davenent looked keenly at her again, but she placed herself so as the light should not fall on her face.

"How are you?" she asked affectionately. "Overworked, I suppose, as usual."

"This hot weather tries me severely," he said, with a half-sigh. "You see, I am not so young as I used to be."

"And you never take a holiday, never take a rest. Always down in that dreadful stuffy, stifling East End; I wish you'd give it up. Surely you have earned repose now! I will pay gladly any number of young, strong clergymen to go down there and carry on your work."

He stopped her with a gesture of his hand.

"Where I have lived I will die, if my Master will allow me. I want no rest until I come to that rest which remains to the people of God. How can a man even think of rest when he considers he has only the short span of this life to work in, while the resting time is eternal!"

"But your life is so hard," she pleaded.

"Not so hard as the life Christ lived," he answered.

"Not so unloved, nor so solitary. I have much cheer, much joy in my life; I have much that He had not. The hardest life anyone can live is a selfish one—the most unsatisfying, the most dreary, the most unprofitable, even to the beloved self lived for. A selfish life defeats its own ends. But it was not to preach I came to see you this evening, my dear; not even to beg, which you will say is even more wonderful. I came out to Kensington to see an old college friend at present in the neighbourhood, and finding myself so near you, I resolved to come and see you, and ask you for a cup of tea."

"I shall ring for fresh tea," she said, rising. "I forgot to take mine when it was brought up, more than half an hour since."

"Such absence of mind looks suspicious, Mary. You must have had some very pleasant thoughts."

Mary laughed a little bitterly. Tea was brought, and she gave him his, attending on him with gentle, reverent affection, while he lay back in his easy-chair, enjoying the rare luxury of idleness, talking to her all the while of his "people," the subject ever uppermost in his thoughts. Mary tried to listen, to smile, to appear interested; but somehow her heart felt weighty as lead, and as empty as that cedar-wood casket on yonder table. Something forlorn in the girl's white face struck him as he rose to go.

"Mary," he said, laying one gentle hand on her shoulder, "all is not well with you this evening."

"What should be wrong with me?"

"Something is. You cannot hide from me that you are unhappy."

"Yes, I am," she answered, all reserve breaking down under the tenderness of the old man's voice and manner.

"May I not know?" he asked.

"No," she said hopelessly. "Or, at least, what is there to know? Nothing but the mere fact that I am lonely, so dreadfully lonely. What have I done that I should be shut out from all love, all brightness, from the happy home affections which other girls possess? Look at me here, day after day, living here my purposeless, useless life—no one in the wide world caring whether I live or die. I see my father at breakfast-time, when he reads the money articles in the paper, and does not know, half his time, whether I am at the table or not. We meet in the evening at dinner, and I endeavour to please him by talking about politics, or stocks, or some kindred topic, and he tells me, for all thanks, women have no business with such things, and we relapse into silence. And after my lonely day I come up-stairs to my lonely

"The woman I loved was your mother."—p. 185.

drawing-room, and work, or read, or eat my heart out in the silence. Is it wrong for me to wish for a little love, a little brightness? I could go into society, to be sure—to concerts and other entertainments—but I have tried all that kind of life, until my very heart is sick of it. I can get a companion, and she will freeze up at my approach, and deferentially agree with every word I utter. What is there wrong in me that I am never to be loved, never to have a friend who will love me for my own sake, not my money's? I read somewhere once about someone who wrote that 'her heart was breaking for a little love.' Well, I am just like that—I am envied by all who know me; I am well fed, well clothed. I have money for the gratification of every whim, every fancy, every caprice. And yet I am miserable—my heart is breaking for a little love."

Never had the old man seen her so far carried out of the deep calm of her ordinary manner. He let her pour forth her soul in passionate invective, and as he sat listening, he realised that there may be sore hearts in Kensington as in Bethnal Green, and sorrows as keen, if not so material, as hunger, and cold, and destitution.

"I can't see that there is anything wrong in what I crave," she went on, passionately. "I only ask for what other girls are born to. Is it because I am not beautiful that no one cares for me? Ugly women have just as much capability for suffering as lovely ones, and just as much capability for happiness. I suppose, as you sit there and listen to me, you are deeply shocked—you think me very wicked, very rebellious against God. Well, I am wicked and rebellious, and I can't help being both. I am sick of hearing people say I am so quiet and calm, when my heart is in a burning fever of restlessness!"

"Mary," he said, very gently and tenderly, as she paused, no reproach in eyes or voice, for he was not one to break the bruised reed. Her grief might be a sentimental one—not a hard, grim fact, like the griefs he met with every day amongst his poor—but it was none the less real and heart-filling, for all that. "Have I been neglecting you? Because you were neither hungry, nor sick, nor wicked, have I been overlooking you?—thinking, in my blindness, all was right and well with you, because you made no sign of its being otherwise? You have given much to Christ's poor—your money, your help, your ever-ready sympathy: have you given yourself? Have you, my daughter, like your namesake of old, chosen for yourself the better part?"

"I have chosen nothing," she said wearily. "I am not religious. Anything I did or gave was solely to please and to help you, because I love you. I did not do anything because I was good. I am not good: I don't think I ever shall be; I am only very, very unhappy, and very desolate. You cannot understand just how I feel. You are a man, and you have your work, which fills your life and thoughts. You cannot understand what it is to have no one to love you, no one to whom your coming means happiness and your going sorrow. You do not know what it is to long for this."

Mr. Davenant smiled. He passed his hand over his scant grey hair a little wearily.

"Et in Arcadia ego!" he murmured. Then drawing his chair nearer Mary's, he took her hand in his. "You think I do not know what you are feeling, my dear; you think that I recognise no sorrows but outward material ones. I know well how your sore little heart longs and cries out in its longing for love, Mary, for I have been through it all myself—I, the aged, commonplace old man. Listen, and I shall tell you. Thirty years ago, and more, I met and loved a woman who to me was the perfect embodiment of all that a woman should be: delicately refined, graceful, and intellectual besides—a woman whose every thought seemed in perfect harmony with mine. We met and loved. We were engaged, and to be married shortly, when a cloud came upon our happiness. I had been reading and hearing much of the terrible regions of destitute heathendom in this great, marvellous city of ours, and little by little the determination to take orders and give myself up to missionary work grew and took deeper root daily in my mind. I spoke of it to the woman I loved, to meet, for the first time, with a want of sympathy on her part. She urged me to consider my worldly career, all I was giving up; she called me foolish, fanatical; she pleaded with me to abandon my project, argued, expostulated, entreated, but to no purpose; I felt I could not live on as I was doing—idle, careless, easeful; and yet I was bound to her in love and honour. One day her own hand severed the link which bound me to her. A short, cold letter, saying, as I would not yield to her wishes, all must be over between us. Shortly after that I heard of her engagement to a wealthy man. Mary, the day I heard that, I thought my heart was broken; I was half-mad with despair. I felt I had let her slip away from me, for I well knew all those weeks before, from the time her letter came, I had only to go to her, renounce for ever all idea of entering the ministry, and every cloud would have rolled away from between us, and she would have been my own again. Even now, in the teeth of this other engagement, I knew it was not yet too late. By giving up the path I had chosen, I could have won her. But I did not, Mary; all earthly love, all dreams of earthly happiness, went out of my life then; I was stranded on the shore of life. And do you not think I felt the pang of tearing her from my heart a very bitter one? Was not the life-loneliness, self-doomed, very, very hard to bear, to live through, to live down, to rise above, until now it is only a faint sad memory in an old man's heart?"

Mary had slipped from her chair, and was kneeling on the carpet beside him, with her face hidden. When his solemn, thrilling voice broke and ceased, she raised her head.

"Forgive me," she whispered brokenly, "you have suffered too."

"The woman I loved was your mother, Mary."

Mary looked up in amazement.

"Yes, my dear, it is true. Now perhaps you know just how I feel to you, why I love you very dearly, why your griefs and sorrows are mine. You were but a little child, Mary, when your dying mother sent for me, and asked me to be kind to you for her sake."

"And you have fulfilled your trust," Mary whispered, pressing her trembling lips to the worn old hand in hers. "How could she have treated you so cruelly?"

"Hush, hush! my dear! I only told you this story to-night to show you that others have felt and suffered as you do now, and have lived through it, and come out of the trial perhaps all the better and holier for it."

They sat in silence a long time—the old man and the young girl. She, still kneeling at his side, with tearful eyes, stirred to the very depths of her nature; and he, with a smile lingering about his lips, gazing thoughtfully into the fire, with his mind away in the far past, when for him all the world had been young.

Presently he laid his hand solemnly on the girl's head, and began to speak in a deep, thrilling voice that went straight to her heart, and lingered in her memory years after he had been gathered to his well-earned rest.

"I do not reproach you, my child, for anything you have said to me here this evening. I do not seek to meet your sorrow with platitudes about what you ought to feel, and ought to say. God help us all, every one! our actions and our thoughts are very far removed from what they ought to be. I recognise that you have a sorrow, and a real one—it may go a little deeper even than you have revealed to me to-night. There may have, this day, occurred some incident which peculiarly brought your trouble home to you.

That I do not know, and what you do not tell me I do not ask to know. But I will try to point you out a cure for your loneliness. I do not ask you to think of the silent pain silently endured by myriads of human souls like yours. To think of all that others endure augments our own pain instead of lessening it. There may be philosophy in assuring ourselves we are no worse off than hundreds of others, but there is no consolation to be found thus. There is little use in rebelling against our fate, in kicking against the pricks, in asking ourselves why these things be. The crooked will be made straight, and the rough places plain, when He comes, and not till then. It is not for us to alter or to choose. What we have got to do is to live our life, whatever it may be; and as a cure for your sorrow, for your loneliness, I ask you to contemplate the Man of Sorrows. Think of the awful loneliness of Christ. Who, of all the millions who have trod this earth, was so friendless, so forsaken as He? He bowed His back to endure intense sorrows, such as none of us can ever know. He took His full share of human miseries. He sounded all the depths of human agonies. He hungered for love, for sympathy, for the poor homage of belief from His disciples, and He was given none of these things. He died as He lived, the most lonely man earth ever knew. I think, if you will sit at His feet, and learn of Him, your sorrows will lessen and drop from you, in the marvellous light His love and

His sorrow shed all along the centuries for us, who, but for that light, must for ever wander, forsaken and desolate, in outer darkness."

Mary would never forget these solemn, thrilling words, nor the touch of the old hand resting so lovingly on her bent head, as she knelt weeping at his side.

A confused sound of many voices and hurrying feet down-stairs aroused them. A housemaid, pale and breathless, burst into the room.

"Oh, miss! come at once. Master's got a fit. When James went to tell him it was bedtime, he found him lying forward over the table, and we can't rouse him."

Mr. Davenant sprang to his feet, told Mary to stay where she was until he came back, and ran down-stairs to the group of whispering, terrified servants. The doctor was promptly sent for, by his orders, and a trained nurse, and then he and some of the men carried the poor stricken body, with its prone trailing hands, up-stairs, and laid it in bed, applying such remedies as his long experience of sickness had taught him until the medical man arrived.

There was no hope, he said, from the first moment. Just two weary nights and days of watching by the sick-bed, and then Mary Owens was fatherless: alone in the world, the undisputed mistress of an immense fortune.

A HYMN FOR THE NEW YEAR.

BY THE LADY LAURA HAMPTON, AUTHOR OF "MUSINGS IN VERSE," ETC.

"My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest."

MY presence shall go with thee; fear not,
though dark the way,
It leads through night of sorrow to dawn of endless day.

My presence shall go with thee, where thorns spring up around,
And bleeding feet are stumbling upon the rocky ground;

Where divers paths are meeting, thou knowest not the road;

Where weary steps are flagging beneath thy heavy load,
When flesh and heart are failing 'neath sharp affliction's rod;

Alike thou feel'st forsaken by loved ones and by God.

When th' enemy attacks thee with falsehood's venom sting,

Whispers thou hast fallen from the shadow of My Wing;

When doubts and cares surround thee, and sickness
draweth nigh,

And storm-waves rage and thunder, and lift their crests on high;

When death itself approaches, and deep the valley's shade,

My presence shall go with thee—fear not, nor be afraid."

Rest, for My Name is on thee, no enemy prevails,
The blood-stained Cross is glist'ning, the subtlest tempter fails.

Rest, for My hand upholds thee, I rule the vessel's helm,

My nail-marked palm is guiding, no billows overwhelm.

Rest, for My feet have trodden the rough and briar-strewn way,

And in My footprints treading, thou shalt not go astray.

Rest, for I know thy sorrows, My heart has throbb'd with grief!

No agony thou feelest but I can bring relief.

Rest, for My arms are round thee, soft pillowed on My breast,

Child of My love! oh, trust Me, and I will give thee rest.

THE PRESENCE OF GOD IN HOLY PLACES.

A SERMON PREACHED AT THE CONSECRATION OF ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH, CANNES, BY THE RIGHT REV. C. W. SANDFORD, D.D., LORD BISHOP OF GIBRALTAR.

"And Jacob set up a pillar in the place where God talked with him, even a pillar of stone: and he poured a drink offering thereon, and he poured oil thereon. And Jacob called the name of the place where God spake with him, Beth-el."—GEN. xxxv. 14, 15.

ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH, CANNES.

THE narrative of Jacob's dream at Bethel supplies one of the earliest and most striking examples to be found in Holy Scripture, of a special sanctity being attached to a special place. There was nothing in the spot itself to suggest thoughts of God's presence. Its outward aspect in the days of the patriarch must have been very like its outward aspect at the present time. Then, as now, the ground would have been strewn with bare, hard rocks. Save these boulders there was nothing distinctive in the scene, nothing to quicken the imagination, nothing to suggest the fitness of the place to be a sanctuary of God. But the spot was hallowed to the eye of the patriarch as being the place where in an hour of extreme desolation he had been cheered by a vision of angels, and by the voice of God Himself. A homeless wanderer, fleeing from the wrath of an injured brother, in the midst of peril, and with an unknown future before him, he had lain down at sunset on the rough ground for rest, taking stones of the place for a pillow. Then had been given to him a wondrous vision. In his dreams he had beheld a ladder reaching from earth to heaven, and above he had heard the voice of God assuring him of ultimate restoration to the land of promise, and of protection in all places whither he might go. As he awoke from sleep, there had come the thought, "Surely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not." . . . "This is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven." Then, to commemorate the vision, and to mark the spot as holy, he had set the stone on which he had rested, as a pillar, and had vowed that if God would be with him and be his God, on his return he would make the place the house of God.

Many long years pass away. God, during those years, has more than fulfilled the promise of protection, and has blessed Jacob with an abundance of flocks and herds, and with all the elements of primitive wealth. The patriarch is again at Bethel, again at the same spot, having come to redeem his vow, and to consecrate the place as a temple to God. "And Jacob," so runs the sacred story, "set up a pillar in the place where God had talked with him, even a pillar of stone; and he poured a drink-offering thereon, and he poured oil thereon. And Jacob called the place where God spake with him, Bethel."

This act of Jacob is not the only example to be found in Holy Writ of a special sanctity being assigned to a special place. The history of the patriarchs affords many an instance of altars erected to mark particular spots made holy in their thoughts as having been the scene of personal intercourse between them and God. The notion that places where God has revealed His presence derive sanctity from such revelation, and should be approached by man with reverence, has the very highest sanction and authority. When Moses came near to see the burning bush, God is represented in the sacred record as calling unto him, and saying, "Draw not nigh hither; put off thy shoes from off thy feet; the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." One of the first promises made by God to the people of Israel, when He had delivered them from Egypt, was that He would appoint for them a place, and whenever they came before Him there, He would bless them, if only they came before Him with such a mind as to place no hindrance in the way of His blessing. "In all places where I record My name, I will come unto thee, and I will bless thee." So long as the Israelites remained God's people, they were never without a place where God had recorded His name, a place set apart for worship, and where He gave them His blessing, a place where He vouchsafed His presence in a way different from that ordinary presence by which He fills heaven and earth. In the wilderness there was the Tabernacle. In the Land of Canaan there was the famous Temple of Jerusalem. The pillar of cloud which rested upon the one, the cloud of glory which filled the other at its dedication, were visible tokens of God's presence, visible tokens of the sanctity which those places derived from God's presence, visible tokens of the reverence and holy awe in which God intended that those places should be held by His worshippers. And so in Christian times it has been the custom, when God has spoken to His children in any specially impressive manner, whether the message was one of sorrow or one of joy, to mark the spot by wayside crosses, or churches built to His glory.

Following the example set us by God's people in all ages, we have met together to-day for the purpose of dedicating to God's honour this edifice erected on ground already made holy in our eyes by a signal visitation of His providence. Three years ago, close to this spot, the youngest son of our Queen was struck down by sudden death in the very flower of what promised to be a bright and useful life. We had hoped, from the proofs of thoughtful intelligence which the Prince from time to time had given in his public utterances, that he would one day fill a conspicuous place in the intellectual, scientific, and philanthropic life of the nation. But God has willed otherwise. Just as life, with all its golden opportunities, began to open upon him, he was taken away, to the inconsolable sorrow of his youthful consort, and of our beloved Queen. When the first pangs of anguish were assuaged, they to whom the Prince was nearest and dearest felt that the most appropriate manner in which they could testify at once their love for the departed, and their recognition of God's Fatherly chastening, was to erect a church near to the spot where the spirit of their brother had passed away. All here will acknowledge that there could not be a more fitting memorial. It accords with precedent observed by the saints of God from the earliest childhood of our race. Like the pillars of stone, like the wayside crosses, and other holy structures, which God's people have erected in all ages and countries to commemorate events in which God was felt to have come especially near to them, this church is a token that in the great sorrow which befell us here, we too acknowledged God's hand, we heard God's voice, and we have taken home to our hearts the message which He gave. We see in the trial with which He then visited His people a solemn reminder that our earthly life is short, uncertain, transitory; we must not let its manifold opportunities of good slip idly from our hands; we must finish the work God has given us to do while the sun is in the heavens: "The night cometh, when no man can work." This church is also a token of our Christian belief. It is a national acknowledgment, erected on a foreign shore, that when our friends are taken from us we sorrow not as men without hope. Through the pardoning mercy of a Father in heaven, and the merits of a Divine Saviour, we look for reunion, in a better country, with those we have loved and lost awhile.

But this place is now sacred to us for other reasons. The prayers and praises which our hearts have just uttered, and the Divine blessing which we have asked of God, and which, if we asked in faith, He has doubtless given, have consecrated the place, and made it holy. It is now the Lord's own for ever. It is now set apart from all common uses to the honour of God's great name, and dedicated for all time to His worship. We nothing doubt but that, in accordance with His own promise, "Where two or three are gathered together in My name, there am I in the midst of them," God has been with us in the services of this day. We nothing doubt but that He has taken possession of this house; and though we could not see His presence, yet He has been with us as really and effectually as when He settled in a pillar of cloud upon the Tabernacle, or when He filled the Temple at Jerusalem with His glory.

But some perhaps will say, the notion of any special sanctity belonging to any special place savours more of the Law than of the Gospel. It is true that the Jewish people called Mount Zion the holy mountain, and honoured the Tabernacle and the Temple as special abodes of God's glory. But Christ taught His disciples to lay aside all local notions of worship, saying, "God is a Spirit, and they who worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth." The true seat of prayer is our hearts and spirits. Whatever be the place of worship, be it the wild mountain side, be it the village cottage, be it the rudest and least Christ-like house that was ever built, so long as prayer comes from our hearts and spirits, there is God's temple, and there His holy mountain.

True, most true. But while we avoid the abuse, let us not forego the pious and godly use of holy places. We know the power which places have to stir the religious affections. When, for example, we visit the home of our childhood, and recall the memory of the departed, when we stand by their last earthly resting-place, when we tread the spot where they spent the last days of their life, or where we last saw their face, heard the sound of their voice, felt the pressure of their hand, we seemed to be nearer to them, and to God who has now taken them to Himself, than we are elsewhere. We may not be really nearer, but we feel ourselves nearer. Our love for them and for God, who gave us the happiness of their companionship, acquires fresh life and fervour. Such holy influences, which we all must at times have felt on visiting old familiar scenes, let us cherish. They are hidden links between us and the unseen world. They are ladders by which we climb heavenwards. They are presages of the day when, as we hope and believe, we shall meet, in the near presence of God, our beloved again. Since, therefore, the sacred memories and associations connected with particular spots are found to have this power of opening the fountains of the heart, and of giving wings to our prayers, surely we do well to set such places apart, and dedicate them for all time to God's glory.

We should remember that if Christ has warned us against narrow, exclusive, and superstitious views concerning places of religious worship, He also taught in a most emphatic way, when He drove the traders from the Temple, that such places should be held in reverence. This reverence which He claimed for the outer courts of the Jewish Temple, be it our endeavour to show towards this house of Christian worship. Our reverence we may show in many different ways. We are showing our reverence when we use the help which art supplies to make the church in outward beauty and in all its external appliances accordant with the dignity and intrinsic value of worship. We are showing our reverence when we take a regular and devout part in its services of prayer, praise, and thanksgiving. We are showing our reverence when we make those services tell upon our daily conduct in the outer world. That is no true reverence which treats religion as a thing to be kept apart and isolated. Religion receives highest and truest honour when its tone, its spirit, and its principles are made to permeate, exalt, and sanctify man's whole life and nature. Turn we to such account the opportunities which this holy place will offer, and it will be to us in very truth what Bethel was to the patriarch, "No other but the house of God and the gate of heaven."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SPECIAL LESSON FOR THE NEW YEAR.

To read—various passages.

A NEW year! How quickly last seems to have passed—how far off seems end of present! Twelve months, 52 weeks, 365 days: four seasons—13 full moons—26 spring tides. Must pass through cold winter with ice and snow—spring with opening buds—hot summer with flowers and fruit—autumn with fall of the leaf and decay. Circumstances of our life may perhaps change; leave home for school—or school for business. Perhaps change health for sickness, joy for sorrow; perhaps lose brothers, parents, etc. Quite new life may open out. Who knows? Not we, but God. See what Bible says about years.

I. DIVISION OF YEARS. (Read Gen. i. 1–5; 14–19.) Account of creation of world: light first thing made; then on fourth day sun and moon. What do they do? Give regular light and warmth. But more than that—divide time into regular intervals. (a) Days. Earth moves round in 24 hours—each place at noon opposite the sun—hence division into days, reckoned by Jews from sunset to sunset (verse 5), by us from midnight to midnight. (b) Months. Natural division into 28 days, from one full moon to next—but different nations different lengths of months. In England 12 (not 13) in each year. (c) Weeks. Appointed by God in Paradise—six days' work to one day of rest—hence get weeks, only mentioned twice in Old Testament: weeks of harvest (Jer. v. 24), and prophecy of Christ's coming after 70 weeks (Dan. ix. 24). (d) Years. Tell how earth has two motions—one turning round on itself in 24 hours, and at same time moving round sun. (Illustrate by spinning a coin so as to turn round and move about at same time). Earth moves round sun in 365 days—hence get complete year.

What does all this teach?

1. The flight of time. We cannot stay it. Must always move on. Where? To eternity. As river to ocean, so time to eternity.

2. The use of time. Each day—week—month—year of earth and sun its own work to do. Sun now visible to us—at our night, to other side of world. Seasons vary with cold and heat to benefit crops, fruit, etc. All have work to do in appointed time, and do it. All show God's glory. What an example to us!

II. TEACHING OF YEARS. Year with four seasons emblem of man's life.

Spring—speaks of hope—of promise. Trees put forth abundant blossoms, beautiful to outward eye. How many come to fruit? So youth—smiling faces—pleasant life—many promises—heart full of love—how will it end?

Summer—like prime of life—bearing heat of day—temptations many; how borne? (James i. 10—12.)

Autumn—fruits of earth come to perfection or blasted by decay. Which shall it be? Fruit of Spirit (Gal. v. 24) or works of darkness?

Winter—end of life—death—shall it be gloom or joy? Promise of future rising to shame or eternal day!

LESSON. So teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts to wisdom.

THE CAPTIVITY AND RESTORATION OF JUDAH.

NO. 8. CAPTIVES IN BABYLON.

To read—Daniel i.

HAVE had several lessons about end of Jewish monarchy, destruction of Jerusalem, and Jews taken captive to Babylon. Begin this year with new book—new period of Jewish history.

I. PRINCES IN EXILE. (1—16.) Jehoiakim (or Eliakim), eldest son of Josiah, last good king—finally conquered by Nebuchadnezzar, B.C. 606, bound in chains, but died before going to Babylon. (See Jer. xxii. 19.) This date of Daniel's exile and beginning of seventy years' captivity.

City of Jerusalem burned and deserted.

Temple destroyed—vessels put in idol-house in Shinar, i.e. Chaldaea, south of Assyria.

Princes taken captive to Babylon.

Now selection made of some princes. They must be—

(a) Of royal family—to be brought up at court.

(b) Well educated—to be trained as judges.

(c) Of good health and appearance—fit to present to the king.

Such to be further taught Chaldean language, literature, etc. Chosen at age of fourteen—to receive three years' training. Receive daily portion of meat—have new names, taken from idols, to blot out memory of their home and God. Did it do so? Difficulty arises about the food. Jews forbidden—

(a) To eat blood of animals. (Lev. vii. 26.)

(b) To eat things offered to idols.

(c) To drink much wine.

Daniel makes a stand, though only a boy of fourteen. Has already gained favour with his guardian.

He cannot go against his conscience.

He can trust God to uphold his strength.

He begs a trial of simple food for himself and friends. Result most favourable—so for three years lived on plain diet.

NOTICE. 1. Their bodies were healthy.

2. Their minds increased in wisdom.

3. Their trust in God was strengthened.

LESSON. I will keep under my body, and bring it into subjection.

II. PRINCES IN FAVOUR. (17—21.) All increased in learning.

Daniel's special skill in visions and dreams. All came from God, who gives mental as well as bodily powers. (James i. 17.) Time come to go to court. King tests them—finds them wiser than any of the other learned men—so gives them good position at court—and they prospered.

LESSONS. 1. Reward of bravery in doing right—God's blessing.

2. Reward of diligence in study—man's favour.

NO. 9. THE KING'S DREAM.

To read—Daniel ii.

I. THE DREAM. (1—12.) All people dream—sometimes pleasant dreams about people and things known—sometimes painful, sad, strange ones. God used to make His will known sometimes thus; e.g.:—

Joseph's two dreams. (Gen. xxxvii. 6, 9.)

Pharaoh's two dreams. (Gen. xli. 4, 5.)

Also Jacob's dream. In New Testament—Joseph, husband of Mary. (St. Matt. i. 20.)

Nebuchadnezzar had a dream which troubled him.

Calls four classes of wise men. What does he say?

He has forgotten the dream.

They must tell the dream and interpret it.

If not, they must die.

If yes, they shall have great rewards.

This shows the king's character—

Exacting, in demanding impossibilities.

Cruel, in ordering wise men to be killed.

II. THE PRAYER. (13—23.) Notice Daniel's conduct. He shows—

- (a) Prudence—asking for time.
 - (b) Wisdom—in consulting his friends.
 - (c) Faith—in praying to God.
 - (d) Gratitude—in blessing God.
- He ascribes all to God.
- (a) God has all wisdom—gives to whom He will.
 - (b) God has all power—does what He will.
- So Daniel brought to the king and tells the dream.
- LESSON. God giveth wisdom—out of His mouth cometh knowledge.

III. THE DISCLOSURE. (31—45.) First, what was the dream?

A colossal human form—bright, beautiful.

A strange figure—four different materials.

A stone appears—strikes the image.

Image crumbles, decays, is blown away.

Stone becomes a mountain—fills the earth.

What did it all mean? Four kingdoms destroyed.

1. Gold head—Babylon—great kingdom.

2. Silver breast and arms—Persia—conquered Babylon.

3. Brass belly—Greece—conquered Persia.

4. Clay feet—Rome—conquered Greece.

Then comes new Kingdom—God's Kingdom.

This Kingdom unlike others, for—

(a) Made without hands. (Heb. ix. 11.)

(b) Spreads gradually from small beginning. (St. Matt. xiii. 32.)

(c) Extends over all. (1 Cor. xv. 25.)

(d) Lasts for ever. (St. Luke i. 33.)

IV. THE HONOUR. (46—49.) King falls before Daniel—honours him—praises his God—rewards him—makes him chief ruler.

LESSON. Them that honour Me I will honour.

NO. 10. THE GOLDEN IMAGE.

To read—Daniel iii.

I. THE COMMAND. (1—7.) Nebuchadnezzar at height of power—been victorious in many lands—builds an image of gold—most think it was image of himself—great height, 100 ft. by 10 ft. wide—now determines to dedicate it—see his great pride.

(a) Makes huge image of himself.

(b) Assembles all princes, etc., to honour it.

(c) Requires honour and glory to be done to him.

At same time issues cruel order as to those who refuse.

II. THE REFUSAL. (8—18.) Who alone disobey? Why? Because—

(a) They fear God.

(b) They may not worship a graven image.

(c) They are not afraid of death.

What does the king do?

At first offers them another chance—then has furnace heated seven times more—binds these three young princes—casts them into the fire.

Notice their conduct.

(a) Faith. Have firm trust in God.

(b) Courage. Will rather die than sin.

LESSON. In the Lord will I put my trust.

III. THE DELIVERANCE. (23—30.) All are watch- ing the fire.

Three men cast in bound.

Four men seen walking free.

God has seen, noted, saved. An angel like the Son of God is with them—they are unhurt.

Now notice the King's conduct.

(a) He summons the three men.

(b) He blesses their God.

(c) He acknowledges God's power.

(d) He forbids any disrespect to God.

(e) He promotes the three men.

LESSONS. 1. Decision between right and wrong.

2. Effect of example—others do right.

3. Trust. God never fails.

NO. 11. NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S FALL.

To read—Daniel iv.

I. THE STORY. (1—7.) Copy of a decree issued by Nebuchadnezzar, some years after events in last chapter. Seems to have gradually increased in honour, fame, might, wealth, etc. Now tells the story of his fall and rise again. Desires to show God's greatness and his own littleness. Another dream—gathering of wise men—unable to interpret—sending for Daniel—his interpretation.

II. THE DREAM. (8—18.) What was it?

(a) A tree—great, strong, high.

(b) Leaves fair—fruit good.

(c) Branches giving shade to cattle.

Angel-watcher descends from heaven.

Tree is cut down—only stump remains.

Branches, leaves, fruit, all become useless.

This to last for seven times, i.e. years.

III. THE INTERPRETATION. (19—27.) The tree was the king himself.

His power, greatness, influence wide and far.

But should be cut down. His mind would leave him.

For seven years would be as an animal.

Yet his kingdom would remain to him.

So the prophet urges him to repent—but in vain.

All this came true. After twelve months judgment came.

The time. During king's boasting speech.

The manner. Peculiar kind of madness.

The duration. The time appointed by God.

The effect. God was acknowledged. Notice—

Pride brought about this calamity.

Suffering caused the cure.

God's glory was the result.

IV. THE LESSONS. 1. Warning. Remind how God always warns before punishing. Examples—

Noah—to people before Flood.

Lot—to Sodom.

Jonah—to Nineveh.

Christ—to Jews.

2. Punishment—if warning not heeded.

Pharaoh and the plagues.

Eli's two sons killed.

On the other hand—

Manasseh repented (2 Chron. xxxiii. 19).

Prodigal Son returned.

TEXT. Before I was afflicted I went astray, but now have I kept Thy Word.

CHRISTMAS

CHRISTMAS then! the worn world sleeping
 'Neath its coverlet of snow!
 Cumbersome coaches slowly creeping
 With the guests of high and low!
Christmas bells to chime of meetings,
 Ringing down past strife and care!
Christmas love and Christmas greetings,
 Christmas kindness everywhere!

Christmas now! the old earth pleading,
 With the raindrops in her eyes!
Heavy-laden trains swift speeding
 With their Christmas argosies!
But the bells still chime of meetings,
 Still ring down past strife and care!
Old-time Christmas love and greetings,
 Old-time kindness everywhere!

GENTLENESS AND GREATNESS.

"Thy gentleness hath made me great."—PSALM xviii. 35.

TO conceive of God as a gentle Being is by no means easy. As a matter of fact, men have never risen to this lofty conception except under the inspiring influence of Divine Revelation. Reason of itself is not capable of lifting them to this height; only when Faith comes to its aid can it soar into the infinite azure, and view God as He really is.

Men are prone to think of God as being altogether such a one as themselves, and to transfer to Him the passions and infirmities of their own nature. Hence many of the wisest and best among men have so seriously misconceived His character, and so grossly misrepresented it, that their portraits of Him have been hideous caricatures. There is no sadder chapter in the history of human thought than that which records what men have imagined and said of God. Nor does this remark apply merely to what has been said of the Deity by heathen philosophers; it applies with even greater force to the utterances of many Christian theologians. Men without Revelation were in the nature of beings incapable of forming true ideas of God; but not more incapable, as the result shows, than some who have had that Revelation and misused it.

Man is naturally inclined to look upon the more violent forces of Nature—the tempest, the earthquake, and the fire, rather than upon the gentler forces—the dew, the rain, and the sunshine, as the highest manifestations of Divine energy. This tendency comes of man's comparative littleness and weakness. He makes much of those things which seem to most palpably indicate the Unseen Presence; which beget an overwhelming sense of the greatness and power of the Eternal; and in which he instinctively recognises the august voice of the Divine Majesty. The vast ocean, the illimitable universe, the crashing thunder, the flashing lightning, the roaring flood, and the burning volcano; the sudden, the startling, the awful, the marvellous: these are the phenomena which most readily and directly inspire men with ideas of God. Out of these mainly grows man's sense of the Infinite Power. The consciousness of guilt which tortures his spirit suggests that God is wrathful as well as powerful; and these twin ideas form the substance of the average human conception of the Divine Being.

But this is not the Biblical, and especially it is not the Christian, conception of God; that is to say, it is not the whole of that conception—only half, and the lesser half too. The Bible teaches us that God's loftiest revelations of Himself are gentle; that He is to be found in "the still small voice" rather than in hurricane or earthquake or devouring flame; that His Goodness is His Glory; and that His Love is the highest form of His Almightyness. It is wonderful, when one looks into it, how much of the tenderness of the Divine Nature was revealed even under the dispensation of Sinai. The loving-kindness of God cannot possibly be celebrated in loftier or sweeter strains than those of the Hebrew bards and prophets. Although we possess larger and loftier conceptions of God the Father than David could attain to, inasmuch as we have seen God the Son and heard His voice, we can find no richer, more expressive, or more beautiful language in which to set forth our wonder and love and praise than that of David, the seer and singer of Israel.

The quality of the Divine character here called gentleness is a manifold quality; it takes up into itself all the highest attributes of God. There is no one word which completely sets forth its nature, though there are many words which describe its varied features. Some prefer one reading and some another: "Thy goodness hath made me great;" "Thy Providence;" "Thy help;" "Thy humility;" "Thy discipline;" each of these in turn has been used by expositors. The translators of our grand old Authorised Version preferred gentleness, and they did well. But perhaps the word which comes nearest to giving perfect expression to this great idea is condescension: "Thy condescension hath made me great."

Thus the teaching is that God, by stooping to man's need, by laying aside His greatness and terribleness so that He may be viewed without paralysing dread, by revealing Himself as Love rather than Power, makes man great. David's experience was that God's pitifulness and tender mercy had helped him to love goodness and grow in it; had developed within him moral greatness; had evolved him gradually out of the gross and the animal, up to rational, spiritual, noble manhood. And this is the experience of all who pass from the lower to the higher. If we have come to experience similarity of disposition with God, it is because He has helped us by His gentleness and grace. Love of the God-like, growth in the love and practice of the God-like, are not born in man; they are not spontaneously generated within him; nor are they, as many now affirm, created by his environment; they are the results of Divine forces operating at the very core of his being. Moral greatness is not the consequence of the education of the intellect, nor the reward of man's unaided struggles after virtue; it is the effect of the Divine culture of the human spirit. Every great and pure soul is constrained to say: "By the grace of God I am what I am;" "Thy gentleness hath made me great;" and realising that their souls can grow and greatness only in God's presence and under the culture of His hand, all such seek to dwell in Love, and thus dwell in God.

The Divine gentleness is exercised towards man in many and diverse ways. How gentle is "the God of all comfort" in His consolations! Who can soothe the grief of a child with such tender and gracious skill as a mother? A mother's love, in its delicacy, intensity, and constancy, surpasses that of any other earthly friend. When all others weary of the vigil beside the couch of the little sufferer, she watches on, her heart now bounding with hope, and anon aching with anxiety. Her eye notes every movement of the patient; her love anticipates every want, and satisfies it ere it can deepen into necessity or express itself in the language of request or entreaty. There is no earthly comforter equal to a true mother. And the saint is the child of God. In his Divine Parent he finds the tenderness of the mother, and the strength of the father. "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him. . . . As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort thee." What language could more beautifully and impressively set forth the gentleness of God as the Comforter? All the self-sacrificing love, the patient devotion, the unsleeping watchfulness, and the unconquerable energy which we find in the true mother are found in the all-merciful Father in an infinite degree.

In His chidings and chastisements, also, God will be gentle towards us. "He will not always chide," and when He does He will seldom do it in anger; never, in fact, unless the child be defiant as well as disobedient. Even when, in consequence of our stubbornness and stiff-neckedness in rebellion, He has to chide us angrily, He will not "keep His anger for ever." His displeasure will soon pass away. If we love Him our relation towards Him is that of children, and if we live in harmony with that relationship there will be no wilful, flagrant, and persistent disobedience of His will, but only such fault and failure as arise from infirmity, thoughtlessness, and waywardness. And we shall be corrected, as we correct our children, by love rather than by anger. Even in the sharper chastisements which are needed, and being needed are used, to subdue our pride and train us to humility and submissiveness, the Divine Husbandman will use the most gentle means which are compatible with a thorough pruning of the tree, that it may grow into fruitfulness and beauty.

The effect of the Divine gentleness on man is to greatness and dignify him; to exalt him to the loftiest manhood which he is capable of attaining; to make him a child of the Highest. Man is capable of the most sublime greatness, of likeness to God, of union with and participation in the Divine. Only as the human partakes of the Divine can it be made great. Humanity left to itself can only wither, dwindle, and die. Of all idolatries, the most irrational is the worship of Humanity. It is the worship of the creature rather than the Creator, and apart from the Creator the creature cannot be conceived to exist, much less to have an independent glory of its own.

To understand the nature of true greatness is to take one step towards its attainment. We see the true ideal in God as revealed to us in Christ. This elevates and ennobles us; but false ideals of greatness degrade and belittle us. Men mostly admire intellectual and social greatness, and these they strive after. It was not such greatness that David gloried in; it was moral greatness—greatness in love, in self-sacrifice, in purity of heart, in humility, in patience, in joy. These are the qualities of God Himself, and to possess them is to be truly great.

All who are anxious to be morally and spiritually great, and who endeavour to become so, may always count upon Divine help. God's activity is directed to the one end of making man great. This is an object which He deems worthy even of His thought, anxiety, and effort. It was to effect this great purpose that He sent His Son; that He has given to us His Word and His Spirit; that He is perpetually bestowing Himself. This is the miracle of condescension. The Divine stoops to the human that the human may be exalted to the Divine. Man may hope to achieve spiritual greatness on the ground of what God has done for him, and is now willing to do in him. David knew all this experimentally. Millions to-day know it in the same way. But we know little now as compared with what we shall know hereafter. When we stand in the presence of the Almighty and All-Gentle, when we enter into the perfect purity and bliss of the redeemed, when we fully understand the grandeur of the new creation wrought within us, and of the glory of God's workmanship in Christ Jesus, we shall say, looking up into the face of Him who hath "wrought us for the selfsame thing," "Thy gentleness hath made me great."

CHAPTER VII.

"Enjoy the spring of love and youth;
To some good angel leave the rest;
For time will teach thee soon the truth,
There are no birds in last year's nest."

LONGFELLOW.

O September and October pass away, and November, with its rain and fog and general badness of weather, comes on.

"Let it come," says Mr. Bloomfield. "It won't make us miserable." And truly it does not. One morning, after we have had a whole week of rain, I get up and discover that it is delightfully fine—clear, bright, and mild—almost a summer morning, in fact: a day, every moment of which must be made the most of and enjoyed to the full.

I stop a minute on my way downstairs, and look into the garden from the staircase window. The garden at Alma House is a pleasant place on a bright morning; a sort of oasis in the desert of bricks and mortar.

Mr. Bloomfield is walking leisurely up the path with his hands in his pockets; and when he reaches the end and turns to walk back again, he catches sight of me, and begins to make signs, pointing first at me and then at the end of the house where the breakfast-room is situated.

I suppose I am very dull not to understand what he means; but I certainly do not, unless it is that I am to make haste down to breakfast. So when he comes within hearing distance, I call out, "I am now going in to breakfast."

"No, don't," he calls back. "I want to speak to you a minute. Come straight out here."

So I go out into the garden, and we walk up the path together.

"There's no hurry about breakfast," he says. "I did not want you to go in there, for fear you should spoil sport."

"Spoil sport?" I repeat interrogatively.

"Yes," he says (and his eyes twinkle knowingly). "I think I detected a little bit of love-making going on in there; and it would have been a pity to spoil it, wouldn't it? We were young ourselves once, weren't we?"

I don't want to deceive anyone about my age. I am not ashamed of my age. Yet why do I always feel so horribly uncomfortable when anyone reminds me of it? Not that thirty-six is so very old, after all!

"I suppose you mean between Mr. Hilton and Maggie?" I remark, after a pause.

"Of course!"

"I am very glad to know that you don't disapprove of it," I continue. "I have noticed it for some little time, and meant to ask whether you wished me to discourage it or no."

By-the-by, I never thought of such a thing till this minute, but it has just occurred to me that I ought to have thought of it. It's all the same.

"Discourage it! certainly not!" he exclaims, in a tone of surprise. "I always like to let those matters take their own course. Besides, in this case, I quite approve of it. Hilton is nearly twenty-eight; it's high time he married and settled down; and I'm sure he couldn't possibly choose a better little wife. I like young people to marry while they are young people. What is the use of their waiting till they get old, and get all sorts of fiddle-faddling, old-maidish ways." (That unfortunate word old maid! Why, why is it such a term of reproach?) "Besides," he continues, "if a man is not married when he gets over thirty, he fancies every woman he meets is in love with him. I don't know whether the ladies are the same, but I suppose they are."

"Indeed they are not!" I reply indignantly.

"Well, perhaps not," he says. "I don't know, I'm sure."

"I am not referring to Mr. Hilton," I say; "but, as a rule, you surely don't approve of early marriages?"

I am thinking of my brother Jack, who married very young, and whose life has been one long struggle ever since.

"I surely do," he says emphatically. "I believe there is nothing more calculated to steady a young fellow, and make a man of him, than to know that he has others to consider besides himself. Of course there are rackets ones who are pretty sure to go to the bad whether they are married or not, and if they are married it's a sad look-out for their wives and families; but all men are not rackets, thank Providence!"

"But," I object, "there are very few young men—belonging to the middle classes, I mean—who can afford to keep a wife."

"Afford be bothered!" he says contemptuously.

"If a woman has any sense at all, she'll make a pound go as far as a man would two. Why can't young folks be content to begin life in a small way, and not be afraid of getting laughed at? Why, I was married, Miss Scott, before I was three-and-twenty; and I remember the first time we invited a few friends to see us, after we were married, there were not enough chairs to go round, and we had to make up with packing-cases. My wife covered them over with a spare table-cloth, and they made a capital seat. Bless ye, we were not a bit ashamed of those old packing-cases! We gave our friends the best we had, and a hearty welcome, and if they liked to laugh, why, so they might! I can assure you I should never have been in the position I am in now if it had not been for my wife. She worked in my business like a slave; she was at it early and late, and never gave herself a minute's rest except on Sundays. She planned everything, looked after everything, and kept us all up to the mark." ["Ah, if Jack's wife were like that!" I think ruefully.] "I don't know where I should have been if it hadn't been for my wife. And then, the worst of it was, as soon as we got the fore horse by the head, so that we could afford to rest on our oars a little, and take things easily, why, she died, poor dear! It seemed very hard lines, after she had worked so," he says mournfully. And we walk back to the house in silence.

I had often wondered how a man of his careless, generous temperament could have succeeded so well in business. Now the mystery is solved. It was his wife who laid the foundations of his fortune.

Well, after all, I am not convinced about the expediency of early marriages. They may do very well in some cases, but I do hope that neither Alec nor Charlie will be foolish enough to marry for some years to come.

CHAPTER VIII.

"Kind, like a man, was he; like a man, too, would have his way."

TENNYSON.

WE are going to give a party. I say we advisedly, because I have as much to do with it as anybody.

Indeed, it is mainly from the fact of my being here to manage it that it is going to be a large party. Hitherto they have given no large parties, as Julia was considered too young to take the responsibility of them.

No expense is to be spared, and everything is to be of the best quality and in the best taste.

The preliminaries having been decided on, the next proceeding is to send out the invitations. And here a great difficulty presents itself, namely, the difficulty of getting their first- and third-class friends to mix sociably with each other.

"We had better not ask Mrs. Simpkin and her daughters," says Hilton; "I'm sure the Highams would not like to meet them."

"Nonsense!" cries Mr. Bloomfield; "why aren't they as good as those stuck-up Highams?"

"They may be as good," returns Hilton charitably, "but it is in a different way, you see. Oil is oil, and water is water, and the fact of their both being liquids doesn't make it any easier to mix them."

"I don't see why they should be left out in the cold," remarks Mr. Bloomfield.

"And the Tompsons—too, I really don't think we need invite them," continues Hilton reflectively.

"Look here, Hilton," says his father, with most unusual firmness, "they are old friends of mine, and I don't wish to have them slighted!"

"My dear pater!" returns Hilton, in a conciliatory tone, "there is not the least necessity to slight them! We can't be expected to invite all our friends at once. Why not give a second party and ask them

"We were young ourselves once, weren't we?"—p. 195.

by themselves? I am sure they would enjoy it more, and it seems a pity to spoil everyone's pleasure for the sake of one or two."

"No, no, that won't do!" exclaims Mr. Bloomfield; "I don't believe in having week-day friends and Sunday friends!"

"My dear pater!"

"If your fine friends are afraid of meeting the Simpkins and the Tompsons, let them keep away!" continues Mr. Bloomfield contemptuously. "I suppose they haven't got so much respectability to spare that they can afford to waste any of it! Their gentility isn't set in fast colours, I suppose! It would rub off if they came against the Simpkins and the Tompsons, perhaps!"

"My dear sir!" interrupts Hilton, "I should be sorry to interfere with any of your plans. I simply proposed one which I thought would be better for all. I know how extremely uncomfortable it is when people won't speak to each other."

"Look here, Hilton," says his father mildly but firmly, "I don't often make a point of having my own way, but you must let me have my own way about this. I hate pride, and it shall never be said that I turned my back on an old friend because he was common!"

So Hilton gives way with a good grace, and invitations are sent out in all directions.

At last the eventful day arrives; and at an early hour I begin to make preparations. Mr. Bloomfield wanted to have everything sent from a pastry-cook's, but as Hilton preferred the home manufacture, I have had plenty to do in making tarts, jellies, etc.; and this morning I feel rather doubtful about the quality of some game pies. When there are more important things in the way, it is easy to recognise the insignificance of such trifling domestic matters; but when there is nothing else to take up one's attention, the failure or success of a game pie becomes an affair of considerable importance. Sometimes when I come home after hearing an eloquent sermon, I feel that religion is the only thing worth living for, and all merely mundane affairs shrink into the most paltry insignificance. If the sermon has been very impressive, that state of feeling lasts for two or three days, until perhaps I get a letter from Jack, with an account of all his monetary difficulties, and the struggle he has to make both ends meet; and then, for a time, I feel that money-making and getting on in the world is the real business of life. That feeling is in its turn dislodged by a troubled expression in Maggie's eyes, and a suspicion that she is unhappy about Hilton; and love becomes the engrossing subject. But, just now, the only thing of any consequence is the success of this party, and especially of the game pies.

Hilton goes out to lunch, but he assures his father that he will be home in good time to see that everything is right. The men finish the marquise which is to form the supper-room; and the upholsterer's men come and lay down a flowered carpet, and bring in two long tables. We all work as hard as we can: there are so many things to be done. And as the afternoon wears away and Hilton does not make his appearance, I conclude that all the responsibility rests on my shoulders, and feel proportionately anxious. Mr. Bloomfield, of course, is quite useless. He simply walks about, laughing and joking with everybody, and getting in everybody's way. He has no fears about the success of anything.

By six o'clock I begin to feel happy myself. Everything is so nicely arranged. The dining-room has been prepared for the young people, and the breakfast-room for their elders. The drawing-room is in its usual perfect order—the white hangings were taken down when the cold weather set in, and crimson ones put up in their place; so that it looks now like a winter paradise instead of a summer one. The study, with a few alterations, has been converted into a pretty little coffee-room; and I have looked over the supper-table, and cannot see a single thing that anyone could find fault with. Hilton cannot fail to be pleased with it all. I feel very warm and tired, but, fortunately, there is time to rest before the guests begin to arrive.

I am just going up-stairs for that purpose when Hilton comes in, looking delightfully cool and unconcerned; so, as in duty bound, I go down again and walk through the different rooms with him.

"Yes, it will do very well," he says, after looking critically round the drawing-room. "There are not half enough flowers about!—not half enough flowers!

But I ordered some as I came along: they will be here directly. Yes, there is nothing else wanted here. Let us look at the dining-room."

We go into the dining-room; and he sits down at the piano and plays a few brilliant snatches of lively music; and Maggie happening to come in, the two young people try over one or two duets together. This satisfactorily finished, Hilton pronounces "the arrangement of the room satisfactory, and the piano in tune. Now for the marquee!" To the marquee I lead the way triumphantly. The supper is my chef-d'œuvre.

"How annoying!" he exclaims, pausing at the entrance. "I particularly told that man to send a plain carpet! What could he have been thinking about? He must have been bereft of his senses to bring such a thing as that!"

"What a pity!" I say sympathetically; "I was afraid you wouldn't like it. It is so unlike your taste; but the man told me he was sure you had ordered it. Don't you like those epergnes?" (He is removing the centre one from the table.)

"I am very sorry!" he says, "but I really must have that carpet changed."

"Oh, Mr. Hilton!" I exclaim, in consternation. But Hilton is quite unmoved by the spectacle of my distress. He cannot endure the sight of any display of bad taste, and is not in the habit of considering any trouble too great that will remove it.

So, after a great deal of scramble and worry, the new carpet is actually down, and we have begun to lay the supper-table again.

"There, is not that better?" he asks, contemplating it with a smile of satisfaction; and I am forced to confess that it is, and that it is worth the trouble it cost. But why did he not see after it before? He forgets that I shall be tired out before the evening begins; that I shall not have time to dress comfortably; that Maggie has not yet begun to dress; and that the servants have been hurried and frightened out of what few wits they possessed. I am determined that Maggie shall be ready in time; so, although she wants to stop and help us, I am peremptory and insist upon her going.

"There should be a crimson curtain draped over that entrance," says Hilton; but I pretend not to hear him, and busy myself at the other end of the table. There are some crimson curtains in a chest up-stairs, but I don't feel inclined to go and get them, especially as he would be very likely to throw them on one side when they were brought.

The tables are nearly finished when a cart stops at the door, and two men begin to unload what seems to be an endless number of plants. There are huge tropical plants with palm-like leaves, hanging baskets of drooping plants, plants of all kinds, in fact, from the most expensive ferns to the commonest geraniums. For Hilton is neither a botanist nor a gardener, and it is nothing to him whether a plant is rare or common, so that its form and colour suit him.

These he assists the men to place about the rooms and staircase, and I follow, superintending Jane and Mary in removing the traces of their footsteps.

At last it is all finished, and it looks so well that I almost forgive Hilton; although I cannot forget that he might just as well have come home in time to spare all this worry.

On reaching my own room I find Maggie there, dressed, and looking very pretty. I know she wants me to say how I like her gown, but I feel far too ill-tempered to pay compliments.

"I thought perhaps I could help you," she says timidly. "You must be dreadfully tired."

"I am!" I reply, with more decision than politeness. "But I don't think you could help me, thank you. You would only tumble your own gown, and that would be a pity!"

"Do you like it?" she asks hesitatingly.

"I suppose you mean, will he like it?" I answer.

A crimson blush spreads over the child's face, and she says, turning from me half-petulantly, "No, I don't!"

I believe it is the first lie she has ever told, but I am quite certain that, if she goes on much longer in the school of love, it will not be the last.

"Let me look at you, Maggie," I say, turning her towards the light, and regarding the shamed young face with admiring eyes. I love the child, and I love her beauty! Hilton will be hard to please indeed if he be not satisfied with her to-night! A fair pretty girl of eighteen always looks well in evening dress, and Maggie is more than pretty—she is lovely! And to us—knowing her as we do—all her innocence and all her goodness seem to shine through and add to her loveliness, till I at least could never tire of looking at her.

"Your gown does very well," I say at last. "Go down and see how he likes it."

"Don't, please," she says entreatingly, and the blush deepens. And then, obeying a sudden impulse, she nestles her head on my shoulder for an instant, and I kiss her, as her mother might have done, and we understand each other.

CHAPTER IX.

"O bubble world,
Whose colours in a moment break and fly."

TENNYSON.

WELL, the party has been a decided success! I come to that conclusion as I think it over while brushing out my hair for the night.

The game pies were excellent. Hilton told me so himself; and he did not find fault with a single thing. I believe the guests nearly all enjoyed themselves. Mr. Bloomfield makes a capital host, though he hasn't the least idea of etiquette, and is only guided by the simple rule of making everybody as happy as he can. He is never better pleased than when he is entertaining his friends; and to have got five or six rooms full at once was a treat indeed.

All the arrangements were thoroughly good; and the amusements were so numerous that the people forgot to think about themselves, so the dignified ones were less dignified, and the vulgar less vulgar, and everyone was inclined to be sociable. Whether the evening's amusements will bear the morning's reflections is another thing.

What will Mrs. Grayham, the solicitor's wife, say when she hears that her "dear girls" have been singing glees with Tom and Harry Smith, the sons of "that horrid Mr. Smith, the draper!" The "dear girls" are neither very young nor particularly attractive; and they are so used to being stranded that to-night they were delighted to take parts with Tom and Harry Smith, especially as they are handsome, agreeable young fellows, and exceptionally good musicians.

What will be the feelings of Mrs. Staunton, the

After all, there was a crimson velvet curtain artistically draped over the entrance to the marquise. Where it came from, and who fixed it, I can't imagine; but I might have known that, if Hilton wanted one, he would get it.

As I lay down my brush, I become aware of a sound of suppressed sobbing in the next room; and slipping quietly in, I find Maggie half-undressed upon the bed, crying bitterly.

"My darling! what is the matter?" I ask, putting

"My darling! what is the matter?"

wife of Dr. Staunton, who drives an elegant carriage, and lives in an aristocratic neighbourhood, when she remembers how familiarly she talked to stout, good-natured Mrs. Simpkin, who lives in quite a small house, and goes about in cabs and omnibuses? But she has seldom found anyone who could sympathise more readily with her about her headache and neuralgia. She is always afraid to talk much before her husband, who is a morose man, but to-night Mr. Bloomfield had induced him to join a party of old and congenial friends in the breakfast-room.

I should not wonder if the Misses Grayham, Mrs. Staunton, and others of their kind, look back upon the party with horror before a week is past, but to-night they certainly enjoyed it.

Julia was a complete failure; she looked at least seven years older than she is, and dreadfully haggard in spite of the rouge. I believe she thought her dress would be remarkably handsome. It must have cost four times as much as Maggie's. But what amount of costliness in dress can give the same charm as early youth and freshness? What amount of study can supply that grace which comes so naturally to a girl with a good figure and a light heart?

my arm tenderly round her, and smoothing the hair from her face.

I am not much given to the use of endearing terms, as I have an affection for them, and don't like them to lose their significance by being used on any but the rarest occasions. So that when I put my arm round her, and say, "My darling," it means a great deal—more, perhaps, than she will ever guess!

She must be in a dreadfully nervous state, for she starts violently, and a shudder runs through her whole frame.

"What is it?" I ask again. But instead of answering, she draws herself away from me, and seems to be making a great effort to control her feelings.

"Has anything happened, Maggie?" I repeat.

"Yes, something has happened to me!" she cries passionately. "I have been brought into contact, for the first time in my life, with—" but the sentence ends in a half-smothered sob. "I daresay I shall get over it," she continues, looking restlessly round the room as if it were a cage. "But I can never feel the same again—never!"

"Is it so very dreadful, dear?" I inquire.

"I don't know," she replies. "You might not think it dreadful. I don't know what others would think it. I only know that I——" and she buries her face in the pillow.

"Mustn't I know what it is, Maggie?"

"No, I would rather not tell you, please. It is nothing that you could help me in, and I don't want anyone to know. Will you promise me," she entreats earnestly, "not to speak of it to anyone?"

"Certainly, if you wish it!"

"And you will not take any notice of me if I seem—well, rather quieter than usual?"

"My dear, you know that I would not willingly do anything to annoy you."

"Thank you," she says, and seems to expect me to go.

It is hard for me to leave her in such trouble; but as I don't know what has caused it, that is the only thing I can do. So, after a minute's hesitation, I bid her "Good-night," and go back to my own room.

I wish I knew what it is all about. Something connected with Hilton, I'm sure! But I can hardly believe that he has done anything very dreadful; for, though he is not the exalted hero she has imagined, I am sure he is a kind-hearted, honest young fellow. Very likely it is some trifle light as air—something that no one but a romantic girl would give a second thought to!

I have passed through the sentimental stage of existence myself. I have been first warmed, and finally scorched and burnt in its fiery furnace, and I have come out of it, and stand in the cool shade, watching its effect upon others. I have had my fond hopes and bright delusions, my sleepless nights and restless days, my moments of rapture and my hours of agony. Therefore I can sympathise, in a certain calm, dispassionate way, with those who are passing through the same ordeal. I know that it is all a vain delusion; but I also know that to them it is intensely real.

I go to bed feeling quite miserable, like a ridiculous old booby as I am; and lie awake half the night, from an idiotic fancy that by so doing I am somehow preventing her from feeling so lonely as she otherwise would—a folly of which I sincerely repent on waking up with a bad headache the next morning.

It is a genuine November morning, with the air so full of fog that I can scarcely see across the street. And everybody, with the exception of Mr. Bloomfield, looks in keeping with the weather. I can see the state of Julia's mind at the first glance, from the hideous colour and pattern of her morning dress. I am sure she keeps it on purpose to wear when she is in a bad temper; and, I believe, when it gets worn up, she will go out one morning in a towering passion and buy one still uglier (if that be possible). She seems to take a grim pleasure, at such times, in making herself look as unprepossessing as possible.

Maggie makes an effort to appear the same as usual; but her face bears evident traces of the night's suffering, and her eyes are so swollen that she keeps them persistently fixed on the table, in spite of Hilton's efforts to make her look at him.

Hilton is irritable. And as for me, I could quarrel with anybody—with the two lovers in particular. Why don't they make up their quarrel, if they have had one? It is so irritating to hear them asking each other to pass the salt or the sugar, and making constrained remarks about the weather. I wonder Mr. Bloomfield does not see that there is something wrong; Julia does, and her spirits rise directly.

When breakfast is over she begins a lively conversation with her uncle about yesterday's proceedings. Maggie sits down by the window with a book; and Hilton stands at the other window, playing with the tassel of the blind and making angry dabs at imaginary flies, without the faintest idea of what he is doing.

If Julia would only go out of the room I could soon call Mr. Bloomfield away; and then Hilton would have an opportunity of making that much-needed explanation. Of course she does not go, however; and of course Hilton does go, and announces, moreover, that he will not be home to lunch. And I am left to see that weary little face all day, and to know that I have no power to brighten it.

ONE silver streak among the glossy hair,
One line of light along the eastern sky,
Where Night still hangs her purple panoply,
And stars still shine, though with a feebler glare,
As though just fanned by breath of morning air,
Which whispers that the Dawn is drawing nigh,
And that ere long the Sun will mount on high,

And with his radiance their pale lustre scare.
Those silver hairs! we laughed at them erewhile;
Life still seemed young, and white hairs out of place;
But now we greet them with a graver smile,
As 'mid the glossy brown they grow apace,
And, like yon spreading line of silver light,
Foreshow the Eternal Dawn which knows no night,

"IN PERILS OFT."

BY THE REV. PROFESSOR W. G. BLAIKIE, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E., ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER I.—ADONIRAM JUDSON.

On an October morning in the early part of the present century, a New England youth, a minister's son, some twenty years of age, presented himself before the authorities of Andover Theological Seminary, Massachusetts, and asked to be allowed to attend the classes as an amateur student. He was not a believer in Christianity; he saw no need for a supernatural religion; the foundations of Deism were quite sufficient; if a man only led a good life, why should he fear? Was not a fair life led by himself a more reasonable ground for expecting God's blessing than the best of lives led by another? Nevertheless, he was not at his ease; he had not got down for his foundation to solid rock; and in making his application at Andover, his desire was to get a quiet opportunity of reviewing the whole subject, and of examining leisurely and deliberately all that might be said in favour of Christianity as a supernatural revelation of the will of God.

The result of this examination was very memorable. He not only became convinced of the Divine origin of Christianity, but he accepted Christ personally as his own. Without the excitement of a revival, without the fright of a severe illness or the depression of a sad bereavement, without any striking dream or striking dealing of any kind, his whole soul was turned from his former ways, and he dedicated himself without reserve to the service of God. And as he considered the field of foreign missions to be the sphere where God had most need of him, he determined to be a missionary to the heathen. The American Foreign Mission Board, which had just been formed, favoured his offer, and in 1810, Adoniram Judson was virtually invested with the office of missionary, though his destination could not be fixed at the time.

It was thought desirable that in the first instance he should make a voyage to England, confer with the directors of the London Missionary Society, and bring back such information to the newly constituted Board in the States as would enable it to settle the destination not only of himself, but of some other students who had offered their services in the same cause.

From New York to England was not quite so simple a voyage then as in these days of monster steamships and four hundred miles a day. And storms and sea-sickness were not the only foes. Setting sail from New York on New Year's Day, 1811, the ship was speedily captured by a French privateer, L'Invincible Napoléon. Poor Judson was at once consigned to the hold of the new ship among the French sailors.

What with sea-sickness, inability to speak to anyone, the sense of captivity, and the wretchedness of his quarters, he was like to lose heart altogether. But the thought came to him that all this might be intended as a trial of his faith and constancy, and he determined in God's strength to bear it. Fumbling in the dusky chamber for his Hebrew Bible, he occupied himself mentally in turning the Hebrew into Latin. One day the ship's doctor observing the Hebrew Bible lying open, addressed Judson in Latin, and through that language he was able to explain his position. This brought him a berth in the upper cabin, and a seat at the captain's table. But when at length landed at Bayonne, in France, he found himself marched through the streets with the crew of the packet, and lodged in a dark, dismal underground prison. It was a striking though comparatively slight foreshadowing of what he had afterwards to endure in far-off Burmah. On the damp floor was strewn a quantity of straw, loathsome and repulsive. Judson could only pace up and down, hour after hour, till at last an American gentleman who had seen him, entered the prison. By a good-natured stratagem he got Judson, who was a little man, under his cloak, brought him unobserved outside, and when fairly beyond the precincts of the prison, bade him—Run! At last he got to our shores. In England, his small, delicate figure, round, rosy cheeks, chestnut eyes and hair, made him look very youthful, but created an impression in his favour. He was possessed of a voice, however, strong and loud out of all proportion to the rest of him, which gave occasion to the remark of an eccentric minister who had asked him to take some part in a public service; introducing him to the congregation as one whose purpose it was to devote himself to the conversion of the heathen, he added, "And if his faith is proportioned to his voice he will drive the devil from all India."

Returning to America, he married Anne Hasseltine, a woman who afterwards, in the most awful circumstances of trial and calamity, manifested such a spirit of heroism, energy, and courage as has placed her name in the very first rank of noble women. Their destiny was India. Arrived at Calcutta, with other missionaries, they were peremptorily ordered by the East India Company authorities to leave the country and return to America. They begged to be allowed to go to the Isle of France; at first the request was granted, and some of them sailed in a little vessel too small to carry them all. After two months' further waiting, the Judsons were again ordered to England. But finding a vessel bound for the Isle of France, they went on board at their own risk; but had only gone two days down the river when they were ordered back. Somehow they contrived after all to get their passage. Tossed thus from place to place, they at last found themselves at Rangoon. A miserable voyage had brought

Mrs. Judson to the gates of death. Rangoon looked so wretched that both of them almost wished they might die. Their faith rallied, however, and henceforth the name of Judson was inseparably linked with the Empire of Burmah—the Apostle of which he may be said to have been. Mrs. Judson's health was long very delicate. Her first babe had been buried in the waters of the Indian Ocean, after the Anglo-Indian persecution; her second had his bed in the jungle graveyard at Rangoon. Her friend and companion, Mrs. Newell, had died after being driven from India; and at Rangoon they heard of the terrible affliction that befell Dr. Carey, when, by the upsetting of a most appalling consequences at the hands of the king. On the 8th of June, 1824, just as he and his wife were preparing for dinner, in rushed an officer, holding a black book, with a dozen Burmans, accompanied by one whom, from his spotted face, they knew to be an executioner. This fellow seized Mr. Judson, threw him on the floor, and producing a small cord, a well-known instrument of torture, fastened it round his arms. Poor Mrs. Judson tried by offering money to get him to slacken the cord; but the wretch, with a kind of hellish glee, only tightened it, and when he had dragged him a little way from the house, threw him again to the ground, vessel, his wife, children, and servants were all drowned, and he only escaped by the skin of his teeth.

But their experience was not all trials. Goodness and mercy did often follow them, and they got on with their work. Language mastered, the New Testament translated, inquirers attracted, and converts gained, testified that the great Master was still with his servants. A bright morning had arisen on the mission.

But again the horizon darkened. And it darkened fearfully. They had left Rangoon and settled in Ava, the capital of Burmah. War broke out between Burmah and Britain. A British army, under Sir Archibald Campbell, invaded the Burmese territory. The king and his advisers were excited to the utmost extremity of rage; and their fury fell on any foreign residents who might be supposed to have any connection with the British. Mr. Judson was an American, but he spoke English, and was thus identified with Great Britain, and doomed to suffer the and drew the cord still tighter, so as almost to prevent respiration. By order of the king he was committed to the death prison, which meant that he was condemned to die unless his most gracious majesty should be pleased to spare him.

And what a hell that prison was! Each prisoner was confined by three pairs of iron fetters, and all were fastened to a long pole to prevent their moving. The bare, hard, damp floor was all their bed, and as they lay, without even a log for a pillow, the misery of the situation, the pain of the heavy fetters eating into their flesh and crushing the foot nearest the ground, the twisting and turning of the poor wretches seeking a relief that could in no way be found, formed a picture of wretchedness that even imagination could hardly surpass.

And poor Mrs. Judson, alone, in feeble health, looking for the birth of a babe that would replace those that had succumbed to previous hardships, and brutally threatened with the same fate as her husband's, had to bear the thought and sight of all this, without the power to help it! But whatever she could do, she did right nobly. Day by day, in spite of heat and fatigue, she trudged in her feebleness the two weary miles between her house and the prison, got leave to go to the door, where her husband would crawl to meet her, brought food to him and the other missionaries, and strove in every way to make their situation endurable. By great exertion, and a copious use of hardly ever recalled any previous occurrence of her life, or remembered that she had a friend in existence out of Ava. Her greatest distress was not so much concern for the present as anxiety for the fate awaiting the prisoners. In the midst of these tortures, six months after the beginning of the captivity, her little daughter was born—a pale, puny thing, that seemed to be always wailing. Her visits

"The prisoners had been carried off, no one knew whither."

what money she had, she got them removed from the inner prison to an open shed in the enclosure. The hours not spent in the prison were employed by her in going hither and thither, and using her utmost influence with anyone whom she knew connected with the Court to obtain her husband's release. It was all in vain. For eighteen months the weary captivity dragged its slow length along. Barbarians are always suspicious, and the plea on which the missionaries were confined was, that they were spies in the employment of the English Government, and were giving information to the enemy. When she would return to her home utterly exhausted, after a day of fruitless intercession, Mrs. Judson could but throw herself on her rocking-chair and wonder in what new direction she might put forth her energies. So utterly absorbed was she with the one subject of thought, that she along with the infant touched the father's heart to the quick, and he mentally composed some verses addressed to his child, which were afterwards written down; as if the child should wonder why her first sight of her father should be in a prison, wearing the fetters of a felon, as if he had been a thief or a murderer.

Meanwhile the English army was advancing through the country, repelling the troops of the King of Burmah, and moving nearer and nearer to the capital. General after general was defeated, and the case became grave indeed. Defeat had no good effect on the royal temper, and the royal temper had no good effect on the condition of the prisoners. One day, when Mrs. Judson came as usual with her husband's breakfast, she found to her dismay that the prisoners had been carried off, no one knew whither,

After great distress and much searching, she at last discovered that they had been taken to Oung-pen-la. Their journey thither was terrible. Mr. Judson, who had recently been ill of fever, had been dragged from his bed, stripped of nearly all his clothes, tied by a rope to another prisoner, and driven to Oung-pen-la, on one of the hottest days of the year, a distance of eight miles. His feet were blistered at the very beginning; at the end they were raw flesh, and he was in high fever. One of the prisoners died on the way. Poor Mrs. Judson now found herself assailed by new terrors. Living in a dirty, wretched shed, a girl who was with her was seized with severe small-pox; then her little daughter took the disease; and, in a mild form, she took it herself. By-and-by she was prostrated by an illness of two months. She was as near despair as a Christian woman could be. But for the consolations of religion and the assurance that all was ordered by infinite love and mercy, her trials could not have been borne. Often, amid her sufferings, she would be exposed to the greedy and worrying demands of the gaolers. The extortions, oppressions, and other provocations of that period were beyond enumeration and description.

And within the prison there was much more to bear than personal pain and privation. Prisoners were often dying of disease, and still more frequently suffering the horrors of starvation. The Ava gaoler had on his breast the brand of "murderer," his nickname was "the Tiger-cat," and he was one of the most hideous and disgusting wretches that ever bore the human form. He had a delight in torturing his prisoners. He would bring down his hammer with a jest when fastening manacles, put his arms round them as if they were his children, in order to give them a pinch, and study torture as the most comical of arts. Once a strange novelty was practised in the art of torture. The king had received from some foreigners the present of a lion, which was at first a great favourite. By-and-by, as the English victories were constantly multiplying, and it was known that they had the figure of a lion on their standards, it began to be believed that they had some demon ally at Court that brought them good luck, and suspicion fell on the lion! The unfortunate beast was removed in his cage to the prison yard. The queen's brother had given directions to starve him. Day by day he writhed in the pangs of hunger, parched with thirst, and bruised and bleeding with his fearful struggles, while his roar seemed to shake the prison to its foundations, and sent a thrill of terror through the hearts of the spectators. The gaoler said it was the British lion ineffectually struggling against the conquering Burmans. But all was in vain; the British army went on conquering and to conquer, and were now threatening that, unless the Burmese submitted, they would lay their capital in ashes.

At length the time of deliverance came. The Government thought that Judson might be of use in treating with the British and procuring for them easier terms. But when he was liberated, an effort was made to detain his wife. By-and-by both were under British protection. Sir Archibald Campbell treated them with the utmost courtesy and kindness, and so did every British officer with whom they came into contact. The era of keen suffering had passed away, though Judson never ceased to bear the marks of his fetters, of which at one time he had borne no fewer than five pairs.

The mission was now transferred to Amherst, in the Tenasserim Provinces, which had been ceded to Britain. At a later period it was transferred to Maulmain. Judson was induced to pay a visit to Ava, at the request of the Commissioner, in the hope of forwarding arrangements there that would have been helpful to the missionary cause. In his absence Mrs. Judson was attacked by a most violent fever, which cut her off on the 24th of October, 1826. The news of this bereavement was almost beyond his power of endurance. Never had husband enjoyed more abundant tokens of the love and devotion of woman. Never had a time of dark and bitter bondage been more brightened by the unwearied and most tender sympathy of a ministering angel. And now when the long storm was over, and the sky was turning bright, and the cheering prospect lay before them of many years of joyful fellowship, of happy co-operation in Christian work, and of mutual enjoyment of their little daughter in her bright, budding childhood, another thunderbolt from the dark cloud shattered all, and left him more desolate and more sad than he had ever been in the darkest days of his prison-torture. And when he returned home, it was to lay the little child by her mother's side.

The effect of all this experience on Dr. Judson was very marked. He felt as if all the ties that bound him to earth were broken. Of his title through his blessed Lord to the eternal inheritance he had never doubted. But he knew that he was far, far from being meet to be a partaker of that inheritance. Henceforward, his great desire was that he might walk more worthy of the vocation wherewith he was called. He desired to suppress every habit, every thought and imagination that might interfere with his complete consecration of himself to the will and work of God. He sought to be a workman that needed not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the Word of Life. How well this earnest purpose was realised his future life abundantly showed. In the success of his mission work in Burmah he had his reward. His life ended in 1850. In declining health he had gone on a voyage. But it was not the angel of health, but the angel of death he met there. His death took place at sea amid great bodily suffering, but his mind was serene and joyful. On the resurrection morning he, like his first-born child, will be among those who come forth when the sea gives up the dead that are therein.

CHRISTMAS EVE IN MONTREAL

BY MRS. CLARK MURRAY.

PSYCHOLOGISTS tell us that as resemblance implies contrast, so contrast implies resemblance, and it is probably upon this law in the human mind that the civilised world has come to base its acceptance of cold, snow, shivering, and loneliness without, as the most successful representatives of warmth, kindness, plenty, and hospitality within. If it be that the colder the scene without, the keener the suggestion of happiness within, then the brightest and merriest Christmas should be in the coldest country, and our cousins in the southern hemisphere must continue to open their hampers from "Home" in a sweltering heat, while their relations in the lands of ice and snow revel in the pleasures of contrast.

In Canada the preference for a settled cold is so decided that it creates a half-inclination to postpone Christmas till the land is well covered with a closely woven blanket of snow. Generally speaking, there is little doubt about it; for long before Santa Claus is ready to leave his northern workshops, the roofs of the houses may be so smothered over that he can with difficulty get down the chimneys. Occasionally, however, the Indians may note the habits of the beaver, and the weather prophet may quote the preparations of the Indians; but Nature is a fickle mistress, and waits neither upon calendar nor probabilities. November frosts make promises only to be broken by December thaws. The winter may be "on," as the Canadian says, and rivers converted into roads by the Feast of St. Andrew; or there may be a "green Yuletide," the snow, even when started on its journey, playing by the way, the flakes chasing each other in the air, pirouetting and coquetting with the earth—half-minded to return to their home in the sky.

On a still night and cold the St. Lawrence "takes:" that is, it freezes over. Some snow already fallen is "lying;" that is, it has not melted, and a fresh fall is the only thing necessary to brighten up the streets and make the sleighing perfect. On the night before Christmas Eve we consult "Old Prob," and find that there is to be a "rapidly falling temperature, with more snow on the Upper St. Lawrence region." Before retiring to rest a peep outside assures us that the meteorological forecast is correct. The first flakes are quietly and gently falling.

The bells break in upon our early morning dreams. No rumbling of vehicles, no clatter of wheels on the causeway! The very stillness rouses us from slumber. We dress without a shiver—for the house has been kept comfortably warm through the night —and go to the window to look out; but a deep crusting of ice on the glass of the outer window—not of a delicate lace texture, but of a thick velvety material—hides everything from our view. We descend to breakfast without running the gauntlet of a foggy staircase and draughts of damp air from open windows. The feeling is of June rather than of December. Breakfast over, we prepare to go to market, a duty which the Canadian housekeeper performs in person, and not by deputy. A thermometer outside the window tells us the temperature is 15° below zero, and a glance at a neighbouring chimney-pot reveals the comforting fact that there is no wind; for a day below zero without wind is more to be desired than one above it with even a moderate air stirring. We fortify our feet carefully against the frost, wrap ourselves in coat, hat, and mits of fur, fashioned not only comfortably but elegantly, and drawing a "cloud" over the ears and partly over the face, we step into the waiting sleigh. The horses are impatiently pawing the fresh snow, and throwing it about like dust. The driver resembles a mummy in fur, his eyes only alive. A skin or robe of fur is under our feet, another is gathered closely over our knees and fastened cosily to the sleigh, and we are off.

It is still snowing heavily. But to the Canadian the snow is a friend, and not an enemy. Without it the country is bleak and bare, and the people look cold and miserable. With it the roads are good, the streets are gay, business is brisk, and contentment is general. Every house has its shoveller at work, and a path is quickly made, the spare snow being piled up between the pavement and the street. Hundreds of children are out with tiny brooms and shovels building Lilliputian houses and forts, or gliding on their sleds hither and thither like water-spiders. The streets are alive with people more artistically besnowed than Santa Claus himself. The air is gay with bells. There are milk-sleighs, muffin-sleighs, bakers', grocers', and butchers' sleighs dashing round the corners to the terror of old ladies. Rich merchants, in costly bearskins, with prancing horses in silver-mounted harness, nod to their less assuming friends in the crowded street-sleighs. Here an organ-grinder stands in the cold by his hand-sleigh load of reeds, and there, on the sunny side of the thoroughfare, is a regiment of nursery sleighs, with round balls of soft and warm babyhood smothered in furs. Here a sad procession winds its way to the acre of God; and there a tandem club, with sparkling bells, drives through the fashionable promenades and away across the river. We follow in its track through the public squares to the quaint old Church of Notre Dame de Bonsecours. Close by is the Bonsecours market, the oldest and largest public market in Montreal.

SANTA CLAUS IN CANADA.

Representatives of the capital and of the labour of the country elbow each other in the motley crowd, testing the qualities and comparing the prices of eggs and poultry, butter and fish, fruits and vegetables. In the centre is a large stone building, around which booths and sleighs are closely packed, the horses of the latter being stabled for convenience and safety. On the ground floor are the fish and pork stalls, the oyster and pastry vendors, sweets and toys, baskets and crockery, home-grown nuts and apples. Had we come in July or August we should have seen unlimited quantities of strawberries, cherries, raspberries, blueberries and grapes, grown at the liberty of their own sweet will in the woods and meadows, picked by the French peasantry, and sent here for sale. The first floor is occupied from end to end by butchers, fifty or a hundred of them, all French, "fat, sleek-headed men, and such as sleep o' nights," with aprons partly converted into money-bags, and the requisites at hand for amusement when the bustle is over. Prize mutton and Christmas beef are piled high and low around the stalls. The men with their assistants are cutting and chopping to suit the varied tastes of their customers, and rows of flat, uncovered baskets are filled awaiting despatch by sleighs outside. No small matter this despatch must be, for the butcher delivers not only his beef and mutton, but everything else the housekeeper has purchased in the market. Curiosity leads us to examine more closely a purchase which is about to be sent home. It consists of four baskets and five packages. In the first basket we find a roast of beef, two tongues, a couple of kidneys, some slices of beef-steak, and a piece of salted beef. The second displays half a sheep cut into roasts and chops, bacon, ham, and some pork sausages. Another has a haddock, a cod, three turkeys, two pairs of chickens, a fat goose, with partridge, pigeon, and duck. The fourth contains three flower-pots, some tin culinary utensils, and sundry packages, probably made up of pears, oranges, lemons, and bananas. In addition to these there are a basket of carrots, a basket of eggs, a bag of potatoes, a bunch of dried herbs, and a box of honey, all of which the butcher's boy must deliver at one address by the simple and sole aid of a small white label stuck on the roast of beef.

The air here is damp and miserably cold. The men stamp their feet and slap their hands, although the latter are protected by thick woollen mits. We hasten to reach the outside. The snow has ceased, and the sun shines in a sky of unclouded blue. As far as the eye can see, there is a succession of sleighs of every description, completely surrounding the centre building and filling the adjacent streets, having come from various parts of the Island of Montreal and from the other side of the river. They are attended by hardy French farmers, accompanied by their wives and daughters, who are now throwing back their head-wraps and shaking the dry, crisp snow from their shoulders. All are engaged in making the best possible bargains for their butter and cheese, eggs and poultry, grain and vegetables, cakes of frozen milk and cream, home-spun yarns, home-knitted mittens and stockings, and home-woven carpets and towellings. They have a passion for bargaining—the chase more than the game—and we never dream of cheating them of their opportunity. A sallow, black-eyed woman asks a dollar and a half for her turkey, and shrugs her shoulders at a dollar and a quarter; but the show of an inclination to split the difference suffuses a radiant satisfaction over her face, and the bargain is concluded with a "C'est bon" at a dollar and forty cents.

Before leaving we take a look at the river, the great St. Lawrence. Two months ago a forest of masts lined its shores, and ships of all nations were beating up against the heavy current. Merchandise from every part of the globe lay in heaps on the wharves, and formed a shelter for European immigrants, who, seated on the small bundles which comprised their household goods, were sadly shaping their future lives out of the scattered fragments of the past. Well for them that they did not heed the benedictions hurled at them by the rough stevedores as they toiled over their cargoes. Now all are gone—the steamship with its screeching, the train with its bells, the light-hearted sailor and the heavy-hearted exile, the honest and the dishonest, the gay and the sad, the arrival and the departure, with their smiles and their tears. The blue laughing water is gone with its sparkle, the pilots and tugs with their puffing and roaring, the very wharves are gone—idle, useless, covered, hidden. Gone the days and nights of summer. The year itself is well-nigh gone, and the winter has come to the water, to trade, to life. All is changed. Roads are mapped out on the frozen river skirted by trees to mark the path, and a railway on the ice has taken the place of the ferries. Brightly coloured cutters and carriages with pleasure-seekers, and heavy loads of wood and hay for market, are crossing in every direction. Here and there an Iroquois Indian is fishing through the ice in his hut, with a rousing fire to warm himself; and far off, near the frozen rapids, gangs of men and horses are cutting the ice into huge blocks and harvesting it for the heat of the coming summer. The Frenchman and his wife are tracing their way with their Christmas dinner home to their expectant children, and away beyond are the mountains and the endless ice and snow.

But it is cold—so cold! Gladly do we return to our sleigh, and wrap ourselves, envelop ourselves, almost disappear in our furs. Scarcely do we pause to glance at the decorations of the busy shops, the hurry of the people as they stamp and brush the snow from their feet, or the bowing and nodding of friends amid the jingling and tinkling bells. The whole air is resounding with goodwill towards men. We cannot linger over the Christmas gathering that awaits us: the cosy hearth, the rosy lights, the happy faces round the children's trees. We turn off the clamouring thoroughfare into the quiet lanes—to the homes, the refuges, the asylums, to cheer and gladden the lonely, the joyless, the neglected; and at eventide when the great cathedral is ringing with song, when Christmas Eve is trembling into Christmas morn, we kneel amid the faithful and breathe one humble harmony into the praise of the herald angels as they sing, "Glory to the new-born King."

MARGARET POLSON MURRAY.

THE HOUSEHOLDER'S PSALM.

AN UNPUBLISHED SERMON BY MATTHEW HENRY.

"O when wilt Thou come unto me?"—PSALM ci. 2.

THESE words may be looked upon as spoken by David, the sweetsinger of Israel, either (first) in his personal capacity, as he was a saint, and then they show what is the great thing that a gracious heart pants and breathes after—namely, the presence of God, which it should seem at this time David wanted, or, at least, wanted the comfort of. Note, God may sometimes, in appearance at least, withdraw Himself from His people, and seem to be at a distance from them. Christ Himself upon the cross experienced this truth when He groaned out His "Lama sabachthani—why hast Thou forsaken Me?" If this be done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?

When God is withdrawn, the child of God thinks the time long till He comes again. David does not at all question God's coming to him. No; faith says, "Though He be gone, He will come again," but only desires that it may be hastened: "When wilt Thou come?" As the saints desire to come to God hereafter, so they desire to have God come to them here. "The Spirit and the bride—the Spirit in the bride saith—Come, come, even so come quickly;" "Make haste, my beloved," is the natural language of grace. And is this the language of our hearts? A wicked man cannot truly desire God to come to him, knowing that if God comes to him He comes in anger, and therefore he wails when he sees Him come. (Rev. i. 7.) But to a child of God nothing more welcome; his heart is ready for Him, the everlasting doors are lifted up for the King of Glory to come in, and glad of such a Guest.

Or in a public capacity as a magistrate; for this Psalm is penned to a royal tune (v. 8). Some think it was penned before his coming to the throne, and then "When wilt Thou come?" is "When wilt Thou make good Thy promise which Thou hast given me of the kingdom?" And truly he had reason to say, "When wilt Thou come to me?" for it was a long time, and a sad time, with David, between his anointing and his possession of the kingdom. Some read it, "I will behave myself wisely until Thou come; I know Thou wilt come; Thou art slow but sure, and I will endeavour to carry myself aright till Thou dost come." And we find that he did so. (1 Sam. xviii. 14.) David behaved himself wisely in all his ways: he did his duty, and left the event to God. Others think he penned it after his coming to the crown, and then he earnestly desires God to come to him, first, to establish his kingdom to him, and to subdue his enemies before him, which he could never have done as he did without the presence of the Lord of Hosts. It was He that went upon the top of the mulberry trees. (2 Sam. v. 24.) Secondly, to assist him in the performance of the duty of his kingdom: "O that Infinite Wisdom would come and help me to behave myself wisely." Observe how abruptly this comes in here, in the midst of his resolutions, like that of Jacob. (Gen. xlix. 18.) In the midst of his speaking his purposes to others he turns to God to speak his requests to Him for aid and assistance, as knowing that without that all his purposes would be to no purpose. Thirdly, to give him the comfort of all his enjoyments; for a kingdom, a world, is nothing, to a gracious soul, without God.

Or in his private capacity as a master of a family, for it follows, "I will walk within my house," God having called him to a house of his own, he humbly desires God to come and dwell with him in it: "Oh, when wilt Thou come unto me?" The presence of God is a very desirable thing in a house or family. I shall show, first, what the presence of God is; secondly, prove it very desirable; thirdly, what we must do that we may have it.

Firstly, what the presence of God is. His common presence, whereby He is everywhere, excludet out of no place, included in no place, and thus is in the most wicked house in the country, and sees and registers, and will one day severely reckon, for all the wickedness that is in families. His special presence, and that is meant here: the presence of His love, grace, and blessing, His covenant presence—such a presence as is promised to be where two or three are gathered together in His name (St. Matt. xviii. 20)—such a presence as was in the house of Obed-edom when the ark was there, such a presence as went down with Jacob into Egypt (Gen. xli. 4), such a presence as was with Joshua in his wars (Jos. i. 9), and with David in his, according to his desire. David behaved himself wisely according to this purpose of his, and the Lord was with him according to this prayer of his.

Secondly, to prove it desirable, we shall consider what kind of presence the presence of God is, and then you shall judge if it be not desirable. Firstly, it is a guiding presence. Where God is He is as a director (Ps. lxxiii. 23); "I am continually with thee." What then? Why (v. 24), "Thou shalt guide me with Thy counsel." We have often need of guidance when we know not what to do, as the phrase is. (2 Chron. xx. 12.) Not what to do in point of duty: what we must do then, God directs by His Word and Spirit, and His deputy, conscience, making the way of duty plain, resolving our doubts, satisfying our scruples, showing us the way, and, which is more, leading us in it; and is not this desirable?

Not what to do in point of event. What we shall do then God directs by His Providence, opening a door where we saw none, extricating us out of difficulties when we knew not how to do it for ourselves. Where God is, He is a pillar of fire and cloud, in every wilderness eyes to the blind. And have not families need of this guidance in family affairs (Job v. 24), and shall not err? Secondly, it is a guarding presence. Where God dwells in the house, He is a wall of fire about the house. It is the Lord that keeps the city. (Ps. cxxvii. 1.) The inhabitants of the house where God dwells abide under the shadow of the Almighty (Ps. xci. 1), and is not that a precious privilege? When God is in the house angels pitch their tents round about (Ps. xxxiv. 7), and these are a better guard than ever a prince or potentate in the world hath. (Ps. cxxi. 4, 5.)

Thirdly, He is a supplying presence. As nothing truly and really evil can lie upon, so nothing truly and really good can be wanting to, that house and family where God is. When the fountain of good comes, the streams come with Him, so that whatever a child of God lacks at any time, he may be assured it is not good for him, and then better to be without it. (Rev. iii. 20.) "And he with me." God is a Guest that brings not only His own entertainment, but entertainment that lets Him in along with him. When God comes to a house-warming—pardon the country expression—He brings a royal present along with Him, like that of Hazeal's to Elisha (2 Kings viii. 9), of every good thing. (Phil. iv. 19; Ps. xliii. 6.)

It is a supporting presence. Whilst we are in this world we have not only our wants, but our burdens, pains, sicknesses, hopes, crosses, disappointments—these are burdens, family burdens, which we are often groaning under. Now, where God is in a family He will either take off these burdens, or, which comes all to one, He will sustain us under them. He will either lighten the load, or strengthen the shoulder. (Deut. xxxiii. 27; Ps. xliii.) David comforts himself with this, when he was in the valley of the shadow of death, in very great trouble—that God was with him as a Shepherd, and there were His rod and staff. Shepherds use a staff to bear up the weary sheep—but God, the great, the good Shepherd, carries His lambs in His arms. (Isa. xl. 11.) Where God is, he will not be wanting of inward spiritual support under outward temporal burden of what kind soever.

His presence makes all sweet; it sweetens all family crosses. These are things which we must count upon and look for here in this world; but the presence of God takes out the sting, the bitterness of every affliction. It is that that puts honey on every rod; it is that that is alone the comfort of every child of God in all conditions. See that promise (Isa. xliii. 2), "When thou passest through the waters." Secondly, it sweetens all family comforts. It is the presence of God that is the sugar of all our enjoyments. What are relations and friends without God?—a spread table, a full cup, a warm house, a soft bed, without God? Mercies are then sweet when we can see them come not from a hand of common Providence, but from a hand of special Love. It is the covenant—or rather God in the covenant—that puts milk into the breasts, wine into the bottles of all creature comforts. All creatures are that to us that God makes them.

His presence makes all successful. When God was with Joseph, though in the narrow sphere of a prison, all that he did was made to prosper. (Gen. xxxix. 23.) The presence of God in a house makes all the affairs to prosper, the corn and cattle to prosper, and all to prosper as far as will be for good. It is promised (Ps. i. 3) as part of the blessing. (Job xxii. 28; Ps. xxxvii. 4, 5; Deut. xxviii. 3.) If Laban's family prospered while Jacob was there, much more will that family prosper where the God of Jacob is. The Psalmist gives us (in Ps. cxliv. 12–14) a picture of outward prosperity, and his heart was beginning to bless the covetous, and to say, Happy is the people that is in such a case; but he soon corrects himself, and says, Happy is the people whose God is the Lord, for they have all this either in kind or kindness.

And now tell me if the presence of God be not very desirable in a house. Let me direct you what to do, that you may have this presence of God in your houses. I hope you are convinced that it is desirable, and are truly willing to do anything that you may have it. Then, first—if you would have God come to you, you must invite Him to come. Send a special messenger to the Throne of Grace, humbly to desire the Divine presence. Breathe out those words of David, "O when wilt Thou come unto me?" God will not come uninvited. You will scarce come to a friend's house that does not desire your company. In the Gospel we find Christ once at a wedding, but then He was called. (St. John ii. 2.) If the Divine presence be not worth the asking, it is not worth the having, and then it is worth nothing.

Make an errand, then, to God to entreat Him that He would be pleased to come under your roof. Go to Him, and tell Him you have a house at His service, and that you will think it an uncomfortable house if He does not come and dwell with you in it. Tell Him He shall be heartily welcome to the best you have, and you are sorry you have no better. Be earnest with Him; resolve to have no nay. When Solomon had built a house, he made a solemn business of inviting God to it (2 Chron. vi. 41), and had a gracious answer. This is called dedicating a house, passing over the right of it to God and to His service, and where that is done in sincerity God will be sure to take possession. Open the gates, then, to let Him in (Ps. xxiv.), and say, as Laban to Abraham's servant, "Come in, thou blessed of the Lord." (Gen. xxiv. 31.)

Secondly, if you would have God come and dwell in your houses, you must bid Him welcome into your hearts, for it is the heart that God calls for. If you had a thousand houses, and should give all to God, and should bid Him welcome into them all, if you should not give Him your heart you give Him nothing. Where God shall not be a heart-guest He will not be a house-guest. Plainly thus: if you would have God come to you, you must get Him to be your Friend, and then He will be sure to come; and how must that be but by making Christ yours? by a true and lively faith closing with Him, accepting of Him, making Him your Friend, and then God in Him will be your Friend too. Is this work done, or is it not? If not, do it, and do it quickly, as you tender the welfare of your family, for till this be done God will never come near you nor your house neither. Christ is said to dwell in the heart by faith. (Eph. iii. 17.) Now, when Christ dwells in the heart by faith, then, and not till then, God will dwell in the house. Now, what say you to this? If you would have God come to you, you must come to Him. Behold, He calls you—do you come at His call, and then He will come at yours. Admit Christ into your hearts; put the key into His hands; let Him have possession of every corner of it, for assure yourselves you cannot have a better guest.

Thirdly, if you would have God come to your houses, you must keep them clean swept from all sinful pollutions; for what fellowship hath light with darkness, Christ with Belial, or God with sin? Sin is the only one thing that God hates, and therefore He will have nothing to do with those hearts, with those houses, in which that is uppermost. Will you lodge the traitor, the rebel, in the best chamber, and then invite the Prince to your house? (Job xxii. 23.) "Thou shalt put away iniquity far from thy tabernacles." As you must not be wicked yourselves, so you must see that none of yours be wicked. You must use your authority with children and servants to keep them from sin. Remember Eli, how dear the indulgence of his sons cost him. There is a terrible Scripture (Prov. iii. 33): "The curse of the Lord is in the house of the wicked." Those that are house-keepers, if they be sin-keepers, the curse of God, the eternal God (hear this and tremble) will rest upon them and their house. Will God dwell there where drunkenness and uncleanness are, where cursing and swearing, where lying and Sabbath-breaking are? You know He will not. Therefore have nothing to do with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them, especially in those under your charge, for to them you are reprovers by office. What has God given you your authority for but that you may use it against sin? Take pattern by holy Jacob. (Gen. xxxv. 2.) He said to his household, "Put away the strange gods that are among you." And holy David, in this Psalm (verses 3, 4, 5, 7), which is the householder's Psalm.

Fourthly, if you would have God to dwell in your houses, you must furnish them and make them ready for His entertainment. The Shunamite woman, when she would have the prophet lodge under her roof, provided prophet's furniture for him—a bed and a table, a stool and candlestick—and then he turned in thither. Now, there are two things which you must set up and keep up in your house for God—a throne and an altar.

You must set up a throne for Him; you and your house must be truly willing to be governed by Him in everything; for God will not dwell there where He shall not rule. He will not be a Guest where He shall not be a King. Where He shall not be all in all He will be nothing at all. Let not those expect His blessing that will not bear His yoke. God will have the uppermost place in the heart and in the house too, or else He will have none; for, take this from me, God will come nowhere to be an underling. Now, what say you to this? Are you willing to have Him upon these terms? Will you promise that, by the grace of God, sin shall not rule over you, the world shall not rule you? For (see St. Luke xvi. 13) God will not come to that house where the love of the world reigns. I dare to say He will not, for the friends of the world are enemies to God (James iv. 4), and God's enemies will not have Him to reign over them (St. Luke xix.), and then He will never come near them unless to their ruin.

You must set up an altar for Him, and it must be a smoking one. I mean this: if you would have God dwell with you, you must set up and keep up the daily worship of God in your families. He expects and requires a Lamb in the morning and a Lamb in the evening. You know what was Joshua's resolution. (Jos. xxiv. 15.) Let it be yours. Pray with your families; read the Scriptures to them; sing psalms—these are the three great family duties; and see that none of them be neglected; which of them is not very profitable and very comfortable? Take some time, also, to catechise your children and servants; teach them the good knowledge of the Lord. God has committed them to your charge, and expects from you an account of them. Remember, also, to make a business and to make a conscience of family worship. Be diligent and serious in it; consider what a God you have to deal with, and carry it accordingly in all your performances. Be careful to time duty aright. It is usually the earlier the better, both morning and evening. Let not worldly affairs crowd family worship into a corner, or make you omit any part of it or huddle it over slightly. Especially be careful to sanctify the Sabbath in your houses as well as in church. The Fourth Commandment seems to be directed especially to masters of families—"Thou and thy son," etc., etc. If thou be careful and conscientious in this matter, go on and prosper, and be assured the Lord is with thee.

Fifthly, if you would have God dwell in your families, you must be very careful in the performance of the duty of your family relations, as superiors, inferiors, and equals, always remembering that we are that really that we are relatively. Study the law of the Fifth Commandment, and be obedient to it. There is great duty in the conjugal relation. The husband's duty is to love his wife even as himself; the wife's duty is to be obedient to her husband in the Lord; the duty of both is to do all they can to help one another to heaven—to pray together and to be concerned for the welfare of one another's soul. Parents' duty is to bring up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Masters' duty is to give their servants that which is just and equal. Children are to obey their parents, and servants their masters, in the Lord. These duties are often mentioned in the Epistles, to show the stress God lays upon them. The great family duty is mutual love and unity. (Ps. cxxxiii.)

To conclude. Now you see what you must do to have the presence of God with you in your houses; and I think, in showing you what kind of presence that is, I have said enough to persuade you to it. Now, will you be persuaded to it? If you will, be assured that God will certainly come to you, and take up His abode with you, be your house never so mean in this world. You shall shortly go to Him and take up abode with Him in a better world. With which words comfort yourselves and one another.

THE FLYING SKULL.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE OILED FEATHER," ETC.

CHAPTER IV.

SINCE the memorable day when Mr. Ahithophel and his friend ejected Henry Soames from Blaystone Manor, that property had many owners. It never, as we have already said, continued long in any one person's hands. One left it thinking the neighbourhood too dull, and another making out that it was damp; a third was annoyed by the crows, and a fourth didn't care for the scenery. But so it was; none made it their home, until at last the place, being sold always for less and less, had been purchased by its present owner for some five-and-twenty thousand pounds. This gentleman also did not stay very long. He was now, at the time of which we write, actually on the wing; he had a child who was dying, and he was anxious to find a home in a warmer climate.

Evelyn Despard, the only daughter of the present owner, was about the same age as Elspeth Soames, but, unlike Elspeth, she was a fragile, delicate child; all the more dear, no doubt, to her father, who seemed to single her out from the rest of the family as his one special care. Sir Joseph Despard might be said to devote most of his life to that child. And indeed, for the matter of that, her brothers in their way did the same, for she was their only sister, and their one great fear in life was lest Evelyn should die; and then what would become of them all?

Very fond was Evelyn of all these boys. What mischief did she keep some out of! what encouragement did her simple words give others of them to do right! how capacious was her little heart to hold all their sorrows! how ready her hand to help in mending horses' reins, and making sails for boats, and being all things to all boys!

But fond as Evelyn was of the boys, when she fell ill she seemed to crave some girl like herself, and that girl she found in Elspeth Soames.

True, Elspeth was below her in rank. True, she had not had the education which in matters of accomplishment would have made her a suitable companion in all points for a sick child; but it was not now a question of such things with Sir Joseph Despard: it was one of whatever his Evelyn liked; and she liked Elspeth; and so the sexton's granddaughter was almost installed at the Manor, she was there so often.

For Evelyn Despard and Elspeth Soames were kindred spirits; they both loved the flowers, and the clouds, and the trees, and everybody. They both loved to talk sometimes dreamily of the angels and the holy people in heaven; each also loved the romance of the great warriors of fairy tales, and each in her own childish way loved mysteries of every kind.

The boys no doubt were very dear to Evelyn, and she entered into all their games, and would romp with them as far as her little strength would allow; but her innermost heart was with love and mystery, and other like things, so far as her little mind could understand, or speculate upon, or in any wise enter into them.

And this made a bond between Elspeth and herself. For the tradition of the Soames family was well alive in Blaystone, and Evelyn's father knew quite well that Elspeth was the descendant of the one who had for a short time actually possessed the place, and that grand folk of hers almost without number had lived there.

On this account Sir Joseph was all the more willing to have Elspeth as a humble companion for his daughter; but whether there had been these hindrances or not would have little mattered: Evelyn liked to talk to Elspeth, and that was enough.

How these children did career about amid the thunder and lightning, and kings and queens, and fairies and giants, and buttercups and daisies! What they saw in clouds and heard in breezes, and what tales they read, and what still more wonderful ones they made up, is more than I can tell. Only I am glad to put on record that in all holy things the spirit of reverence and awe was upon them. They trod softly in presence of aught which belonged to the other life. They knew when their little feet should put off their shoes, for the place on which they stood was holy ground; then they often spoke with bated breath, and whispered, and sometimes even only looked.

It was no wonder that under these circumstances the subject of the "Flying Skull" sometimes came to the front. For both children it had the charm of mystery, and Elspeth knew just enough about it to make it a matter of thrilling speculation from time to time. Evelyn Despard looked with a kind of awe and veneration on Elspeth Soames, because she was connected, however remotely, with that "Flying Skull." Moreover, Evelyn always had a kind of feeling, which made her treat Elspeth with a certain kind of deference, that Elspeth's people ought by rights, somehow or other—she did not exactly know how, but still ought by rights—to be in Blaystone Manor.

All this the children talked about in their own way, and Evelyn Despard knew this much—that a bad Mr. Soames, who used to live at the Manor long ago, had somehow made away with all the money that the Manor had been sold for, and that Elspeth's grandfather believed this marble skull had somehow a secret about it, but that, as a marble skull could have no brains, and to have a secret there must be brains of some kind in which to have it, anyone he had ever spoken to on the subject only thought him mad. "It has made grandfather miserable, and father too, when he was alive, was miserable, and great-grandfather was, I am often told, the most miserable of all. They all hated the man whose marble skull is up in the church; but I don't hate him, poor man! If he was a bad man he must have been very unhappy, and I am very sorry that he should have made himself so miserable."

John Soames—John, with the marble skull—did you hear that child's voice away in your far-off dwelling, wherever that is? Did that kindly word melt up the hardness of your iron-bound soul? Did you feel that you must give up your secret? or that you would, whether you must or no? John Soames, long since dead—where, I know not—what connections there are between us and you, I know not; I only know that the mystery of your marble effigy was now doomed—that the presence of that in sight of which it cannot stand is being prepared. Your marble skull must perish, even as your bony skull has perished; and whatever it contains, that must it yield up.

It would have been well for Sir Joseph Despard—well for all the young Despards—at least, we should have thought it well—if, months before, Sir Joseph had made up his mind to take Evelyn to a warmer climate. But it was now too late. The doctors from London agreed with the doctor at Blaystone that the child could not be moved. All that could now be done was to make her rooms at Blaystone as suitable as possible to one in her condition, and, when there came an exceptionally fine day, to take her out in a Bath chair and let her bask in the sun.

And so time wore on, and Evelyn Despard grew thinner and thinner, and slowly, day by day, drew near the confines of the land where many a secret will be disclosed.

Evelyn Despard knew that she could not recover; the hope which generally buoys up those who suffer under her malady seemed not to be for her; and, strange to say, she did not wish to recover; in her small way she knew what a mighty man of old knew in its fulness—at least as much in its fulness as mortal man can know—when he said "far better" ("To depart and be with Christ, which is far better").

A "far better," doubtless in its own small, it may be in its own childish, way had come to Evelyn Despard, and she waited for it as for something good. And all as a child—she was a child, and she thought as a child—soon she would put away childish things. Stay! how do we know that? We think it—ah! but "there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in our philosophy:" the childhood of eternity! the evolutions of the ages! everlasting growth! Do you ever speculate, good reader, not saying what shall be, but what may be? But I do not want to follow this out—we soon get lost.

"Elspeth," said Evelyn Despard to her humble friend one lovely morning at the end of May, as they sat out in the sunshine, Evelyn in her Bath chair, the primroses all around them, "I have a funny thought; and yet it is something more;" and the child looked rather serious. "Would your grandfather do something for me—something very particular?"

"Anything, I know," said Elspeth.

"Elspie, I shall be dead when Christmas comes—I know I shall; now I want to do something—perhaps grandfather will say very queer—but I feel I must do it if I can. And you must help me. Indeed, you must do the chief part—not with your hand, but with your heart; do you know what it is?"

"Can't guess," said Elspie, full of curiosity to know.

"No, of course you can't—it was stupid in me to ask you if you could. You know the 'Flying Skull'—you know how we have forgiven it all the harm it did—I say 'we,' for you know you and I are friends, and if it hurt you it hurt me: we can't reach Mr. Soames in the other world, but we can show we forgive him here. Now, Elspie, I have been thinking that if we could do something that would show we had forgiven him, it would be a nice thing for me to do before I die, and for you to remember when I am dead. Let us make a wreath of these primroses, and put it round the skull."

"The very thing I thought of myself one day," said Elspie, "only I meant it to be of buttercups and daisies."

"Eh! Miss Evelyn," said the old sexton, when he was fetched, and the extraordinary proposition was made to him; "that be a strange notion, certainly. I'd do anything to please you, Miss Evelyn; I'd dig up old John Soames himself, and let you put primroses all round his bones, if I dare do it, and it would please you—and that would be easier than what you ask me to do. I can't say, Miss Evelyn, I'd like the job even if I could do it, for there's a deal of mischief, I believe, somewhere in that head—anyhow, it knows something, I'm sure; but think, miss, of the Vicar, and the congregation, and the scandal 't would make; and when they found out I did it, 't would be as much as my place is worth; and you know we're depending on that for our bread. What would the people think, miss, when they came into church, and looked up and saw those pretty flowers on that ugly skull? Deary me, miss! the parson might as well stay at home for the matter of the attention folk would give to their prayers; the clerk's the only man among them that would say 'Amen,' and he wouldn't be meaning it, his mind would be so full of those flowers."

Many more objections, and very reasonable ones, would the sexton have brought forward, culminating, no doubt, in a final refusal to decorate the skull, but his scruples were put an end to by Evelyn Despard's telling him that she and Elspeth would be quite content if the old man would leave the wreath on until the next morning, then he could take it down, and no one would be a bit the wiser as to whether it had been there at all; and "if they were, what harm could it do?"

In this Elspeth fully agreed. Nothing but cursing and abuse had she ever heard heaped on the head of the defunct John Soames, and it would fully meet the views of Evelyn and herself if they could by an act, however small, show a kindly feeling to the poor skull, and, perhaps, through it, even to the peccant and defunct John Soames himself.

"Well," said Evelyn to Elspeth, when the matter had been all satisfactorily settled with the sexton, "you know the hours of the night are the longest and darkest and loneliest, and the poor skull will have the flowers on it all through them."

For old Jacob, who would do anything on earth to oblige Miss Evelyn, had consented to put on the wreath the last thing at night, and let it remain until the morning, when off it must come the very first thing, for who could tell what visitors might be coming to see the church? or, for the matter of that, the skull, which in the estimation of some people took the place of the church itself.

And the skull did wear the primrose wreath that night. Though the skull of neither a primrose knight nor dame, it was decorated with what might well pass as an emblem of innocence and purity, and simplicity and peace. It was decorated—that I say, but I say no more; for when morning came, and the sexton went to the church—at an early hour, you may be sure—to remove the wreath, he found the temples of the ghastly skull bare, and the wreath lying on the ground.

I am sorry to say this little incident stirred up the old bad blood which flowed in the Soameses' veins.

At first the old man seemed almost inclined to run for it, he was so terrified. He himself had removed the ladder by which he had gone up to put on the primrose wreath. It was certain no one could have got up to the skull during the night. What was it? How could it be? Was it that such pure sweet flowers could not tarry on such a polluted spot—was it that the effigy, as wicked in the marble as the original had been in the bone, could not abide the presence of anything which was suggestive of innocence in any way?—had the wicked old thing shaken its evil head, and been unable to abide even the symbols of what was good—shaken it, wagged it, bobbed it, jerked it, done something in some way to get rid of what, perhaps, was heavier to it than a crown of lead? Old Jacob never asked himself, whether partly from a feeling of disgust, and partly (if the truth were known) of fright, he had not got over his job the night before as quickly as he could—quickly and imperfectly, and whether in the course of nature the wreath may not have toppled down. Moreover, there was a bird flying about the rafters—a church bird. The church mouse is proverbial; why should not there be church birds as well as church mice? and was it not possible that that bird might have perched on the primroses and disarranged their centre of gravity, or possibly even have pecked at them, and so brought them down? I don't say either of these things happened; I only say they might have happened, for the bird was there. All I am concerned with is fact, not speculations; you may account for it, good reader, as you please. But there was the wreath down on the ground, and the wicked old skull looking down upon it from its horrid eye-holes high up overhead.

"Thou beest a bad one," said the sexton, as he looked up at the ghastly emblem. "Thou canst not bide aught with good folk; those innocents would do thee good, but good has naught to do with thee. If it were not that I am afeared, I'd knock thee down with the Pope's head when next the church is cleaned, and break thee small upon the pavement here"—and, with a look of ineffable disgust, the sexton left the church, taking with him the primrose wreath, concerning which he determined never to say a word to mortal man. The truth was, the sexton didn't want any talk about the matter at all. He did not want to have anything to do with the wreath from the beginning; and, above all, he did not want anything about it to come to the Vicar's ears. From a professional aspect, the sexton believed that everything was only safe when well under ground; so—partly lest anything uncanny should attach itself to the wreath from its undoubted contact with the skull, and partly if it had, indeed, objected to this contact, and parted with the skull on its own account, in which case it deserved all the honour he could confer on it—he just dug a hole, or, as he would call it, no doubt, "a grave" for it; and, having in a certain sense confined the wreath in an old newspaper, he interred it with all due solemnity. He felt, indeed, viewed in the light of a mistake and error of judgment, that the flowers were not dead yet, and that he was going a little out of his usual way of conducting himself in burying them until they were quite deceased. But circumstances alter things; and, after all, they would soon be dead. This reason as regards even, say, a small infant would not hold water—that Jacob knew quite well—and to bury even an infant alive would be to him a dreadful professional humiliation; but, after all, these were only flowers, and no questions would be asked.

A dead flower! That which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven; that which drank the dews of heaven and assimilated them; that which banqueted on sunshine; that which bent with gracious courtesy to the passing breeze; that which lent the air its perfume and asked it not again; that which distilled the juices of earth, and wrought them into form, and painted them with colour, and inspired the artist to model it and the poet to sing of it, and staggered the infidel into a belief that there must have been a God to make it;—all withered now!—all dead!—a wrinkled heap of wasted loveliness—why has it died? Thou sayest, another will come; perchance thou mayest say, and rightly say, that others may come—that I know as well as thou; but I want to know, why did it die? "Thou shalt know hereafter."

CHAPTER V.

THE primrose time soon passed away, and the early summer; and with them passed away also Evelyn Despard. Why this flower should have perished (or as we say, "perished"), who can tell? Why, I mean, "so young?" I don't speculate. Sometimes I think perhaps these are the flowers of heaven, in the garden where "there shall be no more death." If I get a bright thought, I accept it thankfully; I don't kill it by picking it to pieces, or speculating much on it. It is to me a thing of beauty, and of silent beauty; and it soothes my spirit. I feel as if it laid a cool hand on a burning forehead, and a warm hand on a chill heart; I feel that it says to me by an affinity (for it does not speak—part of its life is in its hush), "Let us be silent together. The outer humanities are full of noise; the inner thoughts from the other and the higher life have an atmosphere around them which says, 'Peace, be still!'"

And so you died, Evelyn Despard—though I know not why!—but, before you went, how many strange talkings did you have with your humble friend, Elsie Soames, about that horrible effigy in Blaystone Church—that "Flying Skull!" You got Elsie to make her grandfather tell you all he knew about it; you, young as you were, pondered the mysterious lines upon the monument beneath the horrible emblem; you and Elspie held wonderful confabulations as to what they could mean; but you came no nearer a solution of the mystery than anyone else.

It was a golden autumn evening when Evelyn Despard and Elspie Soames sat together in one of the oval windows of Blaystone Manor. The earthly fruits around had ripened; many of them had been gathered into garner and storehouse; the one ripening and harvest time of the year had come, and was almost gone. And it was drawing near harvest time inside the Manor, and harvest time for other fruit; but harvest time for some fruit is ever going on here and there, in this vineyard and that cornfield, of the wide domains of the great Lord of all.

Evelyn Despard had ripened, and must needs now be gathered.—Shall I say, little one, that you were wheat and were ready for garnering, or that you were fruit and were ready for storing, or a flower and were ready for plucking, or a grape and were ready for pressing! No, little one, you were incomparably beyond all these—you were a little one to whom it was said early in the day, "Come home, come home."

"Yes, Elspie, my dear little Elspie, who knows what we may find out when we are dead and in another world, where the Vicar says he is sure people know a great deal! Perhaps I may hear the secret then; and if I do—if I do, Elspie, I'll tell it to you. I'll tell it to you, Elspie, if it can be told to anyone on earth."

"But I should be frightened if I saw you," said Elspie; "you would be a ghost, and nothing would frighten me so much as a ghost."

"No, Elspie, I would not frighten you; I am too fond of you to frighten you. Perhaps I may whisper to you in your sleep, or do it in some other way that would not frighten you; for if you were frightened you might not be able to remember what I said, and then you might as well not have heard it at all."

And so Evelyn Despard died, the secret of the "Flying Skull" a mystery to her and her little friend, and they twain were parted for earthly-ever. "Earthly-overs," "earthly-overs"—I like to say "earthly-overs," for earth itself must come to an end, and the evers beyond earthly-overs shall be ours.

There was great weeping in Blaystone Manor when the breath fled from that little form, and Evelyn Despard lay straight, and white, and cold, upon her little bed. Weeping, weeping, weeping, fit to cry his eyes out, sat by that little bed the strong man, himself now no better than a child—a little weak and helpless child. His little girl—his only little girl—was gone, and to lose an only girl out of a family is almost, as it were, to break it up. For she belongs to all, and the loss of all is here pre-eminently the loss of each. They all wept, but the father most of all.

And by that bedside the fate of Blaystone Manor was again destined to a change. Sir Joseph Despard would live there no more; he would sell it for whatever it might fetch. Would that Elspie could live there! Would that the Soames family could have it again! Sir Joseph ran over in his mind the names of the Manor's various owners for years past, and their short tenures of the estate; and now his own was coming to an end. Had that accursed skull anything to do with it all? He did not know, and he did not care, but he would go from the place; even if he had to lose money he would not stay there. If he could get anyone to give him £20,000 for it he would take it; he could not live amid the memories of his dead child. Come what would, whether he sold the property or not, he would not stop there for the present; he would move the whole family away—at any rate, for a time.

And these thoughts, which sprang up beside the quiet little bed, the baronet immediately put into action, and preparation was made at once to leave the Manor.

But before he went, Sir Joseph Despard was found in the Vicar's study deep in consultation with him. The subject of their conversation was what form the memorial of Evelyn in the Blaystone Church should take. There was to be a simple little grass grave, with a stone at the head and foot, and five pounds a year was to be secured to the sexton for keeping it clipped and flower-planted, always with simple—very simple flowers; it was what he thought—nay, what he knew—Evelyn would have chosen for herself, for Elspie had told him so.

But this was not nearly enough for commemorating his darling's memory. What should there be in the church?—a brass—a sculptured monument? Cost was nothing. Would the Vicar help him out?

"If expense is really no object—" said the Vicar.

"Five thousand pounds," said the baronet, "if you like."

"I should suggest a stained-glass window for the chancel. Although it is old, I cannot say I admire that dingy green glass, which throws such an unearthly light in those parts, especially—especially on that—what I must call that dreadful object on the top of the Soames monument—the 'Flying Skull.' I have kept the ivy trimmed back as much as possible," said the Vicar, "so as to make the place look less gloomy; but do what I will, there falls in upon that ghastly emblem of poor departed, I am afraid wicked humanity, a gloom, which I confess I do not care for in the house of God. A handsome window would be a great benefit to the church."

"Then it shall be a window," said Sir Joseph Despard, "and the subject shall be 'Christ blessing the children,' and my Evelyn shall be in the number."

"Yes," said the Vicar, "I can see it in a moment—it all comes before my mind's eye—the Holy One with a little child in His left arm, and one—Evelyn's age, standing by His side, with many others. But this one dressed in white, and His hand on her head, and the light gathered in on the two figures, the Saviour and this one that He is blessing. And I know the man who can do this to perfection; and it will be a pleasant thought for you that your child, even in death, is doing good, dispelling some of the gloom which has so long hung round this part of the house of God."

"Then get it done," said the baronet; "and as quickly as possible consistently with its being well done; but mind you, it must be the best of its kind."

And so the window was ordered; and it was agreed that it should be all up the day before Christmas at the very latest—for Christmas morning without any fail.

Ah, you bad old skull, you little know what is coming on you! Shake, shake! I don't say, "Shake in your shoes," for skulls don't wear shoes—but shake, if you can, anywhere you can. Get the megrims anywhere in your wicked head, for so far as I know your end must certainly be drawing near.

CHAPTER V.

It was high time for Mr. Richard Barwell, the head of the firm of Barwell, Hayward, and Janeway's Bank, to retire. He felt it himself; the family felt it; I won't say the public felt it, for the public seldom care twopence who retires or not; but Mr. Barwell felt it. He felt it in his head, which was not always clear. He had recently muddled up Trunks (Grand Trunks) and Turks (Turkish Bonds), and he would have had a severe wiggling—enough to pull out the few remaining hairs in his venerable head—had he not been the head of the firm; the headship of the firm saved the head on his shoulders.

But the proprieties of the City, all its traditions, the credit of the establishment, the very decencies of humanity, all protested against the head of such a firm being liable—even liable—to, or even deserving of, or even being brought within hail of such treatment as under ordinary circumstances—say that of being a clerk or junior partner—he must have got. Consequently, it was "arranged" that Mr. Barwell should retire.

And now final arrangements were being made at the Bank—indeed, they were made; and Mr. Barwell sat in his great arm-chair in the Bank parlour for the last time.

"There is but one thing that troubles me in leaving the old place," said the senior partner. "I say the 'place,' not the 'people'" (and Mr. Barwell bowed courteously to his partners). "It is that box in our strong room, of which I have so often spoken, and to which I have so little clue as regards ownership. One does not like to leave a place where one has lived so long and so often pondered over a mystery, and leave that mystery unsolved. That box belongs to somebody—and its contents belong to somebody, and I should like that somebody, whoever he may be, to have his own; and moreover, I should like to know what's in it. I spoke to Mrs. Barwell, and she would like to know—very much like—indeed, I'm not sure whether my retirement would be to peace, if I have to live with Mrs. B. and a secret. Ladies, you know, have inquiring minds—they don't like secrets—at least, they don't like others to have them—and for the matter of that, they don't like keeping them themselves, and I shall be liable for the remainder of my life to be continually questioned as to what I think is in that box. And the worst of it is, I don't know when or where the question will be asked. It may be when my mouth is full, and I shall have to half-choke to get out the answer quick enough—for Mrs. B. is impatient at times; it may be when I'm just dropping to sleep, and answer with a half-snore and get snubbed for my pains. I'm not sure," said the poor man, "whether I may not hear the question come through the key-hole even when I'm in my bath. And if I guess at an answer and say one thing, it will be, 'How do you know?' and if another, it will be, 'You stupid!' and another, 'Why don't you know?' and if another, 'Why don't you break open the box and make sure?' Hayward, Janeway, we haven't jogged along so many years together not to know a little of each other's troubles. I know you have yours too; what married men have not? Now, before we part, we must take action about that box. It was here during my father's time and mine; we must try and find the owner. Our directions are that if anyone applies with a key that will open it, he is to have it. No one has ever come; perhaps the owner intended to come some day, and is long since dead; we must advertise the box."

"As well as I remember," said Mr. Janeway, "the memorandum concerning it says that the gentleman who deposited it opened an account at the same time under the name of Brown, but frankly told us that was not his real name. The deposit of £500 has lain with us ever since; nothing has ever been drawn against it, and he made no secret that the main object in opening the account was to secure the safe keeping of that box under the conditions named. We applied to his referees to know something about him as time went on, but they had left the country, and we could get no information; so there was nothing for it but to keep the box until the man with the key came for it."

"Now," said Mr. Barwell, "we must advertise, for this cannot go on for ever. Mr. Janeway, you have always done the literary part of our business; I shall be glad if you will draw up an advertisement."

This Mr. Janeway—who was always equal to any occasion in which the pen was required—soon accomplished; and before a week was over, some of the leading papers contained the following:—

"Deposited many years since with Messrs. Barwell, Hayward, and Janeway, a box. The owner is requested to remove the same. Proof of ownership will be production of the key."

This somewhat unusual advertisement caused a flutter in some breasts and schemes in some heads; and for a few days Messrs. Barwell, Hayward, and Janeway had partly an anxious, and partly an annoying time of it at the banking-house.

Mr. Janeway had taken good care not to mention the size of the box, and the clerk in charge also took care not to give any information to those who came, so a good deal of trouble was avoided in that way; still the trying of keys was very wonderful. Lunatics came who asserted that the box was theirs, and produced one a watch key, and one the key of the kitchen-jack, and threatened legal proceedings if the box were not given up to them at once. An old lady from the country came with a whole bunch, and insisted on trying every one that could at all be got into the lock. A locksmith or two came with the hope of being able to do something in the matter, and one or two gentlemen who, having professionally to do with skeleton keys, might be supposed to meet the requirements of the skull, put in an appearance, but it was all no good; after a hard tussle with one and another, and after getting rid at last of one old lady from the country, who with her umbrella (large enough to fight with a deluge) planted in the ground said she would not go, for she was sure that an old key she had, that had been in the family since the time of Richard III., must have been the right one—after getting rid, I say, of all these, and all had been done that could be done, and nothing had come of it, Mr. Barwell had to face Mrs. B. for apparently the rest of his life with an unsolved mystery—and that, let me tell you, was a serious thing for any married man who must be at home most of the day to have to do.

Amongst the readers of the advertisements in the chief papers was the Rev. Jonathan Dobree, the Vicar of Blaystone. He was on the look-out for an estimable quadruped that could be ridden by a child. That would just suit him, as he was nervous, and he meant to study the advertisement columns until he met with that worthy beast; and once in the thick of them, he went on from one thing to another, and then he saw the notice of Messrs. Barwell, Hayward, and Janeway about the key.

The worthy man looked at his own bunch, and wondered whether any of his keys would fit the mysterious box. But as they were all of a very ordinary type, and a journey to London was expensive, he thought he would not trouble himself about the matter, and it was just as well he did not. But the thing stuck in his mind, and he often wondered about it, and said, "Someone might write a story about that key," and relegating it to that part of his memory in which he kept the sea-serpent and a number of strange speculations of German divines, he thought no more of it, at least for a time.

Limner and Co. did their very best with the new chancel window for Blaystone Church. They had not been stinted as regards price, and they did not stint as regards work. Especially careful were they with the likeness of Evelyn Despard. They had good photographs to work from, and did not give over until they had thoroughly satisfied Sir Joseph Despard and themselves. They determined, as they had plenty of money at their disposal, that the Blaystone window should be something to refer to.

And surely, as the window stood temporarily erected in the studio of Limner and Co., it was a goodly sight; and Sir Joseph and the Vicar rejoiced at it—the one because of the worthy commemoration of his child, and the other because of the neutralisation of the hideous skull. And both thought and hoped that that window would be as good as a sermon to many, and would tell of how good and kind He was—He—the great He, whose word for all the young was this, "Suffer them to come unto me—Forbid them not."

"You will excuse me, Sir Joseph," said Mr. Limner, senior, "you will excuse me, sir, for saying it—and the Vicar of Blaystone will not, I trust, consider me superstitious; but I should not be surprised if that little one brought some blessing into Blaystone Church, or parish, or somewhere, or to some one about. Do you know, gentlemen, that there's a history, quite a little history, about the painting of that child. You have observed that it has an other-world look about it. It might be so—for it has been painted by a young man who, when he was working on it, was fast going to another world—and," said Mr. Limner, dropping his voice into a solemn whisper, "who has gone there now. He seemed to have something of the other world upon him before he left here, and he has put it into the face of that child."

Thus the window was finished to the full satisfaction both of the baronet and the Vicar, and it now only remained that it should be put up in Blaystone Church. This, Mr. Limner promised should be done by Christmas Day.

"The Christmas morning sun shall shine into Blaystone church through those holy faces and those white robes, and," said Mr. Limner, who had seen the "Flying Skull" when he went to inspect the chancel for the window, "none will ever look any more upon that hideous skull; their eyes will be directed to the beautiful and other-world faces in my window—pardon me, sir, if I speak with what I may hope is a justifiable pride of work into which I have really put my heart."

"Christmas comes but once a year,
And when it comes it brings good cheer."

So sings the old rhyme, but ah! is it true?—Christmas brings to many sad memories—the consciousness of fearful gaps, crevasses, graveyards, terrible things in the heart. But I am not going to enlarge upon these; we need go no farther than our own pages for an instance of the truth of this, if indeed we know so little of life as to want one. What would Christmas bring to Sir Joseph Despard?

But there was one little family in Blaystone to whom it was about to bring good cheer, and that was old Jacob Soames's. The long fret of years was about to end to him and his.

And thus it came about.

"Grandfather," said Elspeth Soames, "they will finish the new window to-night?"

"Yes, my child, they will begin to take down the scaffolding and the canvas at five o'clock."

"And you will be in the church, I heard you say, all night, cleaning up, and sweeping after the decorations."

"Ay, indeed," said old Jacob.

"You'll let me be with you?" said Elspeth.

"Nay," said the old man, "bed is the place for thee, little lass."

"Grandfather," said the girl, "I must stay with you, for a reason—a reason I promised Miss Evelyn before she died."

"And what may that be?"

"I promised that the 'Flying Skull' should have a wreath of holly-berries on Christmas Eve—though you must take it off before church-time, I know. I must keep my word to the dead."

To tell a lie to anyone buried by him, and in his church-yard, would have been a dreadful thing to the sexton, and though pretty proof against superstition and all ordinary ghosts, this would be an unusual thing, and he was not sure how it would work out after dark; so after some demur, he agreed to it. The two big stoves in the church warmed it well, and Elspeth evidently was not to be denied.

So those two spent that night together in Blaystone

Church—the old man and the little girl—and Elspeth made the holly wreath, and with many grimaces the old man put it on the cold brows of the Flying Skull, to be taken off in three or four hours—though it was never taken off by human hand.

Christmas morning about five o'clock found Blaystone Church all decorated for the holy festival, even to the very temples of the "Flying Skull," which for a little while were to wear the wreath, and be so far in harmony with all around. Such harmony that skull appeared as though it could not endure—for it did not wait for any human hand to remove that wreath.

And the only living being within the walls of Blaystone Church was Elspeth Soames.

"Yes," said the sexton, "sleep on, little one. I'll leave the candles burning and make up the fires; I'll just go home for the new matting, and I'll be back long before you're awake."

But Jacob Soames was not back so soon as he thought. He had a good deal of delay in getting the matting ready, and just as he was about to start with it, the storm which had been gathering for two hours before burst—crackle-crash!—it broke right over Blaystone Church—the lightning seemed almost to strike the steeple; and then came torrents of rain, during which the sexton could not stir. But Elspeth! why did he ever leave her even for an hour? Would she not be terrified even out of her very wits?

And in truth, enough had happened to terrify Elspeth. Long had the iron spike which held the Flying Skull on the slant, as though it were about to fly, been rusting, and now it was very, very nearly through; the last fixing of the holly wreath on it had given it a little shake—the church itself had almost trembled under this terrific thunder-peal, and that had given the last needful touch—with a tremendous crash down came the skull on the chancel pavement, smashing itself into half a dozen pieces. With even such wings as it had, it might, considering the place in which it was, have had the decency to come down a little more gently; but no! its destiny was to fall—and smash.

After her first terror was over, Elspeth Soames saw something glittering on the ground, and picked it up—it was a small, a very small key, bright as silver, twisted here and there, with the funniest wards. It had fallen out of the skull, out of a cunning chamber inside it, the hollowing out of which had so weakened it, that it could not stand the crash of its terrible fall.

All was quiet now, except the splashing of the rain, and Elspeth and the shattered skull were alone. She called for her grandfather, but he gave no answer; and remembering that he had to fetch the matting, and that no doubt he had just gone for it while she had dropped asleep, she said a little prayer and just sat down again—not to sleep, but to listen for his steps when he came.

But sleep will come sometimes whether we like it or not; and Elspeth, who had been up all night, dropped off again. The church belonged to God, and not to the skull, and she was not afraid. The little prayer perhaps brought the sleep. But so it was, that as soon as the huge storm-cloud rolled away, and the sun burst out with a grand golden beam, and the sexton reached the church breathless with fright, he found the little maid calmly sleeping. She lay along the broad chancel step, on which she had been sitting with her back against one of the pillars—when sleep overpowered her she had just quietly sunk down—and in her open hand, relaxed by sleep, was the glittering key.

And all round about the child, and on her, was gathered the light from the figures in the window—the two chief figures—Evelyn Despard and the One by whom she was being blessed. It was the first light which passed through them from the outer sun into the holy house; and it fell on the one to whom Evelyn Despard had said that, if anything could be revealed, so it should be to her.

I don't in the least say that any revelation indeed was made. I only chronicle that the light fell from Evelyn to Elspeth, and tarried on her as she slept, and that the thunder-riven skull had given up a part of its secret, and that of that secret Elspeth's hand now held the key.

Wonderful of course was the sensation which the fall of the "Flying Skull" caused in the neighbourhood; and many were the visitors who came to look at the denuded monument—read the inscription on it, and departed saying it was very strange.

But the secret of the key they were not told. That was kept close between Sir Joseph, the Vicar, the sexton, and his grandchild. What might come of it, who could tell? but that there would be something, however it might come about, that was certain.

Day and night pondered the Vicar the mystery of the key. At last a revelation came to him. Rum-maging one day amid the lumber-room of his memory—among the German metaphysics, and wild theories about Scripture facts, the sea-serpent, and the gooseberry as big as an egg, and the like, up started Barwell and Co.'s advertisement about the box. The Vicar excitedly fished it out from the book of newspaper scraps, and rushed headlong with it to the Manor.

"It may be the key," said the baronet; "at any rate, we can but try;" and that night's train saw the baronet, the Vicar, and old Jacob off to London.

As may be well imagined, the cards of the baronet and the clergyman were not to be despised, and the partners with the head-clerks assembled in solemn form to see the lock tried.

Incredulity first—breathlessness next—a suppressed hurrah third, as the lock clicked in response to the turn of a bright little key, and the Soames mystery stood revealed. The contents of the box were simply a Bank of England note for £20,000, and one line—"The Soames who gets it is welcome to it." Ha! ha! ha!

Now was revealed why the money which Blaystone Manor fetched never could be traced. No doubt John Soames wished to keep the money within his own power while he lived, and to keep it from any Soames ever getting it if he did not use it himself before he died. The one line was one of spite to the end.

John Soames had died rejoicing in the belief that that money should never reach a Soames' hand.

But what they never knew was how patiently and perseveringly day by day the man who had pushed that key into the centre of that skull had wrought to get it there. And truly he did his work with skill—patience did it. There was just the proper bed for the little key, and no more; and then came the filling in, so deftly done that no human eye was likely to discover it, and none ever did. But the cement had not filled the whole of the key-bed. John Soames was afraid of its hardening,

She put many questions to poor Mr. B., to which, in her opinion, he did not always give the right answer. For example, when asked if he called himself a man, and he meekly claimed to be one of the species, she repudiated the idea altogether; and when he asked "what he was," and said he "wasn't a woman," all that he took by that undoubted statement of fact was that, "No, he was nothing of the kind; for, had he been, he would rather have broken in the box with and preventing his getting at his key if he wanted it; it was little more than a small plug which closed the secret chamber of the key, and the skull was prepared to crack across if it got such a crashing fall as had indeed brought it to its end.

"In her open hand was the glittering key."—p. 220.

So strange were the circumstances, that the bankers requested a little time before they gave up the box and its contents; but on getting a bond of indemnity from Sir Joseph they handed it over to Jacob Soames.

For that £20,000 the baronet—glad to get rid of the Manor—handed it over to old Jacob, who had his grandson educated as became its heir, and who had his grand-daughter brought up as a lady, which indeed she was already, all to the piano, calisthenics, and French—with the irregular verbs.

Amongst those who most rejoiced at the revelation of the secret of the box was Mr. Barwell, who, if the truth were known, had had a sorry time of it with Mrs. B. since he left the bank. To have left the firm with a secret which she could henceforth never hope to unravel was in her eyes the height of poltroonery and imbecility and want of self-respect.

a poker than left the firm, after all those years, with a secret for other people, perhaps, to find out—with a secret which his wife could never know!"

Dear, good Mr. B.! the great question, "Is life worth living?" you began once more timidly to revolve in your mind; and, asking for a second helping of turtle, and looking somewhat furtively at your spouse, with a slight impediment in your speech, you ventured a little tremblingly on the affirmative, and said "Yes."

As to old Jacob, old association kept him continually wandering about the churchyard, until at last he lay down in it himself. One great satisfaction he had before he died: the Vicar got a faculty for the removal from the chancel of the monument on which the skull had stood, and a marble tablet to the memory of Evelyn Despard was put in its place; and in a hole dug with his own hands, deeper than the deepest grave in Blaystone churchyard, the former sexton buried, out of sight for ever, the shattered remnants of

ADDRESSES TO CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A.

I.—THE MOTIVE.

HE primary and fundamental motive which influences the Christian worker is, of course, a sense of duty. Taught by the Spirit, he has come to understand that he is not his own, but that he belongs to another, even to Christ. The revelation, in some cases, is a startling one: in all cases it is productive of marked results, and puts the man who receives it into an expectant attitude. You see him waiting, as it were, looking up, with the thought in his heart, "Lord! what wilt Thou have me to do?"

And surely he is not mistaken in supposing that he will presently be entrusted with a commission from above? No doubt the Lord could dispense with all intermediate agents and agencies, if He chose to do so; He could bring His own influence to bear directly and immediately upon the human heart and conscience: He could, for instance, set aside the preacher, and use only the Holy Spirit; but He does not see fit, as a rule, to do so. He works upon men through men. The Church of Christ is the organ of Christ, and by means of it He brings Himself into contact with the outside world. Yes; and all the servants of Christ have their share—be it a larger or a lesser one—in the vast scheme. The Master has gone away, leaving "to every man his work." And so we stand, for a moment or two, until the Divine will declares itself—waiting to be—not hired, for we are in the service now, but directed, sent, employed, honoured by occupation, as we have been already honoured by acceptance.

God had great purposes to accomplish concerning the Kingdom of Israel; but He suspended everything on the action of His prophet Elijah. So long as Elijah prayed that it would not rain, the drought continued; when he prayed that the rain might come, it came, and the curse was lifted off. In other words, God condescended to make His own servant essential to the fulfilment of His own Divine plans.

So with us—in our infinitely smaller way. God has called us: God intends to use us.

The first feeling, then, I say, is that of obligation. We ought to work for our Divine Master, partly because He bids us work, partly also because we are members of a body through which Christ intends to manifest Himself to the world, and to bring His gracious and loving influences to bear upon it.

II. But in addition to the sense of duty, we have to take into account the constraint of love—a feeling which impels us to bear testimony, in some shape or other, to the Divine goodness towards us. There are not a few persons who hardly know how to speak a word for Christ, or who would, at all events, be greatly embarrassed if called upon to tell out to others what the Lord has done for them, what He is to them. Such reticence, perhaps, is not without its faulty side, for it robs Christ of His due, and hinders His cause amongst men; and the tendency to it ought rather to be resisted than acquiesced in and excused, as is too frequently the case. But, at the same time—for characters in which it prevails—there is an outlet in Christian work. Service for them is testimony. Though they cannot say much, they find in their earnestness, in their diligence, in their devotedness, a tongue with which to utter the Redeemer's praise; and others, seeing their good works, give glory to the Father which is in heaven. Love, then, even when it is, so to speak, inarticulate, expresses itself in work; and as it grows and increases finds apter and apter expression. There is no teacher like love. Ingenious in the discovery of methods, it puts up with no repulse, but if one plan fails turns to another. It scorns weariness, and perseveres until it succeeds. It sweetens all toil, makes all company congenial, and every burden light to bear—with patience at least, if not with joyfulness. It is its own great reward, and illuminates for itself the path it has to tread, be it ever so dull, and rough, and rugged, and barren, and uninviting. Let us ask, then—we who are workers for the Kingdom—that the love of God in Christ may be shed abroad more and more in our hearts by the blessed indwelling and inworking in them of the Holy Ghost.

III. Next to this Divine love, and an inseparable companion to it—comes zeal for God's honour. How precious this zeal is in God's sight we are taught by one of Ezekiel's most remarkable visions. Do you remember it? The prophet sees the cloud of Divine vengeance closing round and resting upon the doomed city of Jerusalem. Mysterious figures, each with a drawn sword in his hand, hover over the unconscious population. Orders are given to them to smite unsparingly, young and old, the minister of religion and him who comes to worship at the altar: all are to be cut down; and soon the city will be the hideous scene of desolation and death, and the cry of its agony will go shivering up to the stars. But from this terrible calamity some are to be exempt; some are to have a mark put upon their foreheads by which they shall be known; and when the slaughter comes on, these are to be passed by. And who are they—they whom the destroying angel is to leave unharmed, as he did on that dark night in Egypt, when he swept over the blood-stained portals and entered them not? They are the men and women who "sigh and cry" for the abominations of Jerusalem; who grieve over the dishonour done to their covenant-God; who pray for deliverance; who strive, so far as they may, for the overthrow of evil. Yes, the true workers for the Divine Kingdom must have this characteristic amongst others, that they cannot sit down and enjoy themselves, and use their own privileges—cannot, in fact, take life easily—when they see Satan tempting, and souls perishing, and the name of the Lord Jesus Christ trampled under foot. Their comfort is disturbed at the sight. They become restless. They must be up and doing.

IV. Let us add to the sense of duty, to the constraint of love, to the impulse of spiritual jealousy, one thing more, and that a deep and true sympathy with our fellow-men, or what some have called an "enthusiasm of humanity," and then we shall be fairly equipped for our task. Without this latter qualification we shall accomplish but little. In our Master Himself it was the Divine love shining through human eyes, and sounding in the tones of a human voice, that drew hearts round Him by the power of an irresistible attraction. Had He been hard, His holiness would have repelled, and men would have kept aloof from Him. As it was, all who were not incurably wedded to their sins, pressed into His loving and gracious presence, eager to lay down the burden of their sorrows and trials at His sacred feet; and the most lost and hopeless—those whom society had given up in despair, or flung off with contempt—felt that they had in Jesus of Nazareth a Deliverer and a Friend. And we, if we would be successful workers, must partake of this spirit—and partake largely of it too. Men, women, and children—all recognise, directly they see him, the man who honours humanity for its own sake, and is in true and genuine sympathy with it. Duty! Yes! we require the backbone of a sense of duty—we shall be but limp workers without it; Love to Him who loved us, and gave Himself for us—zeal for the glory of God—yes! we must have the strong impulse which both these feelings impart. But, though we cannot dispense with any one of the three, still less can we dispense with the magnetic influence of a Christ-given brotherliness. In the union of all we have the motive power of the true Christian worker. And need it be said that it is only by abiding in Christ, it is only by seeking and obtaining continually the blessed influences of the Holy Spirit, that this power, in its purity and strength, can be sustained and increased within us?

With two thoughts we conclude.

First: Let us not be unwilling or slow to extend recognition and greeting to all who are working for the cause of truth and righteousness upon earth, although they do not adopt our method, and even, it may be, do not march with us under the banner of Christ. We regret that they should not do so, for they miss a noble inspiration, they rob themselves of a wonderful sustaining power. Well is it to labour, and strive, and contend for what is right and true; but it is better far, and happier far, to work for and with a righteous person; and that blessing we who call ourselves Christians enjoy. And besides, we are more sure of a result, for we work on the lines which God has laid down. We know what we are about. We follow a leader, a Captain, who is Himself the Truth. Nevertheless, we will remember that all who honestly struggle against evil are to be held in honour by us. Do not let us despise them as if they were merely secular—the politician, or the statesman, or the writer, or the poet, or the man of science, who, without making what is called a "profession of religion," are labouring to overthrow abuses, to root out error, to remove mistakes, to let in light upon the darkness of mankind. "He that is not against us is for us."

Our last thought is for ourselves. It may be a trouble to some who read these papers that they seem to be doing no direct work for Christ. Nothing of the kind, so far as they know, has up to the present time fallen in their way. They have little to give; they cannot teach; they do not know how to visit the poor; they think that they have no gift of administration even of the simplest kind; and they do not feel much courage to speak on religion. Are they outside the pale of Christian workers? Assuredly not. "They also serve who only stand and wait." And where there is the real willingness, the opportunity will sooner or later present itself. Meantime (to say nothing of the power of prayer, which all may exert), these persons are working for Christ, if they are truly following Christ. For mighty, beyond all expression, is the influence of a life, in which every common thing is done, and every ordinary duty discharged—in the name of the Lord.

HOW GOD PRESERVED THE NEW TESTAMENT.

BY THE VERY REV. R. PAYNE SMITH, D.D., DEAN OF CANTERBURY.—THIRD PAPER.

E saw in our last paper what an array there is of costly and noble manuscripts, ranging from the fourth to the sixteenth century, whereby students have ample means for settling the text of the Holy Scriptures. So many of these MSS., however, have either been discovered, or, at least, made available for use only in our own days, that naturally many interesting questions are still under debate; but even so, there is no book in the world for the substantial accuracy of which there is such an amount of testimony as there is for that of the Bible.

It may seem strange, nevertheless, to affirm that even if not one of these goodly MSS. had been preserved, yet that the Bible would not have been lost; so great has been the care taken of it by the Divine Providence, and so vast the evidence for it on every side.

ST. JEROME TRANSLATING THE SCRIPTURES

One might say much upon this point with regard to the quotations from the Scriptures contained in the writings of the Fathers, beginning long anterior to the date of the most ancient MSS. And as copies of the Bible could not be multiplied so cheaply then as they are now by the printing press, they quoted very largely; and as they delighted in allegorical interpretations, there is no portion of Holy Writ which is not pressed into service. The quotations have, for textual purposes, to be used carefully; because the Fathers often quoted from memory, and possessed none of those helps to accuracy, in the shape of dictionaries and concordances, enjoyed by us now. But the habit of depending upon memory made their memories stronger; and they were not so uncritical as many writers suppose, but often refer to the existence of differences of reading. Altogether, their value is very great, inasmuch as they show what was the current text of Holy Scripture in their days; and, moreover, the errors to which they are liable are of a different kind from those committed by copyists, and thus they serve as a check upon one another.

But the authority to which I now wish to refer is that of the ancient versions, and when I mention that some of these are earlier than the most ancient codices, and that they come from various quarters, and represent distinct and distant branches of the Church, it is plain that their evidence is of very high value.

We have already seen that when the Jews returned from the Babylonian exile, the common people had lost the use of the old classic Hebrew, and that this led to the formation of Targums, or translations into the Aramaean patois spoken by the multitude. And these Targums, gradually perfected during the four centuries and a half between Nehemiah's age and the coming of Christ, and handed down by oral tradition in the Rabbinic schools, guarded the Hebrew text from corruption then, and are most useful to us now for textual criticism. But the first complete version of the Old Testament was that made into Greek in Egypt, and which was probably begun in the time of the first Ptolemy, about 280 B.C., and completed in the course of the next thirty or forty years. Now, that which led to the making of this translation was the fact that a very large number of Jews had settled in Egypt. Isaiah speaks of their presence not only in Lower Egypt, but in Pathros—that is, Upper Egypt—and even in Cush—that is, the Soudân and Abyssinia. (Isa. xi. 11.) He foresaw also the time when whole cities there would speak the Aramæan tongue (ibid. xix. 18), and condemned the policy which caused so many Israelites to migrate thither (ibid. xxx. 2). But the Assyrian wars made the greater safety and peace of Egypt very strong attractions to the Jews as their own land became more and more devastated by war; and we find Jeremiah similarly attempting, but in vain, to stem their flight thither (Jer. xlii. 14), and finally compelled himself to go with the fugitives. Most of my readers will probably remember the wonderful proofs brought to light within the last few years of his presence at Talpanhes, and the discovery there of the very pavement of which he speaks in chap. xlii. 8—10. Of course the same thing would happen in Egypt as at Babylon, that the people generally would embark in trade, and adopt the language of the mart, which there was Greek. And when the Greek Empire of Alexander was divided among his generals, and the Ptolemys took Egypt, and fostered the Jews there, especially at Alexandria, because of their aptitude for trade, with increased numbers and larger wealth there would come the desire of having their Law and other Scriptures in the language used by them in daily life.

A fabulous account of this version is given in a letter of Aristeas, narrating how King Ptolemy sent an embassy to the high priest at Jerusalem, with large sums in silver and gold; and how the high priest selected six men of each tribe, who, after a magnificent reception, were shut up in cells on the sea-coast, and completed the translation in seventy-two days. The internal evidence proves that it was made gradually, and by men deficient in the knowledge handed down in the schools in Palestine. They often divide sentences wrongly, mistake the meaning of rare words, and not unfrequently confess their ignorance by transcribing Hebrew words in Greek characters. But the story was so generally current that the version was called the Septuagint, as being made by seventy [and two] men.

Now, this translation holds so very important a place in Church history, that it is necessary to say a few words concerning it.

And, first, for many ages it was the sole means by which the Old Testament was known to Christians. We have seen in the history of the Uncial MSS. that the noblest of them contain the Septuagint and the New Testament. The Hebrew Scriptures were absolutely unknown in the West, and only partially known in the East; and thus the Church was unable to distinguish between what was genuine and what apocryphal. We shall see when we come to the Vulgate what great difficulties Jerome had to overcome, and how he was forced to settle at Bethlehem, before he could make his translation directly from the Hebrew. The old Latin version (Vetus Italia) was made from the Septuagint.

An equally important service which it rendered was that it prepared the Gentile world for the reception of Christ. Those devout men and women of whom we read so much in St. Paul's missionary tours were Gentiles whose hearts had been reached by the revelation in the Old Testament of the unity, holiness, omnipresence, and almighty power of God; and it was the Septuagint which had given them this knowledge. Without this preparation going on for nearly three centuries, the Gentile world would not have been fit to receive doctrines so pure and refined as those of Christianity.

To us a third most important use is that the Septuagint bears witness to the substantial accuracy of the Hebrew text. Made in Egypt at a distance from the Palestinian schools, and by men evidently untrained in the vast traditional knowledge of the Scribes, it has preserved for us a text long current in Egypt, and made from MSS., some of which may possibly have been carried thither in the times of Isaiah and Jeremiah. Of course there are considerable differences of reading, and these often are of great value. But the wonder is that this text, which branched off from the main stem three centuries before Christ, agrees so generally, and often even minutely, with the ordinary Hebrew text as given us by the Massorites in the ninth and tenth centuries after Christ.

Finally, this version rendered to Christianity a fourth and most important service. For it formed the Greek of the New Testament, both in its vocabulary and its grammar. The New Testament, humanly speaking, could not have been written unless the Septuagint had provided for it a language. Possibly a vocabulary had grown up in Egypt to express both the technical terms of the Law, and also ideas altogether beyond the range of the Greek philosophies. These the Septuagint has preserved for us, and only by its study can we reach the full meaning of many of the words used by the Apostles and Evangelists. Even the names of Christian graces are often of Septuagint origin. Thus the word for love—agapê—is not found in any classic writer, but in the Septuagint alone; and the difficulty of rendering it in our days arises from the fact that, just as in classic Greek and Latin, so in English, there is no word to signify a love devoid of passion, and which does not seek the possession of the thing loved, but only its good and happiness.

The Septuagint is a translation of the Old Testament only; but if from Egypt we travel into Mesopotamia, we find there a most valuable translation of both Testaments, known as the Peshitta, or Simple Version, by which is meant a version into ordinary Syriac. This translation was the work of a lengthened period of time, and one of the precursors of it is known as the Curetonian Syriac. This consists of eighty-five leaves found by Dr. Cureton in one of the MSS. brought by Dr. Tatham from Egypt, and contains portions of all the Gospels, though the fragment of St. Mark consists of only four verses. It is quoted by Aphraates in homilies bearing dates from A.D. 337 to A.D. 345, and which have been published by Dr. Wright from a MS. dated A.D. 474. In a previous edition of an Armenian Version of these homilies Aphraates is wrongly confounded with St. James of Nisibis. The Peshitta may really in parts be older, as it dates from the second century, but it was revised between A.D. 250 and A.D. 350, and collated with MSS. at Antioch, and thus ranks as of the fourth century, giving us the text current at Antioch at that time. As Mesopotamia embraced Christianity at a very early date, the kings of Edessa having been converted during the first century, the version of the Old Testament may represent Hebrew MSS. carried there soon after the days of our Lord. Besides the Old Testament, it contains all the New, except 2 Pet., 2 and 3 John, Jude, and the Apocalypse. It is written in pure and idiomatic Syriac, and is generally literal, though it does not shrink from giving a paraphrase where the sense requires it.

Another important Syriac version of the New Testament is the Harklensian. Its object is to give a perfectly literal rendering of the Greek, without any regard to style or idiom. So exact is it that it would be easy to re-translate it into Greek, all the articles, pronouns, particles, the tenses of the verb, etc., being most carefully given, though often with great clumsiness. It was begun in A.D. 508, by Philoxenus, a Monophysite Bishop of Mabug, when living in exile at Alexandria, and collated again with the MSS. there by Thomas, Bishop of Heraclea in A.D. 616. Thomas added in the margin a number of various readings which are very valuable. Thus it bears witness to the contents of MSS. stored up at Alexandria, and which perished at the destruction of its noble library. It contains all the New Testament except the Apocalypse.

I pass over many versions, which all have their points of interest, to hasten on to the Gothic, made by Ulphilas—that is, Wölfein, Little Wolf—in the first half of the fourth century. This extraordinary man invented even an alphabet for the illiterate Goths, composed partly of Greek and partly of Runic letters, and which is now represented by the alphabet in use in Russia. Like our modern missionaries, his care was to supply the race which he had converted to Christianity with the Word of God, and not knowing Hebrew, he translated the Old Testament from the Greek Septuagint, and added to it the New. The remains of this version are very valuable, not merely for textual criticism, but as the first and most ancient writing in the Teutonic language.

In the fourth century the Scriptures were translated into Ethiopic, and in the fifth into Armenian. The Ethiopic is one of the versions printed in Bishop Walton's famous Polyglot Bible; for the Armenian MSS. were obtained from Cappadocia, the mother of Armenian Christianity. And thus it will be seen how great an extent of country these versions cover. They represent to us the MSS. of Mesopotamia, of Antioch, of Egypt—where too, we have the Memphitic and Thebaic versions—of Abyssinia, of the Goths and races north of the Danube, and of Cappadocia. We have still to journey to North Africa and Italy, representing to us the West.

We find there the Vetus Itala, a version of the second century, but not really Italian, but made probably in North Africa, where Latin was the language of the country. Its style is barbarous, and reminds us of the fact that Christianity was first accepted by the poor and unlearned. But apparently it was constantly being improved, and that which St. Augustine speaks of with approbation as fairly representing the originals was probably a revised text. The Old Testament was translated from the Septuagint; and as its place was taken at the end of the fourth century by Jerome's version, the Vulgate, and as it then dropped out of use, and was subject to no other changes, it is of great value for critical purposes, though necessarily to be used with caution.

The greatest of the Latin versions, and that which ranks with the Septuagint and Syriac as one of the three chief authorities for the text of Holy Scripture, is the Vulgate. From the constant blunders and uncritical emendations of scribes, the Vetus Itala had become corrupt, and in A.D. 383 Damasus, Bishop of Rome, urged upon that great scholar St. Jerome the task of correcting it. He began by collating the New Testament with the Greek, and correcting the numerous errors which had crept into it. But the work grew upon him, and he saw that the Old Testament also needed correction, and that the Septuagint was not always itself an accurate translation. For, fortunately, years before, when leading an ascetic life in the desert of Chalcis, whither, however, he had taken with him his library, he had made the acquaintance of a converted Jew, living there as a hermit, and had learned from him enough Hebrew to enable him to collate the Septuagint with the original. Leaving Chalcis, he continued his studies at Constantinople in A.D. 381, and became more fully aware of the many deficiencies of that translation; while in the Greek versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, made in the second century, he found translations far more exact, which he carefully studied at Rome in A.D. 382—385, making use of many learned helps, and especially of the Hexapla of Origen. The effect of these studies was to make him feel that the Hebrew text ought to be carefully examined; and as he could obtain neither sufficient MSS. nor learned teachers in Italy, he determined to proceed to Palestine, as there alone he could procure not merely the books but the living help of the best scholars among the Jews, from whom he not merely perfected his knowledge of the language, visiting some of the Rabbins secretly, but even obtained their assistance and co-operation in rendering the Hebrew into Latin. So completely did he devote himself to the work, that he remained at Bethlehem for about twenty years, and not only made his version, but wrote numerous commentaries, from which we derive much information as to his method of making his translation, and the sources whence he obtained his information upon all difficult points.

This version had the honour of being the first book printed, and its value is inestimable. But, unfortunately, we possess it only in the editions of Popes Sixtus and Clement. It has been well said of it by a German scholar that we still have no edition of the Vulgate which answers to the demands of science; and that Protestantism alone can and ought to accomplish this work, already too long neglected. Unfortunately, while something has been done for the Septuagint, and something even for the Peshitta Syriac (though very little) in Dr. Lee's edition, printed by the Bible Society, nothing has been done at present for the Vulgate; and our Bible Societies, instead of combining to give us a scholarly edition of Jerome's grand work, quarrel over the minor point of whether they ought to circulate among the Latin nations a Bible which has many corrupt readings. We may at least bear in mind that it was Wycliffe's translation of the Vulgate which lit up and kept burning for so long in this land the lamp of Scriptural truth.

And thus for the Old Testament we have the Septuagint, the Syriac, and the Vulgate. For the Septuagint we have the Vetus Itala, and the Gothic of Ulphilas. For the New Testament we have not only all these, but many more, representing countries very remote and independent of one another. And in this triple cord of testimony—from ancient MSS., from quotations in the writings of the Fathers, and from versions made at very early dates—we have superabundant evidence, not merely for the text of the Bible, but also for the genuineness and high authority in the Church of the books thus quoted, and rendered into so many tongues. They would not have been so generally received and honoured in countries so distant from one another unless they had from the first been known to be the authentic writings of the Apostles and Apostolic men, and had been regarded as the authority for the doctrines believed and taught in the Church. And on such full evidence our faith may be content to rest; and we may heartily thank God that He has so guarded the Holy Scriptures, which give us the knowledge of His will, that the possibility of error is confined within the narrowest limits, and that witnesses from so many lands, and in so many tongues, proclaim, "This is God's Word, and herein we have the proof of all that is necessary for salvation."

THE CAPTAIN'S LESSON.

BY THE HON. KATHERINE SCOTT, AUTHOR OF "MISS BROWN'S DISTRICT," ETC. ETC.

"Life is not only play,
But school-days to us all; the world is not our holiday."

THE afternoon sun was making Rake School scorching, and Mrs. Ellis was longing quite as much as her scholars for the church clock to chime four.

She was ashamed of the number of times she had looked at it, and at the first preliminary creak which heralded the strike she rang her bell, and opened the harmonium for the usual hymn.

The children were all on their feet in an instant, and the necessary banging of desks and clatter of putting away slates was speedily got through.

"Hymn beginning—

"We are but little children weak," gave out Mrs. Ellis, and the children started. The harmonium groaned as harmoniums are wont to do, and the children, tired and hot, sang so wand'ringly that the last line of the third verse,

"A weary war to wage with sin," sounded very weary indeed.

Mrs. Ellis's back was to the door, so she did not hear the click of the handle, and was startled by a man's melodious voice—

"When deep within our swelling hearts;"

and louder and cheerily came—

"Then we may stay the angry blow,
Then we may check the hasty word,
Give gentle answers back again,
And fight a battle for our Lord."

The children were all attention now, and every little face was watching the singer, and carried on by his voice.

It was "The Captain," and it was thoughts of the Captain which had made the afternoon school so interminably long to both mistress and scholars.

He had keen blue eyes and a very freckled face, and he was standing now just inside the door in his undress uniform, with his cap in his hand. He stepped forward as the hymn ended.

"Mrs. Ellis, I've just looked in to say good-bye to you and the children. We're off to-morrow, you know."

"Yes, Captain, so we heard, and we wondered if we should get a sight of you again."

"Oh! I couldn't go without that; besides, you know, I have some treasures to deposit safely at the Rectory," and the Captain's smiling face was clouded for a moment, and then he looked round cheerily.

"Little ones and big ones, I am off to Egypt to-morrow, and I've come in to wish you good-bye, and to leave you all my good wishes and this advice. Be obedient, be brave, be tender. You know I am off because my Queen and my country send me, and I shall have a lot of hard work to do before I see you again, if God bring me safely back, but by God's help I will do it, for it is my profession, which I am bound to follow; and you girls, you have a lot of work to do too, so don't you shirk it, dawdling over your copies and your spelling, and getting out of temper with your needles and your thread, and grumbling over a bit of scrubbing and hard work; remember that 'the courage to dare and the courage to bear' are one and the same, so don't you big girls cry over the newspapers when you read of brave deeds, and sulk when your mistresses give you a few hard words and a bit of hard work. And, my children, be tender to one another; let all those hands be tender, let all those tongues speak gently. And remember that I in Egypt, and you in this dear home, are all in one Captain's keeping, all in His army, so we must bear all, do all for 'Jesus' sake.' Good-bye, Mrs. Ellis; good-bye, good-bye!" The Captain was off as suddenly as he had come in, and the children dispersed in rather a subdued mood. The Captain was the Vicar's son, and his visits to the village were always hailed with delight, for he came like a fresh bracing breeze, and left a healthy cheerfulness behind him which seemed to put new life into everyone. This time he was leaving the best part of his own life behind, and there was a general sympathy for the old Vicar and the Captain's mother, but very specially for the sunny-haired young wife and the baby girl who was just learning to toddle. Mrs. Ellis was pouring out her husband's tea with rather a grave face that hot afternoon, and Mr. Ellis himself was very silent.

"John, did you have the Captain in at your school this afternoon? and what did he say to you and your boys?" John seemed very much preoccupied by the sugar at the bottom of his cup.

"Eh! what, my dear? The Captain? Oh, yes, we did have him. But come now, Annie, you're not given to feminine curiosity, and I shall not tell you what he said to me and my boys, nor ask what he said to you and your girls. Depend upon it, if you and yours practise what he preached, and I and my boys do the same, you'll find out in due time what it was. Not that the Captain's few brave words can be called preaching, but they are like a trumpet-call to rouse us."

"True, they are indeed! and I'll ask no more, but try and do my part;" and Mrs. Ellis smiled at her husband from behind her teapot and was silent.

At last Mr. Ellis remarked—

"There's a chance of seeing the Captain with his detachment of the regiment to-morrow morning."

"The Captain and his soldiers!" inquired Mrs. Ellis eagerly. "Oh! I shall like to see that! What time will it be, John?"

"Most likely about nine in the morning, but he wasn't sure. I should like to see him myself, and I'd have gone to Portsmouth if I could have left the school. But there! I'm forgetting the first line of the Captain's lesson," and John rose, with a sigh and a laugh.

The nine o'clock school-bell was just giving its concluding "tins" next morning, when wafted on the fresh breeze came the strains of "The girl I left behind me," and down the hill past the Rectory, along the flat bit of road by the school, was heard the tramp, tramp of the soldiers, the Captain and his men. Every window in the little street had an outstretched head and hands; handkerchiefs and aprons were waving; not a boy in the place but was following, and Mr. Ellis stood scholarless at his gate.

Mrs. Ellis and her flock rushed out in time to have a nod from the Captain and a farewell look from the bright, kind face, and then the sharp turn in the Portsmouth road hid them from sight, the music died away, and the excited little faces looked very blank indeed.

Mrs. Ellis's eyes were full of tears as she shaded them from the bright morning sunshine in the vain endeavour to catch another glimpse, and then turned into the school, which to mistress and scholars at that moment looked exceedingly dull and prosaic.

She let the little tongues go for a while, and then the usual routine of lessons had to be gone through, leaving, as she thought would be best, any reminder of the Captain's farewell words till the close of school. The afternoon brought some "half-timers," who went out to little places in the morning and to school in the afternoon, and as it happened, these gave Mrs. Ellis an "opening" for her little discourse.

One girl from the Rectory and one from the little village shop, had very red eyes, and Ella Smith from the Rectory kept up so much chattering that Mrs. Ellis had to call her to order in stern tones. School ended, she began with rather a quaver in her voice at the thought of the cheery face here yesterday, and the aching blank at the Rectory home to-day.

"Now, girls, you remember the Captain's last words to us yesterday. I want you each to try and carry them out—not to-day only, but every day. Please God, he will be back again amongst us by-and-bye, and you know he will expect to find us each improved in some way, and each doing all 'for Jesus' sake,'" and Mrs. Ellis's voice was reverently lowered.

"Oh! please, ma'am," began Ella, "I have been thinking so much of the Captain to-day! I'm sure I've hardly been able to attend in school this afternoon."

"That you certainly have not, Ella," said Mrs. Ellis rather sarcastically.

"And this morning, ma'am, I cried till I felt quite ill, and missus she said I wasn't fit to take the little girl out, and I had to go and wash-up instead."

"And served you quite right too, Ella. I am ashamed of you! You at the Rectory, too! the very place where you ought to have tried most to be of use, crying and giving way like that! Child, you forgot your duty to-day."

"Oh! ma'am, but just think what my feelings were, seeing the Captain come and say good-bye to missus and the Vicar and the old lady."

"Feelings, indeed! why were your feelings to be shop, "it would be easier to be good if our work was not every day the same, and if we could now and then do some great thing that everybody would hear about, like they hear about the soldiers."

Mrs. Ellis turned more gently to Katie's wistful face, and a remembrance of the shop, with its peculiar mixed-up smell of calico, and candles, and soap, and thought of to-day? You've missed the very point of the Captain's lesson, if you've not understood that he meant you to serve faithfully always, forgetting yourself."

"Mrs. Ellis's eyes were full of tears as she shaded them from the sunshine."—p. 228.

"Well, I did feel it a privilege to be in the house, and I did do my very best the last few days while the Captain was there; and he said to missus he hoped I was going to do well and be a comfort to her."

"And because no one saw you to-day you neglected the plain work set before you, and missed being of use. I am ashamed of you, Ella!"

"Please, ma'am," began Katie Duncan from the cheese, and sugar, and the old shopkeeper and his fat wife, and errands here and there, and orphaned Katie grinding on in the same round every day, made her voice soft as she answered—

"Child, child! we all have visions of glory, and a very paltry sort of glory it often is! Try and remember that each man's, woman's, and child's work is given to each by God, and do it all, in sight of man or out of sight, for Jesus' sake, and you will by degrees find what true glory is."

The months had passed, and on a November Sunday the sun was struggling through the frosty London fog into a little room in one of the streets off Piccadilly, where lay the Captain. The pale gleams fell on the golden plaits of the Captain's little wife as, seated by the window, Bible in hand, she bent her head listeningly.

A plane-tree outside, with still a few leaves clinging to it, a black wall, and the back of an hotel, made up the view. The sun was doing its best to brighten it up, and suddenly fell full on the Captain's face, which at that moment was just where she did not wish it to go. But the Captain's ears were quicker than hers, and the distant murmur which had been puzzling her for some minutes had woke him, and lighted up his face before the sun reached it. The murmur was now a roar, a roar of cheering—swelling along Piccadilly, coming nearer and nearer.

"Some more of our brave fellows arrived! I wish you could see them, Elsie."

"Women laugh when they can, and weep when they will," might have been reversed for the Captain's wife as the roll of sound came clearer on the air, filling her heart with tears, while her face was brighter than the sunshine as she answered, "One brave fellow is enough for me!"

Battles are fought and won in dingy, out-of-the-way corners, more lifelong scars made than the world ever knows of, and rays of glory stream where human eyes see only furrows and wrinkles.

The Captain was fighting a fierce battle in his London lodging that Sunday morning, and winning, and the Captain's wife was fighting and winning too. Down Piccadilly marched the bronzed, thin soldiers, followed by crowds; the cheers came clear in the comparative quiet of the Sunday streets, and at last slowly died away. The two remained silent, till at last the Captain said gently—

"Thanks be unto God, who giveth us the victory through Jesus Christ, our Lord." He was not thinking of any earthly battle at that moment. Only that Divine Captain who was made perfect through suffering knew what two hearts had gone through in that half-hour, and what a struggle of will had been met and ended! No more marches, no more sharing of triumphs with the soldiers he loved, no medals nor decorations—probably not even an early death, but a lifelong imprisonment to a sick-couch! The Captain had been invalided home a short while before, and the doctors had given their verdict during this past week. This quiet Sunday morning, when all that might have been seemed swept before them, the meaning of it had been faced, and those few words were all that was said; but Elsie knew what they meant: knew that the next day's homeward journey to the little village would be a victorious march, and that the altered life was not to be a mournful one.

And, truly, while the beautiful sight was going on in London of the troops before the Queen—the thick fog enveloping all the splendour of uniforms and flags and decorations, and then suddenly lifting like a curtain, while the sun shone its brightest on the scene—in Rake School there was a beautiful sight too, and the sun shone even more brilliantly than on the Queen's Review!

Outside was a green archway decked with flags, and inside wreaths of green and bright autumn leaves and late chrysanthemums, and at the end of the room a large "Welcome Home," under which, on a couch, was the Captain, holding a reception.

Every soul in the place was there, and all eager to get a word from him. The Captain's smiling little wife and Mrs. Ellis presided over a long tea-table, and Mr. Ellis and his boys assisted. The Captain had a bright word for each and all, and, spite of his wasted look, the old bracing tone was the same. Even pale-faced Katie Duncan went home with a glad heart, for had not the Captain remarked, "Well, I hear some of you girls have been as much in the wars as I have, and have come out with flying colours. Courage, Katie; you are a good bit higher up in the ranks than when I last saw you!"

Old Mrs. Dyer, who was not so very old either, but always ill and suffering, had a warm grip, and felt she could bear her aches better with the Captain's kindly words, "Well, Mrs. Dyer, I have been put into the same regiment as you now! I only hope I may carry my new standard as cheerily as you do yours." Some of the boys were a little cloudy in their looks, and kept aloof; something troubled them, and the Captain's quick ears soon caught it:—

"I say, Joe, it would have been far grander if the Captain had been at the review to-day, and getting a medal."

"I was just thinking so; if he'd been wounded, now, and got some reward!"

"Far more glory about it," said a third, "than just lying there like any other sick man!"

John Ellis also heard, and turned with a pained look to silence the group, but the Captain's victory had been very complete, for there was no look of pain on his face, only an amused and quiet smile.

"It's the old story, Ellis: a little bit of outside glory! and it's no wonder they think so; but if I can help them by my shattered life to see that there are more ways to glory than one, and that the victory over sin and self is the highest, then it won't be in vain that I lie on this thing for the rest of my days!"

POPULAR PREACHERS OF TO-DAY.

AN INTERVIEW WITH THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A.—BY OUR SPECIAL COMMISSIONER.

JUST where the thickly built parish of Islington begins to blossom out into the trees and gardens and wider spaces of a pleasant London suburb lies the district of St. Augustine's, Highbury, the highly esteemed Vicar of which, the Rev. Gordon Cal-throp, has earned a fame far beyond the limits of his own neighbourhood as an earnest and eloquent preacher.

In some respects the district is typical. It is a new neighbourhood. During this latter half of the nineteenth century many of our large towns have been expanding more and more into prosperous suburbs, and St. Augustine's is in one of these. Twenty-five years ago it was a dairy-farm. To-day it is, in Mr. Calthrop's own expressive words, "a new colony let into the old parish of Islington." A peculiarity is that it has no poor; the inhabitants are for the most part sensible, practical, well-to-do English people having business in the City, with a proportion of lawyers and doctors. Also there are an increasing number of Jews of the higher class, —cultivated and well-informed—and Mr. Calthrop has had the pleasure of baptising some of these at different times into the Christian faith.

Commencing with an iron church, which the then owner of the property placed on the estate, Mr. Calthrop has in twenty-three years built up a noble structure holding a congregation of thirteen hundred people, and having also a beautiful church-room for week-evening and social gatherings, capable of accommodating five hundred attendants. There is no endowment; it is a pew-rent church, with a sufficient number of free seats always reserved.

How different this district from the average parish of fifty years ago! how different, again, even from the ordinary parish of to-day, be it in the heart of the country, in the crowded city slums, or in the comparatively isolated neighbourhood of a business centre from which the tide of population has long since passed!

And Mr. Calthrop has boldly adapted himself and his methods of work to the requirements of his neighbourhood. There being no poor in his district, he has led his church to stretch out a helping hand to the needier quarters of the large parish of Islington. He has a band of two hundred church-workers, who carry on the work of three large mothers'-meetings in different parts, attended, in the aggregate, by 525 women. Help is also largely afforded to the Rosemary Mission. Temperance work is going on, and even the policemen are not forgotten; while Mr. Calthrop himself has for long taken a prominent part in evangelistic work in the great city, preaching frequently in the theatres and halls. For ten years consecutively he preached on Sunday afternoons for a month at a time in Shoreditch Town Hall to an average congregation of 1,200 people, in addition to preaching morning and evening in his own church. These three sermons form a sufficiently hard day's work for anyone, and it is not surprising that his health at length gave way; and though better now, yet he is not able to renew such arduous labour.

Mr. Calthrop has made his home just on the borders of the new neighbourhood in which his district lies. The house is a large, roomy, somewhat old-fashioned building, of age-mellowed brick, with a fair-sized plot of ground and a carriage-drive in front, and, for London, a large and beautiful garden behind. This ground is walled around with trees and shrubs, so that in the summer the fair, smooth lawn stands in a bower of lovely foliage. It is a quiet, retired, and delightful spot, with the roar of the mighty city ever sounding around as a "background" to the quiet—dim, perhaps, but distinct. We may take it as a type of dwelling which is now, we fear, fast passing away. Built perhaps some seventy or eighty years ago, when prosperous merchants began to push for house-room beyond Islington, and before the rage for packing houses together almost as close as herrings in a barrel had seized our architects, there is about it and its neighbours a decided savour of an age that has past. There are several of such houses still to be found in some of what may be called the inner suburbs of London—different indeed from the modern productions of the speculative builder.

Entering, we are in a roomy hall, out of which Mr. Calthrop's study opens on the right in a new wing built to the old house. It is a light and cheery apartment, looking on to the front. Three comparatively small tables, heavily laden with books and reviews, some new, some old, are placed around the fireplace, over which hangs a charming painting. Mr. Calthrop usually writes at the table near the fire, and facing the door. Hard by is a tall, old-fashioned Cambridge reading-desk, and not far off a large screen covered with various pictures, near to which is a large harmonium; for the Vicar is very fond of music. Shelves of books deck the walls, and now and again, to add to the cosy, homely appearance, a favourite cat or dog might be seen on the hearth, for the family are fond of domestic animals.

Scattered over the house are evidences also of refined artistic taste, and a love of flowers and of nature. Numerous baskets of ferns of all kinds, from the delicate maidenhair to the glossy hart's-tongue, are to be seen; also glass vases, filled in this autumn season with rich red berries and leaves of lovely tint, sprigs of mignonette, or other flowers, last messengers of summer. The placing of these is no doubt the work of some of the daughters of the house. And when one is privileged to see Mr. Calthrop's genial face at the head of his own table, or hear him talking of his boys at Cambridge, or speaking of his daughter's paintings, one may get a clue to the secret of his remarkable success as a preacher and pastor for young people.

"I suspect the root of it all is sympathy," says Mr. Calthrop, when in a conversation with him we ventured to ask plainly what he considered to be the secret of winning young people. "I have long laid myself out to preach to them, and to children also. As a rule, the first Sunday night in every month I preach especially to the former, and on the second Sunday, in the afternoon, to children.

"I try to deal in a bold and manly way with the objections or difficulties which might rise in the minds of the young. I try to put myself in the place of those to whom I am preaching, and ask myself how they would regard the subject, or what they may need, and I try to adapt myself in that way.

"And, then, we have here, at home, a young men's meeting once a month. This is a private affair; of course we cannot have a large number at once, but it is conducted in a somewhat peculiar way, and the young men themselves take a large part in it. We always have tea together first, and then short papers are read, perhaps a little discussion follows, and then I, as president, close with a few words. These meetings enable us to retain the influence over them one gets in Confirmation. My point is in my work to make the spiritual element my chief concern. The papers read are mostly on religious subjects, and it is a nice homely meeting.

"Another interesting feature is a Ladies' Training Class. We have several young ladies who are training for medical missions, Zenana work, and Home Mission work. I take a class with them.

"I also believe much in Bible-classes, and have several. But a bright spot in my work is the Communicants' Union. I wish everybody would adopt one! We hold the meeting once a month in the church-room, which has an organ in it, and get a large number. It is very successful. We call it the Communicants' Union for Prayer and Work, and the rules and objects are copied and adapted from those used by Dr. Thorold, the present Bishop of Rochester, when at St. Pancras."

We need not set these forth in detail. It will be sufficient to say that those persons who communicate at the church not less than three times yearly, and sincerely desire "to live for the glory of God and the advancement of the Redeemer's Kingdom, are eligible as members." Among the objects are "to promote a closer unity among us, to deepen the spiritual life of the people of God, and to sustain the faith of young disciples."

Though purely religious, the meetings are held more or less informally, and they afford an opportunity for hearing other clergymen, who perhaps could not come on Sunday; among those who have attended being Archdeacon Richardson and the present Bishop of Melbourne. The service usually consists of prayer and singing, and half-an-hour's address. Special subjects for prayer are mentioned, these being sent to the president, Mr. Calthrop, by the Saturday previous to the meeting.

In addition, the work of the church includes a Sunday-school of the children of the congregation, meetings of the Workers' Unions, Congregational Conversations, Lectures, etc., there being generally "something going on."

Mr. Calthrop, also, is Whitehead Professor at St. John's Hall,

Highbury, where young men are trained for Holy Orders. This duty is that of lecturer on pastoral theology, and training them in sermon-writing and the delivery of sermons.

"What would you say, then, Mr. Calthrop—should a man write his sermons, or preach extempore?"

"Both. He should be able to do both. Unless he is an exceptionally gifted man, he should certainly write sermons almost as long as he can write; but he should also be able to speak extemporaneously. Now, when I was Select Preacher at Cambridge, I carefully wrote out my sermons; but when I preach in the theatres, why, a bit of paper would spoil the effect. If a man acquire a fatal facility of language he is played out in a few years. He becomes tempted to give words instead of ideas. But the writing of sermons keeps a man within bounds, and improves his style. And he must not depend on memory. I could tell at once if a man were delivering a discourse memoriter. A preacher can deliver a sermon from MS. in such a lively, striking way, that no one could know. Public readers do so. Natural capacity will do much for a man, but the average man—I mean, if he practise well—can do so also. For him, a mixture of the two styles is the right thing."

"And what kind of sermons do you think the most effectual?"

"Well, for myself, I always try to avoid what may be called the merely technical theological language as much as possible; but, mind, I endeavour to speak in such a plain, straightforward way that there may be no mistake about the doctrine."

"The whole secret of the difficulty of a preacher is to be able to put himself into the place of the hearers and to see things as they see them. People are intelligent, and up in the literature of the day, and I ask myself, 'How shall I put so-and-so to my people?'"

"Then there should be variety in pulpit ministrations—the variety there is in the Bible itself. Descriptive sermons and doctrinal sermons both have their place. And I have found character sermons most effective."

But Mr. Calthrop is able to adapt himself to his audience with wonderful versatility. Not only is he successful with his own intelligent hearers, and in the theatres of the many-peopled city, but he is equally at home with the rustic audiences of rural churches. To these he preaches every year, generally going to "out-of-the-way" neighbourhoods, deep in the heart of the quiet country, where perhaps for centuries, while changes have been wrought all round, the grey old church has stood serene and still, and the steps of the worshippers have year after year pressed the same path to the church door. Mr. Calthrop has been successful in these quiet parishes also, even if we judge only from the numerous and pressing requests "to come again."

In person Mr. Calthrop is spare, about the middle height, with the mobile, expressive face of the orator—which he keeps close-shaven—and a crown of beautiful white hair. As he speaks, his whole soul seems to enter into the subject, and varying expressions suitable to the words flit over the face, and the gestures of hands and arms move also in unison. These gifts are all characteristic of the orator, and have no doubt conduced to his great success as a lecturer as well as preacher. Sometimes he has received from thirty to forty applications for lectures in one session. But his health has not permitted him of recent years to engage so much in this work. One of his very successful lectures was entitled "Veneer and Success," another was "Money"; "Little Things," "Newspapers and Novels," and "Egypt," are also among his subjects, his object being, as he himself expresses it, to convey important truth in a homely way.

He has used the pen also, and many of his papers have appeared in the pages of THE QUIVER; some volumes of his sermons have been issued, a volume of Family Prayers, and a little publication for young people, "From Eden to Patmos." Another successful book has been "The Gospel Year."

Mr. Calthrop was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, a remembrance of which may perhaps be seen in the drawing-room, in the shape of a cushion marked with the insignia of the College, and also in the study the tall, old-fashioned Cambridge reading-desk, which he was wont to use "as a youngster."

He took a first-class in the classical tripos, and became Scholar and Chaplain of Trinity. Ordained in 1851, he was appointed incumbent of Trinity Church, Cheltenham, in 1858, and six years afterwards came to St. Augustine's, of which he is the first incumbent. Twice has Mr. Calthrop been Select Preacher at Cambridge—in 1857, and again in 1874, and he has also preached in St. Paul's Cathedral, Westminster Abbey, and the Chapel Royal, Savoy.

But he seems equally at home wherever he may have to preach, on the boards of the large theatre, under the fretted roof of the grand cathedral, in the quiet of the old country church, or to his own large congregation of St. Augustine's; for above all he is a man in earnest, and strives to speak out from the heart to the heart.

SHORT ARROWS.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

THE "BUSINESS BOYS" OF LONDON.

"He was sent to one of these Homes."

A CLERGYMAN who took charge in bygone days of a prison to which erring apprentices were brought, and who used to converse with the lads in private so tenderly, so earnestly, that they would breakdown as he spoke, and falter out the story of temptation and weakness, stated that from the apprentices themselves he gathered that in nine cases out of ten they fell through "suppers and cigars." These lads, when work was done, were in the past thrown much upon their own resources for recreation; and one whose father gave him pocket-money would treat his companions, who, in their turn, paid for the smoking and drinking, but, having no money, gradually began to "borrow" from the property of their employers. The boys in whom Mr. Shrimpton, of 33, Lincoln's Inn Fields, is so earnestly interested—the Working Boys for whom Christian love is now providing Homes—are of a different class from the apprentices of past years; but still many errand and office boys appear in London police-courts; and others are quietly dismissed for dishonesty, the master forbearing to prosecute. Bad company and the lack of happy home-influences have been the cause of many a boyish downfall; in these Homes, the idea is to help those who help themselves—to take certain payments from the lads, according to their earnings, and to surround them with friendly, recreative, and instructive influences. At present, eight Homes are being carried on in various parts of London. We read of one inmate who came up from Essex with a penny in his pocket; the police took him to the workhouse, whence he was sent to one of these Homes; for the workhouse guardians of several unions thoroughly appreciate this good work, and find it a help and blessing.

"THE QUIVER" HEROES FUND.

We have received the following letter from Dr. Gabb, of Guildford, to whom one of our silver medals was awarded for an act of bravery reported in our November issue:—"GUILDFORD, November 1st, 1887.—DEAR SIR,—At the annual dinner given by the Corporation to the Mayor on the 26th of October, I was unexpectedly presented by his Worship with the silver medal of THE QUIVER Heroes Fund. Will you please accept yourself and convey to your readers my thanks for the honour you have conferred upon me?—I am, dear Sir, very faithfully yours, J. PERCY A. GABB."

"ONE MARTYR MORE."

The days of persecution are not past for ever—"Truth has one martyr more;" and the story comes to us from Eastern Turkey, communicated to the Turkish Missions Aid Society by their correspondent. "Is it not time," asked a Christian speaker, "to undertake a work among the Moslems—though it may be inaugurated in blood and bitter persecution?" The infidel in many districts is despised and hated, but nevertheless the Eternal Kingdom is gathering subjects in, even from the Mohammedan race. Hussein, a converted Turk, was baptised at his earnest request; knowing his danger, he said he would die for Christ if need be. He underwent bitter persecution, and at last was carried into exile by two mounted soldiers, being fastened to a stirrup. Dragged along, weary, footsore, he asked if he might rest; when he paused, a soldier went behind and fired, but the ball only grazed his shoulder. "Do not shoot me in the back," said Hussein, turning round, "fire at my breast; I am not afraid to die." Strange to say, they at last let him go home, and now he dwells at peace; but, on the lonely plain, Hussein had bravely witnessed to God and man that the spirit of the martyrs, "baptised in blood," is living to this day.

SOME SEASONABLE GIFTS.

Children love pictures, and no gift-book is more acceptable to them than one well and abundantly illustrated. "The Sunday Book of Story and Parable" (Hodder and Stoughton) is just such a book as children love, and would certainly please any little one as a Christmas gift or prize. "Streamlets of Song" (Nisbet) is another work intended for children, and consists of a selection, collected by her sister, of the poems by Frances Ridley Havergal best adapted for child-use. We trust that these "Streamlets" may find their way into many a heart and home. The same sister to whose loving care we owe this collection has edited the interesting autobiography of another member of her talented family, Maria V. G. Havergal, which is also published by Messrs. Nisbet. "Sunday Sonnets" (Blackfriars Publishing Co.) is a collection of very pretty sonnets, one for each Sunday in the year, by Miss E. M. Alford, a daughter of Dean

Alford, and a contributor of verse to our own pages. Of all the pretty gift-books issued by Messrs. Hildesheimer and Faulkner, none are more tasteful than "The Star of Bethlehem," a collection of poems by our old friend Mr. Frederic E. Weatherly, illustrated by Ellen Edwards and J. C. Staples. Space would fail us to describe all the beauties of Messrs. Hildesheimer's works, but we must call attention to a little series of booklets, two of which—"The Dream Star" and "The Christ Child"—seem to us peculiarly adapted for Christmas souvenirs. And among the many beautiful cards issued for this season by this firm we notice some exquisitely executed designs by Alice Havers, Ernest Wilson, and B. D. Sigmund, accompanied by really appropriate verses and greetings. We are glad to notice this return to the better practice of acknowledging in our greetings of friends at this season the true meaning and import of Christmas. For preachers and teachers Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton have issued a most useful work in "Studies in the Life and Character of St. Peter," by the Rev. H. A. Birks. In "Unfinished Worlds," published by the same firm, we have a veritable mine of information as to the "other worlds" of the planetary system. All that the telescope and spectroscope have taught us of these wonders of the heavens the author, Mr. S. H. Parkes, has collected for us, and told in a popular style, easily understood by all. The plates which illustrate this work are marvels of clearness. "The Goodness of God" is the title of a series of sermons by the Rev. Absalom Clark, and published by Mr. Elliot Stock, containing some very beautiful parallels and analogies. A story by Miss Doudney, whose serial, "Miss Willowburn's Offer," none of our readers can have forgotten, is always sure of an audience. Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton have just issued "A Son of the Morning," from her pen, and we confidently recommend the work to our girl-readers. The same publishers send us "The Willoughby Captains," a capital story for boys, by Mr. Talbot Baines Reed.

BIBLE-CLASSES FOR ADULTS.

"The longer we have read the Bible, the more simple and intelligible it becomes to us," said two Chinese students, "until at last it seems as though Jesus Himself talked with us." Hard as they had studied the sacred writings of the Chinese, their meaning had only appeared more vague and obscure. Wherever it be possible, let regular classes in connection with our congregations meet for Bible study; the cleverest mind cannot hope to dive to the depths of the Word of God on this side of eternity, but here even the humblest will be refreshed and strengthened and blessed. We heard of an Irish priest who discouraged one of his flock from Bible-reading because he could not possibly understand the Scriptures; but Pat replied: "If I cannot understand them, how can they harm me? and if I can, they must do me great good." Bible-classes for adults are a great deal more difficult to manage than the Sunday-school class; but, on the face of it, it is a grand thing to gather young men or maidens during the turmoil of the week for the quiet study of God's Word; and even if failure seem to be written at last upon the effort, it is failure in name only, and more blest than many a so-called success. Let the class be of a sociable, home-like, conversational character, the members sitting not too far apart, or in little exclusive cliques; and let there be plenty of singing, the hymns being chosen by one of the group occasionally, in preference to the leader.

"A LIFE FOR A LIFE."

"Mother, where are the bad people buried?" asked a child, spelling out the epitaphs on the tablets and monuments around; everywhere she read nothing but praise—it would seem as though all the place held record of grand and noble lives. How often it happens that those who are departed seem to our eyes as heroes, but those who remain and still move amid us are unrecognised, unappreciated, unprized! We do not wish to leave it for Posterity to discern our present-day heroes; there are men—aye, and women too, for not so very long ago a maid-servant gave up her life for the rescue of others—who count their own comfort, their very existence secondary to the salvation of a fellow-creature. These are the heroes for whom our Heroes Fund exists—spirits who, like the brave fellow depicted in our frontispiece, do and dare anything to help the helpless, and bring life anew to the dying. Courage does not always mount to the occasion in times of danger; some lose all their presence of mind, some, while retaining their calmness, are prudently alive to the perils of risking self-injury. Well, prudence is a virtue of real worth, but there are times when we feel constrained to cry of boldness and daring—

"Better the excess

Than the defect; better the more than less."

human nature after all loves and exalts the men who, while others are debating, plunge to the rescue. And even so it is in Christian work; arguing, debating and philosophising concerning evil go on by the side of the brink of sin and sorrow, but the Christ-like at Farningham have been known to them for years, and they have helped to collect the wherewithal to keep the three hundred lads sheltered there in health and happiness. There are two hundred more at Swanley, towards whose support their own friends contribute twenty pounds a year; but Farningham is for the utterly homeless little lads, and many and varied are the life-tales of the wanderers that here have found help and rest. We hear of one little fellow, not four years old when his stepfather left him, chilled and emaciated, on a damp floor on purpose that he might die; of another, whose parents were souls are those that at any cost go right in by the side of the sinking brother, and give their all of fervent strength to rescue the perishing and uphold the weak.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. MARK.

Dean Chadwick's latest work is a distinct gain to expository literature. No one can read this commentary on the "Gospel of St. Mark" (Hodder and Stoughton) without gathering something that he has not learned before. Dr. Chadwick's observations on the Transfiguration are bold and suggestive, and the little excursus on "The Characteristics of the Twelve" is delightful reading. The author's style and method are, however, so well known and appreciated by our readers, that they will need no formal introduction on our part. All ministers and Sunday-school teachers would be the richer in storage for this masterly exposition of the Gospel.

A LITTLE BOYS' VILLAGE.

Many of our Sunday-scholars and young friends will easily locate the Little Boys' colony; the Homes killed by lightning, while he, sleeping beside them, was spared; and of yet another sent from over the seas by a British consul, his father having been sentenced to die as a military prisoner by Marshal Lopez, President of Paraguay. Again and again comes the story—too familiar, alas! to all whose hearts are open to the cry of need—of drink and dissipation; but innocent children must not suffer for the transgressions of their fathers, and some of the boys have been taken from homes thus ruined, to this institution, where the training is based on the Word of God, and carried on for the Master's sake. We are told that the young folks live on food plentiful but simple; they have butter with their bread on Sundays alone, but of the staff of life there is abundant and appetising supply, about 36,000 quarter loaves being turned out by the boys every year, with 800 buns for Good Friday, and about 1,000 lb. weight of cake for high days and holidays! The lads are their own bakers, printers, tailors, shoemakers, engineers, etc., taking their turn in school and at work; they live in little families, and while "mother" looks after their well-being in various ways, "father" teaches the boys some trade in one of the workshops. The Yorkshire merchants have provided a school, fitted with all necessary appliances, and there is also a chapel, whither on Sundays from every home the boys come up, looking a picture of neatness in their comfortable array. We may add that the Farningham boys have an excellent band, which performs at meetings throughout the country, and Swanley possesses the "Orphans' Choir" which obtained the first prize in the choral competition held in 1884 at the Crystal Palace; the Rev. A. O. Charles, of Bank Buildings, Ludgate Circus, will gladly give all desired information as to these twin Homcs.

THE WAILING PLACE.

THE WAILING PLACE.

To our mind, one of the most thrilling expositions in Miss von Finkelstein's Oriental lectures is her description of the Jewish "Wailing Place," where, with covered heads, and smiting upon their breasts, the children of Israel gather periodically to confess their forgetfulness of God, their sins, and their shortcomings. She asserts that the most careless observer could not fail to be moved and stirred by the pleadings of the race that seems to have sunk so low. The Turkish passer-by may sometimes jeer, and the down-trodden Jew takes the jest silently, but still the prayer goes up like a universal wail, the pathos of which must hush all thought of any strange and ludicrous element noticed by unaccustomed eyes. "Oh, Lord! we have sinned, we sit solitary, we sit solitary!" again and again like a minor strain goes up the wailing cry to Heaven, and then, in the midst of the confession, there comes ever and anon a soft, sweet "Hallelujah" echoing from lip to lip. Will these prayers go up to God in vain? while they are yet praying, is He not answering? Day by day the ranks are strengthening of those who labour and strive to bring the "glad tidings" to Israel. May each of us take part in bringing about the fulfilment of the Jews' supplication for mercy, and uplift the all-pardoning Messiah, Who shall make the solitary places to blossom as the rose.

THE LIBRARY SHELVES.

Where are the Sunday-school officers who do not find their library shelves difficult to keep in order? Old favourites become worn out with much service, and must be replaced, and there is a constant demand, especially in these winter months of long evenings, for new books. To those who are on the look-out for such works, we commend the Rev. J. Wilkins's "Daily Life and Work in India" (T. Fisher Unwin), which gives an admirable picture of the life both of natives and Anglo-Indians, and explains the needs of the country, and points to the only way of meeting them by spreading the Gospel far and wide over the land. Another little volume, somewhat similar in character, is also before us in "Eminent Workers for Christ," by the Rev. A. W. Murray, published by Messrs. Nisbet and Co. Mr. Murray briefly sketches the lives of eight devoted men and women who gave up their lives to the spread of Christ's Kingdom, the most interesting biography perhaps being that of Miss Fidelia Fiske, who did such noble work in Persia. From the same publishers come four stories which we can do little more than mention, and commend to the notice of Sunday-school librarians, and those who are seeking for suitable gift-books at this season. First is "Primrose Garth," by our old friend the Rev. J. Jackson Wray, author of "Nestleton Magna," a pretty little tale of country life. "Mistress Matchett's Mistake" is another story by the ever-popular Emma Marshall, well adapted for girls. "Stephen Gilmore's Dream" and "Both Sides" are two pretty little tales by Jessie W. Smith, conveying under telling narratives excellent teaching. "The Story of Stephen Marbeck" (also issued by Messrs. Nisbet) is a clever story of the well-known Windsor organist who suffered much for his faith. The biographer of the American Presidents, Mr. W. M. Thayer, tells us in "The Boy without a Name" (Hodder and Stoughton) the story of a boy who, poor and friendless at first, made a position for himself in after life as teacher and preacher. "Cost what it May" (same publishers) is a pretty story of the days of our great Civil War. We need say no more about it to readers of THE QUIVER than that its author is Mrs. Hornibrook. Of books for prizes, none could be more suitable than Dr. Macaulay's "Wonderful Stories of Daring, Enterprise, and Adventure" (Hodder and Stoughton). "Cyril Daneley" (Elliot Stock) is another story which well deserves attention at this season.

FLOWERS IN WINTER.

Does the glory of the year ever wholly fade? People call the vegetable kingdom dead; certainly the "ferns are tucked away," and the seeds are covered, but there are flowers alive even now, preaching of deathless Mercy and Remembrance. Did not the poet immortalise the daisy he found on Christmas Day, the little blossom that had known the year's smiles and tears, and that God had preserved through all? There, trembling to the winter wind, it bloomed and smiled, like those brave, patient hearts that in lonely places just do the little they can do for the Master's glory, leaving to Him their circumstances and the appointing of their ways. And then there are the star-like Christmas roses shining out across the beds where the summer flowers are sleeping, and in some parts "golden rod" and laurestinus are rising in their beauty—not to linger over the remembrance of a throng of loveliness in many a conservatory, whereby home after home and sick-beds and the abodes of sorrow are garlanded with radiance at this time, that is called Nature's death. God, the Good, is everywhere, and will never leave His children to be desolate; such is the teaching of these winter blossoms, prophesying with their "voiceless lips" of the Resurrection which is so sure alike for the natural and spiritual, when that which seems slumberous and forsaken now shall break forth into joy.

GOOD NEWS FROM WINCHESTER.

Some would paint cathedral cities as the abode of fossilised dignity, and resisting the tide of life and energy and progress; such should find out what is going on at Winchester, whence, on lines new and old, the Soldiers' Home Mission, carried on by Miss Perks, has extended its operations now over an area of some fifteen miles around. In addition to the soldiers themselves, many civilians, mostly converts of this mission, are united as a Band of Workers, and, by preaching, music, singing, etc., they all seek to do something for the Lord; then their wives and sisters form a Women's Bible and Prayer Union, and visit the sick, or distribute Gospel tracts, and influence their neighbours for good. Many servants belong to this union, and Miss Perks remarks that she is greatly cheered by the testimony of their employers as to their consistency and high principles. Nor are the children forgotten; they are continually instructed in Bible truth, and thus prepared to take the places of those working for God to-day. "In the country districts around," says Miss Perks, "the anxiety for the Gospel is even greater than in the towns; the honest inquiries after truth are many and constant, and the blessing very great and uninterrupted."

"They seek to influence their neighbours for good."

BOOKS TO BE READ.

All preachers and students know the value of Dr. Cunningham Geikie's "Life and Words of Christ." We are glad to see a new edition of this most useful work has recently been issued by Messrs. Cassell at a price which should enable many to acquire it who have not hitherto been able to do so. We strongly commend this work to those who are seeking a suitable prize for a senior class. "The Palace Beautiful" (Cassell) is a pretty story for girls, told by L. T. Meade, the well-known author of "Scamp and I" and "The Fortunes of Duncuft," which appeared in our pages. In "Short Studies from Nature," issued by the same publishers, we have a collection of essays on various natural phenomena by writers admirably qualified to instruct us on the topics upon which they write. Students will find that this book, which is quite popular in style, conveys many lessons of the wonderful provision the Almighty has made for some of the smallest and least understood of His creatures. "The Life and Times of Queen Victoria" (Cassell), the first volume of which has just been issued, is a very thorough and admirably illustrated history of Her Majesty's reign. The volume before us carries us down to 1858, and therefore covers the eventful period of the terrible Crimean War and Indian Mutiny, as well as the never-to-be-forgotten Great Exhibition of 1851.

"THE QUIVER" WAIFS.

Dr. Barnardo writes to us as follows, respecting one of our Waifs:—"Your little protégé, Willie Rush, is, I am glad to say, quite well, and getting on satisfactorily in every respect. As perhaps you may know, he has been boarded out at a very nice home in the country." A list of further subscriptions will be found on page 234.

DR. MACLAREN ON SABBATH WORSHIP.

Dr. Maclaren's contribution to the "Expositors' Bible" (Hodder and Stoughton) consists in a careful, scholarly, and suggestive commentary on St. Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon. We commend the book to our readers, whether teachers or taught, preachers or hearers. We feel especially grateful to Dr. Maclaren in these days for such a passage as the following on the religious observance of the Lord's Day:—"I distrust," he writes, "the spirituality which professes that all life is a sabbath, and therefore holds itself absolved from special seasons of worship. If the stream of devout communion is to flow through all our days, there must be frequent reservoirs along the road, or it will be lost in the sand, like the rivers of higher Asia." Mr. Charles Hoole's translation of the Epistles of Clement, Ignatius, Barnabas, and Polycarp (Rivingtons), has, we are glad to see, reached a second edition. Mr. Hoole has done his work as an editor with great care and ability, and we trust that by means of his excellent translations these, the most ancient of all Christian writings not included in the canon of Scripture, may become known and familiar to a far wider public than heretofore.

SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE READING SOCIETY.

Sir Walter Scott says of the Word of God, that the deeper we work this mine, the richer and the more abundant we find the ore. With a view to the furtherance of the habit—priceless for time and eternity—of daily Bible-reading, we propose to furnish our readers month by month with a list of selected passages, taking those for the morning from the Old Testament, and those for the evening from the New. Some of our friends, perhaps, may find it a hard matter to get time for the quiet perusal of the Scriptures; but we earnestly advise all, for their souls' sake, to make time. None of us can afford to lose the succour, guidance, power, and light that, by God's blessing, will reach us through the pages "bedewed with drops of love." And if sometimes a passage seem obscure, a text perplexing and hard to be understood, then we cannot do better than remember Mr. Spurgeon's counsel in cases of difficulty—"pray your way through!"

BIBLE READING PRIZE.

We advise each reader to set down each day (in a diary kept for that purpose) a note of the principal lesson or most striking reflection brought home by each portion. These notes should be brief; never exceeding fifty or sixty words, or they will fail of their special purpose. With a view to encouraging this useful practice, we shall be happy to award a handsome presentation Bible for the best selection of thirteen such notes (one from each week), to be copied by our readers from their notes on the quarter's course ending March 31, 1888. They must be certified as the sender's own by a magistrate or minister of religion. No copy can be returned. All copies must reach the Editor not later than April 16, 1888. If in the opinion of the judges no set of notes is worthy of a prize, the Bible may be withheld; on the other hand, if more than one set is considered worthy of a prize, more than one prize will be awarded. We suggest to our readers that they would do well to encourage all the younger members of their families and their friends to enter upon this profitable course of Bible study.

A NEW MISSION FIELD.

THE STORY OF THE NEW GUINEA MISSION.

BY F. M. HOLMES.

PORT MORESBY.

THE FIRST MISSION-HOUSE.

A LITTLE ship of only ninety tons—a mere speck on the sunlit southern sea—and far off a thick haze known to indicate land: such is the opening scene of the New Guinea Mission.

For on that ship were true British hearts possessed by the spirit which knows not when it is conquered; and with them—affording what was then, we believe, a unique sight—were trained native evangelists, able and willing to take part in missionary work. This characteristic has marked the mission in New Guinea from the first; that vast island is being evangelised mainly by native agents, trained, guided, and supervised by the missionaries of the London Missionary Society.

The project was commenced in 1871. In that year the Revs. Samuel McFarlane and A. W. Murray sailed in the Surprise from Maré, one of the Loyalty Islands, in the South Seas, with eight native evangelists, four from Maré and four from the neighbouring island of Lifu. The undertaking was commenced as part and parcel of the general plan of the Society to occupy new ground in the South Seas as opportunity offered.

The question was discussed in 1870 and preceding years. Now, to the north of the Loyalty Isles are the New Hebrides and Solomon Islands, but on these the Church Missionary and Presbyterian Societies were at work, while on New Caledonia the French would not permit English missionaries to labour. But the Society was comparatively rich in native agents, it being part of their policy to train such ministers and fit them for work among people of their own race. Towards the close of 1870, therefore, the Rev. S. (now Dr.) McFarlane, of the Lifu mission, received instructions from the directors to prepare for work on New Guinea—the great bulwark westward, as it might be called, of the South Sea Islands, and situate to the north and north-east of Queensland.

With the exception of Australia and Borneo, New Guinea is the largest island in the world. It was first discovered by the Portuguese in 1511; and the Dutch and English frequently visited the northern coasts during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Captain Forrest, who, in the service of the East India Company, was searching for spice-producing districts—dwelt at Port Dary, on the north-east coast, for some months, and kept up friendly intercourse with the natives, while Captain Cook visited the south-west coast in 1770. For many years he was almost the sole English authority on the natives of New Guinea. The native name of the island is Papua, supposed to be derived from a Malay word signifying "woolly."

Mr. McFarlane had no light task when he proceeded from Lifu in that little ship. The accounts he had obtained of the natives were contradictory, but most agreed in this—that the people were fierce and treacherous, and that intercourse with them was difficult. Under these circumstances, and from other information which could be obtained from whalers, and those engaged in trepang and pearl-shell fisheries, it appeared that an island in Torres Straits between Queensland and New Guinea, named Darnley Island, would be a suitable place from which to commence. Several captains recommended this spot, and, accordingly, for this island Mr. McFarlane shaped his course.

The little vessel reached Darnley Island about midday on the 1st of July, 1871. But it was two days previously—on the 29th of June—that the missionaries caught the first glimpse of New Guinea. Then a haze had hung over the land, but mountains were visible, and later one object after another appeared, until a barrier reef about two miles from the shore was seen. This part of Papua is on the south-east side, and forms a portion of the eastern peninsula.

As the little vessel neared Darnley Island, no natives were seen, but at length one man appeared on the shore. By signs, and a little broken English, conversation was commenced, and a few gifts won his confidence. He proved to be one of the principal men of the island, and rejoiced in the name of Dabat! Next day many natives appeared, and a service was held on board, in the language of Lifu. In all probability, writes Mr. McFarlane in the abstract of the account sent to the directors of the Society, it was the first act of worship to the true God that the natives had ever witnessed.

We can imagine the strange and striking scene;

THE "ELLENGOWAN."

the group of dusky natives crowding round the two stalwart white men on the deck of the little vessel; close by, the line of the rough boulder-strewn coast; above, the tropical sky; while beyond the sunlit sea was known to be the great "mainland" of Papua, the country, if reports were true, of fierce skull-hunters and cannibals. In such an enterprise these two white men would want something more than faith in human force and the "arm of flesh."

On the afternoon of that memorable Sabbath-day, —the first, it might be said, in the history of the mission—the two missionaries went on the island, and held a formal conference with the chiefs and people. The visitors explained their errand, and the natives were asked if they wished a teacher to live among them, and whether they would treat him kindly, and so forth. The conclusion was, that after some negotiations, and a brief delay, a teacher was left, and the little ship sailed away to Warrior Island, distant about fifty miles.

Now, at this island an event occurred of great importance. "It was one of those providential arrangements," wrote Mr. McFarlane, "we have often had to mark in connection with evangelistic efforts in Polynesia." The missionaries fell in with a civilised native belonging to the Tongan group, who had been over half the world. His real name was Joseph John, but he was familiarly known as Joe. He had been for six years in the British navy, and was well acquainted with the islands of the Papuan Gulf, and many parts of the New Guinea coast. He sympathised strongly with the natives, and with the missionaries' desire to evangelise them.

Joe led the expedition to several islands much nearer New Guinea than either Darnley or Warrior Islands, and he helped the missionaries to make friends with the natives. Services were held and teachers left, and on the evening of the first day on landing on the island of Tauan, the strains of the well-known hymn, "Jesus shall reign where'er the sun," rang out through the evening air, while close at hand stretched the great dark land of Papua, to the very threshold of which the ambassadors of the Cross had now been able to make their way.

It was not long after this that Mr. McFarlane visited New Guinea itself. Following Joe's suggestion, he landed at Katau, a populous village, where a fine river pours its great flood down to the sea. At first the natives seemed shy and suspicious. Some half-dozen watched the visitors cautiously, but when the Papuans recognised Joe and a young man from Warrior Island, who accompanied the expedition, confidence began to be shown. Soon friendliness was so much established that one of the principal men offered the strangers some food. The missionaries made two small presents, which appear to have given unbounded delight. These were umbrellas! The chief and one of the important men were given one each; but soon a difficulty checked their joy. They could not shut them when once opened. At last one knowing native found out the secret, and loud was the applause of his friends! A little trading was done by Joe and the captain of the vessel, and the chief agreed to receive a teacher, and he further said he would go to Tauan and see the agent left there.

And so a door was opened on the great island of Papua itself.

From that little commencement what mighty results have already sprung! Men and women who were cannibals then, are now civilised and Christian, and some have been taught so that they can teach others. And when not very long since the Hon. John Douglas visited the island, he was able to sit down and partake of the ordinance of the Lord's Supper with a number of native Christians in a native church.

After visiting Darnley and Warrior Islands again, and finding everything going well with the teachers left there, the Surprise stood over towards Papua again, and landed at a spot known as Redscar Bay, on account of the reddish colour of the cliffs. Here east point of Queensland, being adopted as the headquarters of the mission.

Meantime the next important step in the progress of the enterprise had been taken by the Rev. A. W. Murray, who returned in September, 1872, in the John Williams, with thirteen additional native teachers, and prepared to settle at Cape York. For the next two years from this date, Mr. Murray had sole charge of the mission, and visited the teachers on the various islands in Torres Straits, and explored the coast of Papua east of Redscar Bay as far as Port Moresby.

Early in 1874 the directors entered more fully into confidence was again established with the natives, and on the 7th of August the missionary's first visit to New Guinea came to an end.

Valuable work had been done in many respects. Doors had been opened for the prosecution of the mission; stations had been established, and knowledge had been gained. One of Mr. McFarlane's conclusions was that a small mission steamer for sailing between the barrier reef and the mainland, and for threading a way between the numerous islands of the Torres Straits and Papuan Gulf, was absolutely necessary; another important point was that the headquarters of the mission should be established outside the mainland of Papua, at a spot where the cupidity of the natives would not be excited, and where health could be maintained; for Mr. McFarlane had seen enough to warrant him in the belief that the climate was sickly. Mr. McFarlane now returned to England, and aroused interest in the great enterprise; Miss Baxter, of Dundee, offering £2,000 for such a vessel as he wanted; and upon his reading a paper before the directors of the Society in December, 1872, it was decided to prosecute the enterprise on the lines laid down by Mr. McFarlane—Cape York, the north-the question of the mission, with a view to its enlargement, and in the autumn Mr. McFarlane rejoined Mr. Murray, and took with him the Rev. W. G. Lawes. The extensive mission field was now divided into two parts, Mr. Murray taking charge of the Papuan or western branch, with Cape York as his headquarters; Mr. McFarlane superintending the eastern branch, extending from Port Moresby eastwards.

The Ellengowan, the vessel built by the gift of Miss Baxter, was now at work, and in it Mr. McFarlane explored the Baxter River and the Fly River. In 1875 the Rev. W. Y. Turner proceeded to the island as a medical missionary, and two years later the Rev. James Chalmers appeared on the scene, and from his energy and daring the mission received a great impetus.

During these years the natives were slowly gaining knowledge that the missionaries were very different from some of the white men who visited their shores. The very name of missionary came to be regarded in some districts as a password of peace. Difficulties from the sickness of the climate, from the scarcity of suitable food, and from the treachery of some of the natives, had frequently to be overcome, and they unhappily caused the death of not a few native teachers; but it is to be noted that as a rule the confidence inspired by the missionaries has been such that for the most part the natives have been friendly and confiding. To this rule there have been exceptions. The Rev. James Chalmers, whose name is so widely known in connection with the mission, has not unfrequently been in peril of his life. He has had much to do in pioneering work among the cannibals of the Papuan Gulf, for after a while Mr. Murray retired from active labour, and Mr. McFarlane and the Rev. Harry Scott, who arrived in 1883, have had charge of the school and institute established at the headquarters of the western branch, which was removed from Cape York to Murray Island, while Messrs. Chalmers and Lawes have had charge of the eastern branch, the headquarters of which are at Port Moresby.

The work of planting native teachers at suitable stations all along the Papuan Gulf, which is in the eastern branch of the mission, has therefore fallen in great part to the lot of Mr. Chalmers. Probably this pioneering work in New Guinea is unique. The missionaries often have to go in among a people of whom they never heard before, and whose temper frequently changes. For though well received one day, to-morrow the mood of the people may have changed. On one occasion Mr. Chalmers had landed at a village of about 2,000 inhabitants. He had fortunately obtained the name of the leading chief in the district, but "Tamate," as Mr. Chalmers is named by the natives, had to wait some time for his coming. At last he came; a very fine specimen of humanity he was, physically. The crowd made way for him, and he came up and stood before his visitor. Mr. Chalmers caught him by the elbow and put his other hand into the chief's hand, and the two men looked at one another. There is much in that first look. The intelligent savage, unaccustomed to books, can yet read faces, and apparently his reading on this occasion was satisfactory. He wanted Tamate to stay. But Mr. Chalmers wished to explore further, and discover if there were suitable places for teachers. So he could not stay then. He went on, proceeding through several villages, and receiving apparent kindness and giving presents. But on returning, the pioneers discovered that the temper of the natives had changed. Some of them seemed inclined to pick a quarrel with the visitors. Mr. Chalmers told the teacher who was with him to listen to what was said.

"They are disputing as to who shall have the honour of killing us," said the teacher.

"Keep steadily on as far as we can," replied Chalmers coolly.

But at last the teacher said, "Tamate, let us sit down and pray, and let them kill us then!"

"No, no," said Mr. Chalmers, "let us walk and pray!"

Presently the old chief they had met in the morning heard of what was going on, and came at once. He knocked down a man who was near Mr. Chalmers. Then a quarrel among the natives took place, and as they were now near the point where the boat was waiting, Mr. Chalmers threw a pound of beads among the natives to create a diversion, and then he and his followers, springing into the sea, swam out for the boat. Taking to the oars, the pioneers were soon able to stand away from the scene of peril, from which they had so providentially escaped.

Such scenes have occurred in the New Guinea mission. But in districts which have been for some time under the power of the missionaries, the condition of affairs is entirely changed. Smiling and happy villages now are seen; the people, peaceful and content, are practising various useful industries, while many of the Papuans themselves have been trained as teachers for their own countrymen. It was in 1883 that the first New Guineans were so set apart, at Murray Island, while shortly afterwards the same great result was accomplished at Port Moresby; five of these teachers were cannibals when Mr. Chalmers first set foot on New Guinea a few years before! There are now as many as fifty mission stations on the eastern branch, manned by South Sea Island teachers, whom neither the fear of murder nor malaria deters from volunteering for the work; while languages and dialects have been reduced to writing, and translations of the Scriptures made.

And thus the light of the Sun of Righteousness is breaking over this great land. Rich in natural beauty, amazingly fertile in certain districts, peopled with a fine race—or rather races, for such a vast land presents many varieties of the great human family—Papua seems destined to play a large part in the future history of that portion of the earth to which it belongs. The protectorate which Great Britain has established over a wide area also strengthens, if it were possible, the claim of New Guinea upon the British people. One of the most pressing needs of the mission now is, to establish stations along the banks of the Fly River, until the interior of the immense island to which it leads, now almost unknown, is quite opened up. But such work of extension requires both men and money. The policy of the Society is a noble one, well conceived, and well carried out. And it is succeeding. The enterprise and daring which have already won such conquests will triumph still. New Guinea is worth saving, and the Society mean, by God's grace, to save it.

CHAPTER XI.

PARTED.

"And to be wroth with one we love Doth work like madness in the brain."—COLERIDGE.

"IS this true, Hilda? I cannot understand it: I cannot take it in. Shall I waken presently, and find it is all some horrible dream?"

Stephen stood looking at Hilda with a dazed expression on his face.

It was the morning after that eventful drive which neither of them would ever forget.

"It is no dream," she said coldly. "It is true."

She was seated under the apple-tree in the garden where so many happy hours had been spent. Her deathly white face and trembling hands did not look like indifference, yet her voice was cold and hard. She did not raise her eyes to the young man's face, as he stood before her, tall and straight, looking at her downcast face with an angry, puzzled expression in his blue eyes, and with that upward line between his brows more marked than ever.

"I do not know what you mean," he repeated, in a dazed manner, like a man whose senses have been scattered by an unexpected blow.

"I have spoken very plainly," she said coldly.

"And you will have nothing to say to me? You refuse the love I offer you? You will not marry me?"

"I will not marry you," she replied. "But I did not say I would have nothing to say to you. I hope we shall continue friends."

"Friends!" he answered, with intense bitterness. "No, Hilda, we have gone too far for that. If you will not be my wife, I shall never see you again, I hope."

"You are cruel," she murmured. "I have done nothing to deserve that you should cast me off like this. We have been very happy together. I do not see why all our friendship is to be cut across short and sharp, just because I will not marry you."

"It is impossible that it should be otherwise—to me, at least, impossible, except on the condition that, being still your friend, I may hope in the end to be something nearer and dearer. Oh, Hilda! I can be most patient. I will wait for years if you say I must. But am I to have any hope?"

"No, none," she said. Then throwing aside the piece of work she had been pretending to do, she rose to her feet, and looked at him steadily. "I will never, at any time, consent to be your wife."

"You speak plainly now," he said, looking down at her with flashing eyes, and brows drawn in pain.

"It is best to speak plainly."

"Hilda," he interrupted, "tell me this. Do not think I want to worry or vex you; but remember, though this may be nothing more than a passing incident in your life, it is all and everything to me. Is it because of Mary Owens you refuse me?—because you think I should obey my father's wishes, and marry her for the sake of her money? Is it because of this you put me from you? Don't you know you are dearer to me than all the wealth in the world? Do you fear my father's anger? He will not be angry once he sees you—he may be, just at first, but never any more once he sees you. He will love you for your own worth, your own sweet truthfulness. And, even if he is angry for a time, I have money of my own he cannot touch nor take from me. It is not much: it is only three hundred a year. It would not give us many luxuries, but it would be enough; and I would work for you, and make it more; and even though poor, we should be together. I could make you happy, Hilda, if you would let me."

"There is no use in all this," she said, passing her hand wearily across her pallid face. "It is not for any of those reasons I refuse you. It is for a reason of my own, and a good one."

"May I not know what it is?" he pleaded, seeing a gleam of hope in this mention of a reason. It was better than the cold and downright "No" with which she had been meeting him at every point.

"No; I cannot tell you."

"That is sheer nonsense! You could tell me if you liked. You would not dismiss a servant as you dismiss me. You would tell him his fault, and wherein he had offended."

"This is not a parallel case," she replied. "Please do not torture me as you are doing. I cannot bear it!" clasping her hands together wildly. "It is unfair, unchivalrous of you! If I say I do not wish to marry you, is not that enough?"

"Quite enough. Only you did not say that before. You only said you would not marry me, and that you had some reason for deciding thus. Forgive me; I do not want to goad or torture you. I did not suppose you cared very much."

"I do care," she said, as he paused. "We have been very happy together. And it hurts me to give you pain."

"Hilda," he said, with a great light of tenderness in his blue eyes, "you must love me a little, if it hurts you to give me pain. May I ask you just one more question, before I go?—for I am going. Ungentlemanlike, cruel, unchivalrous as I may be, yet I will relieve you of my presence when you answer me this. Will you answer truthfully?"

"What is it?" she asked faintly.

"Will you answer truthfully?"

She bowed her head.

"Do you love me? A little—the least little bit in the world? You are sending me away from you for some reason, you say. Is it that you do not love me?"

She was trembling from head to foot. A rosy colour flushed up in her face as he spoke, and ebbed, leaving her more deathly white than before. She strove to speak, but her voice failed her, and died away.

"That is not my reason," she forced herself at last to say.

Stephen's eyes brightened. Perhaps he was nearer success than he had thought.

"That is not my reason," she repeated, holding up her hand warningly as he was about to speak. "Were that my reason, it is one that might be overcome, that might vanish—my reason is an insuperable one. It can never be done away with."

"If you love me, Hilda, no reason on earth shall part us," he began eagerly, seizing her cold hands in his strong, warm grasp.

"You will not be satisfied, then!" she said, in a tone of weary impatience. "You will persist in treating me as a silly girl who does not know her own mind! Very well, then, I have this other reason also: I do not love you."

"You do not? Oh, Hilda!"

"I do not."

She raised her grey eyes unflinchingly to his face.

Stephen was not naturally passionate, but something in the steel-like coldness of her attitude and manner roused him to wrath.

"Then I say you have been cruel to me—very, very cruel to me: more cruel than I thought the worst woman who lives had it in her nature to be. You have let me be with you day after day; I did not seek to hide from you what I felt for you. Everyone who saw us together must have seen that you were all the world to me—that I had given you my whole heart without reserve. Could you not have done something to show me? could you not have prevented me making shipwreck of my life? No; you went on letting me be daily with you, daily loving you more, until now my love for you is part of my very being, and will remain with me while I breathe. Then with a few cold, curt words you tell me to go. I have never touched even the outer margin of your heart: if you have a heart."

"Spare me!" she cried piteously, sobbing as if her heart were breaking. "I was wrong, I was wicked: but I was so happy, and I hoped all the time you did not really care for me; and yet I knew if you did that it must come to this."

"You knew it!" Stephen retorted, very cold and stern, towering high above the shrinking girl in his wrath. He had never spoken in all his life before to a woman in the harsh, contemptuous tone he used now to the woman he loved. "You knew it, and you let me love you; you let me believe you loved me; you let me hold you in my arms and kiss you!"

"I was weak; forgive me; I suffer most!" she murmured, still with her hands before her face.

"I confess I do not see how," he replied coldly.

"You have drawn out all the heart that was in me, all the love I had to give; my hopes, and plans, and dreams all centred themselves around you; and then you cast me off. You give me no reason, and you think, forsooth, for a few tears I shall forgive you. In return for my heart, you proffer me a tepid friendship. Friendship, indeed!—as if any friendship were possible between us! Oh, Hilda! why did you draw me on to love you? I ask you, why? Was it kind, was it just, when at the end of all you meant to discard me?"

His voice broke suddenly. He stood still awhile, with breast heaving convulsively, and his strong hands clenched in pain; then he turned away abruptly without another word, without so much as looking at the white face and strangely shrinking attitude of the girl he was leaving in anger, and left the garden. As he goes downwards to the house, he meets old Susan, who has come by invitation to spend the day with Hilda. It seems to him that centuries have gone over him, aging him, embittering him, destroying all that made life pleasant to him, since last he saw her comely, pleasant old face. And it was only yesterday, not four-and-twenty hours since,

"I was seeking you, sir, with this," she said, curtailing in good old-fashioned style, as she handed him a telegram. Stephen muttered an exclamation of thankfulness. He must go up to town at once. His father had been telegraphed for to Boulogne.

folding the slight, trembling figure in her great motherly embrace.

"Nothing," the girl answered, sighing wearily—so wearily; "only I am tired—and I think my heart is broken."

"What are you waiting for? Go!"—p. 252.

Mr. Owens had had an apoplectic seizure, and the doctors despaired of his life.

The old woman finds Hilda standing under the apple-tree, with white face, and fixed, staring eyes, despair stamped in every line of her figure, her hands hanging forlornly by her side. She has not stirred an inch from the spot where Stephen left her.

"My lamb, what is it?" cries the old woman,

CHAPTER XII.

A DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

"The fire if the flint shows not till it be struck."—SHAKESPEARE.

STEPHEN WRAY sat in his father's counting-house, on a high office-stool like any of the other clerks, but, unlike those gentlemen, devoting all his mind and thoughts to his occupation. A very remarkable change had passed over this young man's character within the past twelve months: a change which pleased and mightily astonished his worthy father, albeit he held silence on the matter. It never had been a weakness of his to drop words of encouragement in the path of those who served him; but such dutiful and strict attention to business he had certainly never expected from his son and heir.

The time had for ever gone by when Stephen had been the light and joy of the City offices of Wray and Owens. He no more jested and laughed with the other young gentlemen in the office, nor did he amuse them, and while away his own time, by caricaturing clients and customers along the margins of his account-books, nor were the said accounts balanced with a laxity and a soothing indifference to results that had formerly made him the most unreliable man in the whole house. He had completely abandoned the pastime—one in which he had attained to considerable proficiency—of seeing how many minutes could be consumed in spearing papers from off the office floor with the point of his pen. The clerks considered he had made up his mind to henceforth walk in the money-grubbing footsteps of his father, and disliked him as much for his dulness and taciturnity as they had formerly liked him for his genial flow of happy spirits.

At home in his private life the change in his disposition was hardly less remarkable. His sisters complained that he was not nearly so agreeable and good-natured—not half so willing to accompany them to places of amusement—not so pleasant or sociable as he used to be. He never even flirted now, they complained. Not that he had ever done so, unless flirting means, on the part of a handsome young man, a very natural preference for the society of lively and pretty young women rather than for the discourse of "grave and reverend signiors" of the Stock Exchange.

He had become grave and silent, and went about the world now with a settled gloom on his ere-time joyous face.

It was a close September afternoon, and the office was hot and stifling. Many a youthful clerk furtively glanced at his watch or the office clock, longing for the moment of freedom to arrive.

Stephen alone bent his head over his ledger with unflinching application. He was trying very hard not to let his mind wander nor his thoughts stray, for a notice in the morning paper that day had brought old recollections—never wholly forgotten, only stifled—in a flood upon his soul, things that he did not wish to remember, that he had struggled hard, for over a year now, to forget.

He had read the notice of Master Drury's death. Poor Master Drury! with his kindly old heart, and quaint, pathetic small affectations. Stephen knew Hilda loved the old man: how sore and cruel a blow this would be to her! It was just a year now since he had left Biffey Parsonage in his white heat of wrath and disappointment, and from that day he had never heard of Hilda Romney nor spoken her name. To Mary Owens alone, in a few curt words, he told that Miss Romney had refused him. He repelled her sympathy, and put aside her questionings. Mary could only be silent, and wonder how any woman could have treated her Stephen thus.

He had schooled himself well during this past year, if not exactly to forget Hilda Romney, at least not to think of her. Why should he think of her, false and heartless as she was? He tried hard to live the same careless, happy life he had lived before he met her. That he did not succeed was no fault of his. Always deep down in his heart was the dull, gnawing pain of knowing her false. He did not abuse the world, nor declaim, with Byronic peevishness, at the hollowness of things in general. He was always the same Stephen Wray, with the same boyish simplicity of nature, the same royal breadth of character, manly and true-hearted—not soured, but harder, quieter, colder. And now to-day, this September day, his heart was yearning in pity and ruth over the woman he loved, in her sorrow and bereavement.

A summons from his father to attend that gentleman on a matter of business roused him from his employment of balancing an account-book, from the ruled pages of which Hilda's face, white and sorrowful as last he had seen it, ever and anon looked out at him.

"Sit down for a moment," Mr. Wray, senior, remarked as his son entered his private office. Stephen took the seat indicated by an absent-minded wave of his father's hand.

Mr. Wray held in his hand a sheaf of business-looking papers, which he closely scanned through his gold-rimmed eyeglasses, from time to time referring to a large ledger lying open on the table before him.

Stephen, looking about him at his leisure, remembered the days long ago, when he had been frequently commanded to enter an appearance in this sanctum to give an account of himself before Mr. Owens and his father on the charge of some reckless misdemeanour of his in the science of book-keeping, or of idling away his time, and inciting by precept and example the other articleed young gentlemen to do likewise. Those days were gone, and with them his capacity for fun or mischief. He felt staid and old now, far more than his five-and-twenty years warranted. This was his twenty-fifth birthday.

Mr. Wray scrutinised the last paper, made some final entry in the ledger, and then throwing down his pen, took off his double gold eyeglass, coughed portentously, and turned himself towards Stephen.

"I have sent for you," he began pompously, tapping his left thumb-nail as he spoke with the edge of his glasses, making them a sort of running accompaniment and species of punctuation to his speech, "to confer with you on business—business of a highly important character."

"Yes, sir," Stephen returned, a trifle absently, it must be owned, in the face of so solemn a preamble.

"This is your five-and-twentieth birthday, Stephen, and it is quite time you woke up to a sense of your responsibilities. I have nothing to blame you for, of late, with regard to attention to business, but I must say in other matters you display a callousness and indifference to your own interests quite unaccountable. We have experienced many changes during the past year. Poor Owens is gone; your sister Annette married, and well married."

Annette had married an ancient gentleman named Fraser a few months since. She had met him the previous summer at Boulogne, and consented to play the part of May to his December. He was marvellously gouty and ill-tempered, but could afford to be both, or Miss Annette Wray would not have listened to his suit.

"These are family matters, sir," said Stephen, to recall his parent to the point.

"They are; and business matters as well. In fact, I never make any difference between the two. No one can justly accuse me of ever, in the course of a long life, subordinating business matters to family affairs. I am a hard-working man, and what I am to-day I am by my own industry. I want to-day to announce to you that I wish to admit you to the partnership in the firm left vacant by the death of Mr. Owens."

He paused triumphantly. Stephen did not look in the least elated at the brilliant prospect unfolded for his delectation.

"I would rather stay as I am," he replied. "I have really no head for business, and should only make a fearful mess of the whole thing. When I left school I should have liked to enter the army, but you would not hear of the plan. It was the solitary ambition of my life, and I have outlived it. Now, I should prefer to remain as I am."

"A clerk on a beggarly pittance!" cried Mr. Wray in wrathful astonishment.

"I do not consider it beggarly. Besides, I have a private income."

"A paltry three hundred a year!" shrieked his father, getting purple in the face.

"I find it more than enough," said Stephen indifferently.

"And do you sit there and tell me deliberately you mean to do with that all your life?"

"I should think I shall find it sufficient."

"And you do not want to improve your position?"

"No."

"And you do not want to make money?"

"I have no ambition that way, sir."

"And you mean to marry and support a wife and family on that miserable sum?"

Stephen winced, but answered calmly—

"I do not intend to marry," he said.

"Is the boy deranged?" cried Mr. Wray helplessly. "Is there madness in Jane's family? There never was in mine. Sir," he said, sharply addressing his son, "I intend you to marry, and that soon. And I intend you to marry money, too. It was only to put you in a more honourable position of equality with the woman you will marry that I spoke about taking you into partnership—because I thought you would be too proud to present yourself with your clerkship and your paltry three hundred a year at the door of a wealthy heiress who could buy and sell us all, that I offered the position to you. When I broached the subject more than a year ago to you, you treated it with contempt. I have left you a year to think the matter over, and I certainly hoped to find you come to a better state of mind."

"Father!" interrupted Stephen, starting forward.

"Hold your tongue, sir, and do not interrupt me; your valuable remarks can wait a few moments. I have done for you all a father can do for his son: more than most fathers do for theirs; I have spared no expense where you were concerned. Your schooling, your terms at college, your foreign travels, your tutors' fees, all that came out of my pocket, and now, forsooth, you refuse me the poor reward of obedience. I gave you a liberal education. You led the life of a lord—better than many of them—and now you turn round and defy me."

"If you are going to speak about Mary Owens, I tell you beforehand it is useless," said Stephen, breathing hard, and growing rather pale.

Mr. Wray faced the rising rebellion in his son's eyes unflinchingly. Father and son, they looked at each other, both gathering their forces for the coming combat.

"I will speak about her, and I insist on your listening to me. And I insist on your obedience, what's more," said Mr. Wray, his small eyes grown fierce and hot. "I have left you alone for a year; true, in common decency, you could not have spoken to her sooner. It's not more than a year since poor Owens died. Time is passing, and if you don't look sharp someone else will take her."

"I will not marry her; I shall never marry," said Stephen defiantly.

"You shall, and you must. You owe it to me. At your age, in your position as my heir, you should be married."

"Je n'en vois pas la nécessité," said Stephen curtly.

Mr. Wray bounced in his chair with rage.

"So!" he cried, "this is the result of the education I have given you: you defy me, you sit in my office and fling insulting remarks at me in a dead language!"

"I spoke French, sir; I forgot you did not understand it. I beg your pardon," said Stephen, making a supreme effort to control the temper rising in him: "what I meant to say was that I see no necessity for my marriage. Few men at five-and-twenty are married."

"Because they can't afford to marry. You can, and if you do not, someone else will step between you and Mary Owens."

"Please do not introduce Miss Owens' name into the discussion," said Stephen very hotly. "She is a lady, and a friend of mine, and your method of speaking of her is to me most offensive."

"Stuff! nonsense! humbug!" shrieked his father, in an ever-increasing access of wrath and contempt. "I shall speak of her as I choose. Once for all, will you go to her to-day and make a proposal of marriage to her?"

Stephen stood up, his face white, with quivering nostrils and flashing eyes.

"I will not," he said, to the full as hard-faced and unflinching as the old man sitting opposite him. "Command my obedience in what you will, but never in this. Make me your partner if you choose; I shall try and learn my business in that position, and devote my best energies to the task. I have never before defied you; I have given in to you in everything. You made me a gentleman, gave me the tastes and habits of a gentleman, and then placed me in your office as a clerk. I submitted. I do not now care what I am—salaried clerk or partner. But what I do care for is my honour. I refuse to stoop to the cowardice of marrying a woman for the sake of her money. That is a depth to which I cannot and will not descend. You can act as you please; you can dismiss me from your office as you would any of those who sit in the room with me, did they chance to displease you; you can forbid me your home; ah, indeed, it is not a very happy one! I care little what becomes of me, but I refuse utterly and distinctly to marry where I do not love."

He stopped abruptly, every limb of him tense with indignation.

"This is your last word—your final decision?" questioned his father, suddenly grown cold as Stephen waxed hot.

"Yes."

"Then go!" thundered the old man fiercely, bringing one heavy hand crashing down on the table. "Henceforth I disown you; you are no longer my son; I shall alter my will this very day. I declare you shall never be the better of me. Only that it might benefit you, I should leave my money to found an asylum for incapable idiots. What are you waiting for? Go!"

"Am I to understand that I am to leave your office—that you dismiss me?"

"Yes."

The young man grew a shade whiter.

"Am I to leave your house also?"

"Yes."

"May I return to say good-bye to my mother and Louise?"

"As you choose. What a model of domestic virtue! Remember one thing: I never wish to see your face again. Go your own way: you have chosen it. Don't come whining to me to take you back; I have done with you!"

Stephen looked at him, bewildered at the sudden turn events had taken. His throat felt husky and dry as he attempted to speak, to make one last effort after peace; for, after all, this frenzied old man was his father, his flesh and blood. The not unmanly tears stood in his eyes as he approached Mr. Wray.

"Father," he said entreatingly, "forgive me. I spoke in haste, perhaps angrily and without due respect. Let us not part thus in anger. Command my obedience in all but this one question of my marriage. I am your son, your only son; do not let us quarrel."

A small bell stood near Mr. Wray's hand on the table beside his desk. He touched it now, and a juvenile clerk appeared.

"Stubbins," he said coldly, "show this gentleman out. My business with him is completed, and my time is of value."

Stubbins—a pale-eyed, vacuous-looking youth of eighteen or thereabouts—dropped his jaw in amazement.

Stephen flushed all over his fair face. He looked beseechingly at his father. Mr. Wray had taken up a pen, and was busily writing at his desk. There was no appealing to that iron face.

Waving Stubbins aside, he left the room, and presently the office.

He and his father never met again.

CHAPTER XIII.

CAST OFF.

"More helpful than all wisdom is one draught of simple human pity that will not forsake us."

STEPHEN presented himself late that evening at Miss Owens' residence. He found her alone, except for the society of Mrs. Clare. Mrs. Clare was a small, pale woman, with a deprecating, timid manner, very unlike the self-assertiveness of her predecessor, the fascinating Mrs. Heatherington. She considered herself very fortunate in having obtained the lucrative and easy position to which her old friend Mr. Davenport had recommended her—that of lady companion to the wealthy Miss Owens.

She liked Stephen greatly in her secret heart, more than any other of the visitors who appeared evening after evening in the pretty drawing-room at West Kensington. She had even composed a small "romance of the affections," in which Miss Owens and he played important parts. She noticed his pale face and absent manner, and decided he had come to say "something." So she presently murmured some palpable excuse, and glided from the room.

"I am glad she is gone," said Stephen. "I was just wondering how I could manage to speak to you alone."

"What is the matter?" asked Mary, coming at once to the point. "You look very miserable. What is wrong?"

"Everything is wrong," he replied gloomily. "I have fallen out with my father, and he has turned me adrift."

"Turned you adrift!" repeated Mary, in amazement. "Surely you are not in earnest?"

"Never more so in my life, Mary. Turned me out of his office, out of his house, disinherited me, disowned me."

Mary sat like one stunned, looking at him with bewildered eyes, unable to realise what her ears heard.

"He will relent," she gasped. "It is some passing vexation."

"Not at all. If you saw his face, stern and angry, when I left him to-day, you would know that as well as I do. I have never known him pardon an offence or forgive an injury."

"But you have not injured him, Stephen?"

"No; I have refused to obey him in a matter in which I consider he has no right to command me; and there's the head and front of my offending. He treats me as a boy."

"And what does your mother say?"

"I went home and told her the whole affair. She said Heaven had punished the sins of her youth in giving her a son like me. I am sure I never heard her own to a sin before." And he laughed bitterly. "Stephen, don't; she is your mother."

"I hope many more fellows haven't mothers like her," he said. "Then she went on to ask me questions—wanted to know how long I intended to embroil the family concord; how far I intended to walk the ways of destruction before I would return and submit myself to my father's will. She knew I would come back sooner or later, as there was money in the question. If my father were a poor man, it would be otherwise. Then she, not he, would ever hear of me again, she had no doubt. Finally, she wished me much pleasure in the path of 'riotous living' I was about to follow, and so walked out of the room."

"And Louise?"

"Louise wept a little, and kissed me, and asked me, poor girl, if I had money. Offered to lend me what she had, and advised me to a speedy reconciliation with my father. I left her writing all the dire details of the affair to Annette."

"May I know why you have quarrelled, Stephen?"

If he had been looking at her, he might have guessed, or at least suspected, that she already knew something of the matter. But he was moodily contemplating the pattern of the carpet, and did not raise his eyes to her face.

"No, Mary," he replied, flushing up hotly, "I cannot tell you that."

"Is it about Miss Romney?" she asked softly.

"Miss Romney is nothing any more to me," he said harshly. "My father never heard her name. No one but you knew anything of that unhappy affair."

"And you will not tell me, your old friend, why you are cast off by your father? Why may I not know?"

"You of all people in the world must not know," said Stephen guiltily. "In fact, I ought not to have come here and told you a word about it. I should not have done so, only that I could not leave England without seeing you, and saying farewell to you."

"Leave England, Stephen?"

All that made life bright and worth living so far as she was concerned would go with him. No wonder she trembled and turned pale.

"Yes, I shall emigrate. I shall do better in the colonies. I could not stay in London with matters as they are. When I leave you I am going to Mr. Davenant. He knows a lot about emigration, and the best colony for a man to go to, and his advice generally I feel will do me good."

Mary stood up, and began walking up and down the room. She seemed pondering something, and searching for words the fittest in which to utter her thoughts.

Presently she came and stood by Stephen—a little behind him, where he might not see her face, with one trembling hand placed timidly on his shoulder.

"You will not tell me the cause of this rupture with Mr. Wray, Stephen," she said, speaking very rapidly, in a low, thrilling voice; "but I know it."

"You know it, Mary?" he cried, turning in his chair so as to see her face. But she moved a little farther back.

"Yes. It would have been kinder of you to tell me, and to spare me the humiliation of saying it myself. Your father wanted you—to—to marry me, and you have refused."

Stephen sprang to his feet, and turning, faced the girl as she stood white and wild-eyed behind his chair.

"Do not speak!" she cried, convulsively clasping one hand to her throat, as if utterance choked her. "It is on my account you have quarrelled with your father. I am the cause why you leave home and country, and go forth a banished man."

"Mary, where did you learn this?" he asked, his face as white as hers.

"Before my father died," she said wearily, "he told me he and your father had settled the matter. And so I guess now that your father has broached the subject to you, and that you refuse to carry out his wishes. Stephen, I will not allow that you should be exiled and disinherited on my account. Go home to your father to-night, and tell him the heiress has refused you, that she will not marry you, that she declined your suit absolutely and distinctly. That will surely satisfy him, so far as you are concerned. The blame no longer rests upon you. You need not tell him you did me not the poor grace of asking me."

Her voice broke suddenly. She walked away from him, and sat down on a distant seat. Her fortitude was rapidly forsaking her. She had trailed her womanly pride in the dust for his sake. Let him accept the sacrifice, if he would, but her sorrowful secret was still her own.

Stephen followed her in a few rapid strides. He knelt down at her side, and took her trembling hand in his.

"And you suppose, dear," he said, very tenderly, "that I will let you do this for me? Do you think me such a coward that I shall hide myself behind your generosity? I will not allow you to sacrifice yourself for me. I will not go to my father and tell him you have refused me, because I will not, even in semblance, go through the form of insulting you. Any proposal of marriage from me to you would be nothing more nor less than an insult—you, who know more about me than any other mortal on earth—you, who know I have no longer any love to give—you, who more than any other woman I have ever known deserves the best love of any man's heart. I know you have never cared for me except as a friend, as a brother. And I, who value your friendship, should I be worthy of it any longer were I to act now as you ask me? Do you think I will ask you to marry me only to secure to myself the shield of your refusal where-with to reinstate myself with my father? I value our friendship, Mary—what it has ever been, what it will, I trust, ever continue to be—too dearly to mar that friendship by empty, meaningless talk of any other relationship between us. I know very well you would refuse me. But I will not ask you. And I will not go to my father with any such half-lie upon my lips."

"Then I will!" she said excitedly. "I shall go to him to-morrow, and say, 'Mr. Wray, you can forgive Stephen, and take him back. I am my own mistress, and I will not marry your son.' Don't you see how beautifully simple it is, Stephen? It does me no harm, and completely disarms him."

"I will not consent to your doing so. My friend, in your secret heart would you not think me a paltry coward if I yielded to you in this?"

She made no answer. A few forlorn tears welled over from her full eyes, and trickled slowly down her cheeks.

Stephen reverently raised the hand he held to his lips, and kissed it.

"You are a noble, good woman, Mary," he said, in low, solemn tones. "If you had loved me, and I had never met that other, it would have been better far for me. But you would never have loved me; and the past is past, and cannot be undone now by either you or me."

"If she had loved him!" And all the deep, loving woman's heart of her even then going out to him, yearning over him with selfless, intense love, that ever held his happiness of more account than aught else in the world, feeling his sorrows more keenly than he felt them himself, counting no sacrifice "for his sake" too costly. "If she had loved him!" After these years he could come to her, and hold her hand in his, and say, "If you had loved me!"

Well, it is not for a woman to speak first in these matters. If her heart is breaking with unspoken love, let it break, but let it break in silence.

The hand in his quivered as if pierced through by a sudden dart.

Stephen knelt by her side in silence, still holding her hand, and absently stroking its surface with his brown, sinewy fingers.

"I shall not tell my people where I go," he said presently: "none of them cared to ask, for that matter. And because I do not wish them to know, I shall not tell you either. They would be certain, sooner or later, to come bothering you about it. It was always one of my chief sins in their eyes that I told you things I kept from them. You can write to me through Mr. Davenent, if you care to write."

"If I care, Stephen!"

"I know you care—forgive me. I am a little hard and bitter to-night, Mary, and I find it hard to believe anyone cares for me—when a fellow's own mother does not even ask if he will have a roof over his head when he is turned out from his father's house. If I were to doubt your affection, Mary, it would go badly with me. You are the one being on earth who does care what becomes of me."

"And what will you turn to when you go away?"

"I have money of my own. Thank God, I need not starve either here or in the colonies. There is now or hereafter no actual need that I should work. But work of some sort or another I mean to find and do—otherwise I should go mad, or go downhill. I don't want to do either. And as I have no future to look forward to, and no hope to endeavour to realise, I must have something to do—otherwise I should be rudderless, and no one knows where I might drift."

"Do you need money now?" she asked.

"No, dear."

"For your passage? For your outfit? It is impossible that you have ready money enough to start in this unexpected way to the ends of the earth. Let me—"

"No, Mary," he said, interrupting her. "A man cannot take money from a woman—"

"I don't see why, if she has it and he wants it, and they are friends," she pleaded.

"I don't know why; but there is an unwritten law on the subject. But in any case let your tender little heart be at rest on the subject. I can realise some of my capital, and my last quarter's allowance is untouched. I am not a very extravagant fellow; I shall do very well. Now I must be off. I know Mr. Davenent's door stands open night and day to the lost sheep, but I need not keep the poor old gentleman longer from his well-earned repose than is absolutely necessary."

"I am glad you are going to him; he has always liked you, and taken an interest in you. He will advise you. Oh, Stephen, perhaps after all you will not have to go away!"

"Nothing he can say can alter that. I know my father's implacable nature. He will never pardon me, and it is best for everyone concerned that I should disappear totally. It would be a constant trial to all of us if I remained at home."

They were both standing now. He took her hands in his, and held them, looking down tenderly into her face.

"And you will come back some day?" she whispered, trying to speak bravely and brightly, although her lips quivered.

"Some day, perhaps. Who knows?" he answered lightly. "What would bring me back? You are all I have in England to care about, and when I should return I should find you somebody's happy wife, and you would look upon me in the light of a bore. Besides, I should have grown so very colonial in style, that you would be heartily ashamed to recognise me as a friend."

"That is all very probable!" she replied.

Since he was going, she wished intensely he would say good-bye at once and go. Her agony was threatening to overmaster her, and yet she must not break down before him. She must endure to the end. The very hardest task of all, that, in the lesson-book of life.

"So probable," he returned, "that I scarcely think I shall risk coming home to find it true."

Then he stooped, and for the first time in his life kissed her. She said no word, only stood like any cold statue carved in stone.

"Good-bye, Mary," he whispered tenderly. "If we never meet again, remember I have always loved you dearly."

And then, with these words, he went away, and going, left her forlorn; rich in love for him, to see him go forth alone; wealthy, to know he had gone out poor to fight his battle for existence; lonely, because, going, he had taken her heart with him, and taking it, knew nothing of so doing, nor had valued it at all had he known. So runs the world awry.

CHAPTER XIV.

ONE LAST EFFORT.

"What we would we cannot have,
Whom we love we cannot keep."—ANON.

FLASHFORD-ON-SEA lay broiling under the September sun, small defenceless town that it was, open to the fiercest assaults of summer heat and winter cold. The "little summer of St. Luke" lingered late this year; although the days grew shorter, they became no cooler; and at Flashford shade was always a "missing quality," either out on the treeless downs or down by the flat sea-shore. It was four o'clock in the afternoon, and the season of Flashford was at its height. On the pier a sprinkling of fashionable young ladies, some with books they did not read, and others engaged in the more congenial occupation of languid flirtation, idled away the time, longing doubtless for the evening, and the dulcet strains of the band, and the return of favoured cavaliers from Bullionston. Here and there old gentlemen on camp-stools reading newspapers lent variety to the scene. On the sands behind the pier, near the bathing-machines, children, bare-legged and noisy, played shrilly, busily drawing water from one pool to pour it into another. Smaller infants than these lolled lazily in perambulators, while their attendant nursery-maids enjoyed the solace of a little conversation, "talking over" their respective mistresses for the most part. Along the sea-walk a few burly fishermen lounged, smoking, and with elbows on the wall gazed out to sea, with as much interest, apparently, as though it were the first moment that portion of creation had been introduced to their notice. Everything and everyone seemed hot and lazy; even the very sea came rolling languidly in, without dancing wave or sparkling foam-fringe, bursting heavily on the beach under the low, grey-blue sky. A German band, with energy and perseverance worthy both of a better cause and of more success, played "Sweet Dreamland Faces" to this unappreciative audience. They and the children alone seemed able to rise above the general sense of languor which pervaded the place. They were playing quite as beautifully as most German bands, so perhaps it was as well they met with scant encouragement. Having torn "Sweet Dreamland Faces" to rags, they pulled up stakes, and adjourned to the other end of the esplanade, near the railway station. It was near the time of the afternoon train from the City, and some of the new arrivals might cast them a coin in passing.

They were tootling the soldiers' song from Maritana when the train ran into the station, and a gush of men and women came out on the sea-road, hastening to their respective homes. One, a tall young man, with a long, swinging stride, which soon out-distanced the rest, walked straight on, looking neither to the left hand nor the right; past the Royal Alexandra Marine Hotel, with its trim gardens in front and hospitably open doors; past the spick-and-span stone church of St. Cecilia; indifferent to the attractions of the pier; blind to those who paused in their idle talk to stare at him; only stopping an instant to throw a sixpence into the cap a juvenile member of the band beseechingly held out to him.

Poor German band! That sixpence just doubled your whole earnings for that long hot day.

He was a stranger to all of these people sitting and standing about the sea-walk, but he did not move with the hesitating step of a man who did not know his way. He soon left the sea-front, and turned up one of the terraces leading to the main street of the town, from thence into a narrow side-street leading inland, then down the lane between two high stone walls, on one hand ivy-topped, which led to Biffey Parsonage. Then, for the first time since he left the station, his pace slackened. He paused outside the door of the Parsonage which opened on the lane, looked at it with a vacant stare, gazed at the name of Dr. Romney graven on the brass plate, and then walked on to the end of the lane. This intelligent proceeding he repeated over and over again, there being no passers along that lonely lane to shame him into sudden decision.

At last he stopped abruptly before the door, and sharply pulled the bell which communicated with the hall door inside. He heard a slow foot coming along the gravel path. There was no retreating now.

It was old Susan Cooke who opened the door. She looked staid and solemn, and her face did not display any pleasure on beholding the visitor.

"Can I see Miss Romney?" he stammered guiltily.

The old woman did not know if her mistress would see any visitors. The poor master was very ill, and her young lady much occupied in his sick-room.

"She might perhaps see me for an instant," he urged. "I have come all the way from London to see her."

She distinctly relented on hearing this. If he would come inside to the house (opening the door somewhat more hospitably wide), she would ask Miss Hilda.

On entering the drawing-room from the brilliant sunlight of the outer world, it was difficult to distinguish anything about him. The blinds were drawn, and the room was chill and gloomy, and had an uncared-for look. Poor Master Drury's open spinet in the corner lay thick with dust, the flowers in the vases were faded beyond recognition, and the growing plants hung down their leaves, withering for lack of water. Hilda's canary on a table by the end window humped itself up dejectedly on its perch, and seemed to have no heart to sing, nor to display any interest in existence.

After some moments' waiting he heard the light step he knew so well echoing along the hall, and his heart beat fast. Hilda Romney entered the room; she looked almost ghostlike as she entered, with her small face wan and wistful, and an expression of intense yet patient weariness in her grey eyes. She came straight towards him, where he stood gulping down the emotion he felt at seeing her, and frankly held out to him her hand.

"Thank you," she said simply. "It is kind and good to have come so far to see me in my trouble. I thank you."

"I hardly knew if you would admit me, if you would see me," he stammered.

"It is better that he should think hard thoughts of me."—p. 259.

Stephen grasped at it as though so much grace was more than he had looked for or expected.

He had been puzzling himself as he came along how he should greet her, what he should say to her. Now he forgot all the stilted speeches he had prepared, and let his heart speak.

"Hilda," clasping both her hands in his strong ones, "I am so sorry for you! I am so sorry for you!"

"Are we not friends?" she asked, surprised.

"Oh, Hilda!" he cried, quite overcome by the sweet gentleness of the girl, "how can you receive me so kindly when you remember how we parted?"

"I remember nothing," she said, "except that you were once my friend. If you were angry that day in the garden, it was I that made you so. I am glad if you are no longer angry with me."

"Angry!" he said earnestly. "I have travelled all this way first to beg your forgiveness before I leave England. I could not go away without it."

"Then you are leaving England!" she asked.

"Yes, for ever. But it was not to talk of myself I came. Tell me about yourself and your sorrow, dear. I know you well enough to understand what a cruel loss is this to you."

"It is all the brightness gone out of my life for ever—just that," raising pathetic eyes to his face. "He was so good to me, he loved me so much. I shall never have anyone again who will love me as he did. Oh, I wish I had been better to him!"

"And your father!" he asked, as her voice broke.

"My father is very ill. In fact, he has been so ill for a long, long time now, that we have been only waiting from day to day for the end to come. It was all so sudden about Uncle Drury, I hardly realised he was ill until I saw him die; and now I must wait alone, Uncle Drury no longer with me, until my father too dies, and goes away from me."

"And you? what will become of you?" he asked, with passionate eagerness.

"I do not know," she said forlornly. "I shall be alone in the world. There is no one else belonging to me."

Stephen stood by her, watching her, each slow tear trickling down her pale cheek like a drop of life-blood wrung from his heart.

"I am alone in the world," she said drearily. "It seems rather hard just now; I suppose as I get older I shall become used to it. But it is sorrowful and strange to be alone in the world when you are only twenty-one. And then there is so much before me that I must face and meet alone, I feel afraid."

"Hilda, you need not be alone; I care for you. It is much, it is everything to me what becomes of you. Give yourself to me, and I will shield and guard you with my life. Come with me, and let us face the future together. I know this is not the time nor place to speak thus, but I may not have another opportunity of seeing you; and besides, you know already that I love you. Be my wife, Hilda. Perhaps the years may bring love for me to your heart. I will be very patient, I will be silent, I will not let the great love I bear towards you, my darling, intrude itself on you—only it is a desolate thing for you to be alone in the world. Come with me to the new world; let me love you, wait on you, serve you, work for you. Even though you love me not, that will be less sorrowful for you than living on here alone, eating your heart out in solitude."

She was weeping unrestrainedly now—long, bitter sobs that shook her slight frame from head to foot. Stephen threw himself on his knees beside her, and tried to take her hands from her face.

"There is no use," she sobbed; "you do not know all. Oh, do not, do not speak like this—in mercy do not! It is cruel; I cannot bear it. You wound my very heart."

Presently she became calmer, and dried her wet eyes. Only a long, shuddering sob every now and again went through her.

"You are going away," she said, after a while, looking at him with a pitiful little pretext for a smile.

"Yes."

"You have quarrelled with your father?"

"Yes."

"Oh, I am sorry. I always feared it must come to that."

"It does not much matter, does it?"

"Ah yes! yes, it does. When those we love lie before us dead, gone quite away from us for ever, every cross or unkind word we ever said to them comes back, and cuts like a knife to the heart. I have learnt that much these last days."

"You have not many unkind words to repent of," said Stephen tenderly.

"I have much to repent of—oh, much—oh! if the dead would only come back to us just for a little moment, just while we could tell them how we loved them—that the unkind word, or the want of sympathy, or the frown we had often given them was only on the surface, but that deep down we loved them always! But they come back no more; they are gone, gone quite away for ever out of our lives. If you could only have seen Uncle Drury's face: how still, and beautiful, and peaceful it was! And how he smiled! smiled though I was weeping bitterly by his side—weeping as I remembered how often I had been unkind to him, and thought his little ways tiresome, or been fussed by him, or answered him coldly. Those are the things that come back to you when you stand by someone who loved you, and who is dead. I say this to you now solemnly and sorrowfully from the depths of my own sad experience: you may do much in your life to be sorry for, much that you would give your life, almost, for the power of undoing, but nothing, when you stand by the dead, will give you such keen sorrow as the unkind words you have spoken to them, or the loving things you might have said and did not say."

Stephen was silent. He could not trust himself to speak just then.

"And so you have quarrelled with your father, and you are leaving England? Will you not wait a little, and give him an opportunity to forgive you?"

"I have waited," the young man replied gloomily.

"An old friend of mine in London, a clergyman, advised me to wait a little, as you said just now, to give my father an opportunity to forgive me. It is more than a fortnight now since he cast me off. Since then I have called at his office, to be informed Mr. Wray could not see me; went to Portman Square, only to be turned from the door of my father's house by a servant who has known me since I was a child; written to him, only to have my letters returned unopened. No, there is no use in waiting any longer. Next week I sail for Australia."

"And why has he cast you off? What have you done?"

"I have refused to marry at his bidding a woman whom I do not love: for the sake of her money."

"Miss Owens!" she said. Her voice was very low, and she did not meet Stephen's eyes as she asked the question. "And do you not love her? Could you not,

I mean, to please your father? Surely she is not so unlovable. You used to like her."

"I like her—yes, I love her—I hold her in all reverence as the best woman I have ever known—the largest heart, the truest friend."

"If you think all this of her," she said, a little coldly, "it seems to me you ought not to find much difficulty in asking her to be your wife."

"And you can say this to me, Hilda—you can pretend you think this, when you know I love you, and you only? You have all my heart. My life is bound up in yours. Mary, good and dear and true, holds, and has always held, the place of a loved sister in my affections. I am not ashamed of the love I have for her, but I should be doing a thing mean and dishonourable if I asked any woman in the world to be my wife while Hilda Romney breathes. Yes, and after. My fate was fixed the day I saw you—I cannot change it now, even if I would."

"Have I then done you an injury so cruel, so irreparable?" she cried, throwing her hands out with a despairing gesture. "I have hoped, I have prayed, that away from me you would learn to forget me. And now, a year after, you come back to me and tell me that you love me still."

"And twenty years hence if I come back to you, it will be still the same tale I shall have to tell," he exclaimed.

"It is hard, it is hard," she moaned. "I never meant to injure you. I never fancied you would love me so deeply. I thought you would be hurt a little at first, and be a little sorry for a time, perhaps. But this I did not expect. Can you not try to forget me?"

"I have been trying for a year," he said, with a grim smile. "You perceive how admirably successful I have been."

She sat silent, looking before her with sad eyes, that seemed not to see what they rested on.

"I never meant to harm you," she said, and sighed.

"Dear heart," he said tenderly, "do not grieve yourself for me. It is not your fault that you do not love me. I came here to-day only to crave your forgiveness before I left England perhaps for ever. You have pardoned me, and I go now with a lighter heart. If I could think of you at home, prosperous and fairly happy, and shielded, as a little tender thing like you should be shielded, from the world's hard knocks, I think I should be almost happy. But to go away to the other side of the world, and know you to be here alone, perhaps poor, and, you say, friendless—that it is which wrings my heart, Hilda."

"Think of me then as happy," she said brokenly, "if so to think will comfort you. I shall not be poor, thank God—not rich either; but still I shall have sufficient for my needs. I shall be friendless, but that cannot be helped."

"I cannot think of you as happy," he interrupted, coming a step nearer to her from his pacing to and fro in the room. "I cannot think that, when a few moments ago you told me you were afraid when you looked into what the future holds for you."

She shrank away as if he had struck her. For an instant some strong emotion struggled within her, and seemed almost to overmaster her. Her thin hands closed convulsively.

"I know I have no right to speak as I am doing now," he went on, in a high, rapid tone, eloquent beyond his wont. "I know that one refusal such as you gave me long ago ought to be enough—would be enough for most men—and would be enough for me too, so far as I myself am concerned. I asked you once before to marry me. Then I asked you simply because I loved you. I love you still, utterly, passionately, hopelessly. I now ask you again, not for my own sake, not because I love you, not because I want you for my wife with all the longing of my heart, but I ask you for your own sake. I do not say this from any concealed idea that I can make you happy in spite of yourself, but only because I think in marrying me you might be one degree less miserable than staying on here alone in the world. And for me, the power to make your life one degree less miserable than it is would be happiness intense, happiness greater than I have dared to look for. Surely in a new world you might forget the sorrowful past: you might find life worth living in the land beyond the seas! You would be no longer lonely and friendless. Riches I cannot offer you; I have them no longer. But devotion, and loyalty of loving service, I can and will give you. Think, Hilda, think a little before you speak. Do not hastily decide. Would it not be better for you to come away with me, even though you do not love me? If I am willing—and I am—to accept you just as you are, without a spark of love for me in your heart, will it not be best for you too?"

Hilda stood up suddenly. Her face was whiter—if that were possible—than when she had entered the room. Her canary, encouraged by the fervent, rapid speech of the young man, burst into a jubilant psalm of joy. Its piercing notes mingled with the girl's faltering speech, and, together with it, went through Stephen's heart and brain. He never listened to the song of canary bird again without seeming to see her standing before him, with clasped hands and pathetic, appealing eyes, in her heavy black garments, so slight, and young and sorrowful a figure.

"Forgive me," she began; and then her voice trembled so that it was some moments ere she could go on. "I have this now added to all else I have to weigh down my heart: the knowledge of having done you an injury so irreparable. To remember that I have darkened your life will make the bitter future yet more drear. But what you ask me to do is impossible, quite impossible. If only you would believe me when I say this! I cannot be your wife. If you knew all that I know, you would agree with me as to this. It is quite impossible. I will pray on my knees, night and morning, that you will learn to forget me: that in the new world, and the new life to which you go, the remembrance of me may fade and fade, until, like the memory of a dream, it goes away altogether. I will pray, too, for some new happiness to come and fill and warm your life. But, believe me, you could never be happy if I to-day yielded to your prayer, and consented to become your wife. You would learn to curse the day I did so; you would blame the selfishness that prompted me. I am very glad we part friends. But let us part; my strength is gone. I can bear this no longer."

"Whatever is before you, let me share it," he said pleadingly, making one last appeal.

"I cannot!" The voice was low and firm, albeit deeply pained.

"I wonder if a man ever loved so hopelessly before?" he said quietly, his hands hanging straight down by his side, his face forlorn. "If I come back years hence, Hilda, will it be still the same?"

"Years hence—still the same," she murmured.

"To think I love you so passionately, so entirely," he went on, unable to take his dismissal, "and that it would not cost you a tear if the ship I sail on went to the bottom. It is hard!"

"Yes, it is hard," she answered quietly.

And then he went away.

"It is better he should think hard thoughts of me," she cried passionately, when the last echo of his parting footsteps had died away. "So will he learn to forget me, to be happy without me. It is best that he should remember me only as hard and cruel and cold. Stephen, Stephen, my darling! perhaps in heaven you will know how much I loved you!"

HOW TO SANCTIFY MARRIAGE.

AN ADDRESS TO A NEWLY WEDDED COUPLE.

BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A.

Y dear friends, whom I have been permitted to join together in the bonds of holy matrimony—you will, I know, accept a few words of kindly exhortation and advice from one who is not only a minister of the Lord Jesus Christ, but also "himself a married man."

If I interpret you rightly, and I think I know how to do so—your primary thought at this moment is one of exceeding thankfulness. God, you feel, has been preparing you for one another. By His loving discipline He has so trained and educated you both in the past that now, when you have met here, led by the hand of His good and gracious providence, your like-mindedness in the best things, and your congeniality of disposition and temper, give you every prospect of a career of happy companionship, and of usefulness to others round you. For this you praise and bless His holy name. It is He Who has thus crowned your lives with His goodness, and given you cause for such deep and inexpressible gratitude. Modifying this primary feeling of thankfulness, but not in any way diminishing the force and power of it, is the recollection of the profound mystery which invests the subject of Christian marriage. Of this you have heard something already in the prayer of the service just closed. You have been reminded that in matrimony is "signified and represented the spiritual marriage and unity betwixt Christ and His Church." The husband, then, will see Christ in his wife; the wife will see Christ in her husband; and thus the sentiment of mutual reverence and respect will be superadded to—or more correctly speaking form the basis of—the wedded love which is to characterise your future.

It will occur to you, no doubt, that to discern Christ in another person is no peculiar privilege of those who are situated as you are. All alike, whether married or single, are required to respect, in their brethren and neighbours, the humanity with which the Eternal Son of God has condescended to ally Himself. But on wedded pairs descends the special responsibility of illustrating, as far as in them lies, the mystical union betwixt Christ and His Church; and this they have to do by the entireness of their devotion to each other, by their unfailing confidence in each other, by the growing strength of their love, and by their readiness to sacrifice self, and all personal inclination, wherever such a sacrifice is needed. The man is called upon to love his wife "as Christ did love His spouse the Church, and gave Himself for it." The woman, on her side, is to show the duty of the Church towards Christ, by being "loving and amiable, faithful and obedient to her husband, and by being in all quietness, sobriety, and peace a follower of godly and holy matrons."

From your true acceptance of this position there flow certain practical obligations which I will venture to point out to you.

You have met together to establish a Christian household, which shall be, God helping you, a home of holy peace and happiness to yourselves, a source and centre of usefulness and blessing to others, and more especially to those who belong, or shall belong, to you. I take for granted that your first care will be to set up a family altar. It is difficult to understand how people calling themselves Christians can excuse to themselves the neglect of the plain and simple duty of meeting together for family worship. I know that our modern life, and especially our London life—is hurried. But surely some few minutes might be spared for God in every family, in the morning, to praise Him and to ask His help for the day; in the evening to meet Him once more ere they retire for rest. And surely, the Divine benediction cannot be expected to rest on a prayerless household. But here I will not dictate. I know you well enough to know that I carry your assent with me, and that, therefore, my urgent insistence on such a point would be as unnecessary as it would be out of all proper taste.

May I be permitted, also, to recommend the maintenance, amid the bustle of life which will soon come upon you, of united prayer, and of united reading (I should like to say "study" if study be possible) of the Holy Word of God? When occupations multiply, there may come in also a temptation to give up this quiet time, or at least to allow it to yield somewhat to more urgent and clamorous engagements. But the temptation is one that you will do well to resist. We married people are not only "heirs together of the grace of life," but in a peculiar sense fellow-labourers in the work of life, fellow-travellers towards the Eternal City, the City which hath foundations; and anything that may tend to keep in us the recollection of the endearing closeness of our spiritual relation to one another, it is our wisdom to maintain and to cherish as well as we can, and certainly not at any time to cast aside.

It may be well also to remember that in all married life the imperfection of human nature may possibly give occasion sometimes for mutual forbearance: for tender and gentle consideration—now on the one side, now on the other. The question of temper is often regarded as a trifling one—but it is not really so. Few things have more to do with the comfort, and therefore with the usefulness, of our daily life, than temper. And the first little "rift in the lute," the tiny, unimportant-looking crack that may spread and ultimately destroy all possibilities of harmony, is worth our thinking about. Here, again, I do not dictate. I speak merely from my experience of human nature, and not with any side-glance at the two persons whom I see before me. Taught by the Spirit of God to understand yourselves, you will not take in bad part any advice, even if it should seem to you to be almost, if not altogether, uncalled-for and unnecessary.

And now, my dear friends, what is it you are expecting? What vision opens up before you as you stand here in God's presence, ready to start hand-in-hand, heart joined with heart, on the journey of life? What is it you look for in the future which you are to spend together? A sky not all sunshine, nor yet all cloud; but one tempered for you by the gracious skill of Him Who doeth all things well; a road in which the roughnesses shall be smoothed, and the smooth places made smoother by your loving companionship; a course under the eye of the Almighty Father; a life (God grant that it may be a long and a prosperous one!) so spent as that when the shadows gather round, and the end comes at last, you may leave this world of ours not a little the better and the brighter, not a little the holier and happier for your presence and your joint work in it! Go forth, then, dear friends, on your new path, confiding in your God, confiding in each other; and may the blessing of the ever-blessed Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, rest henceforth abundantly and abidingly upon you!

THE SALT OF THE EARTH.

BY EDWARD GARRETT, AUTHOR OF "EQUAL TO THE OCCASION," "THE MAGIC FLOWER-POT," ETC.

SECOND PAPER.

WHEN once one begins to think of the good which history and biography have revealed as wrought by the quiet and homely efforts of those whom the world generally regards as insignificant, one scarcely knows where to rein-in one's Memory, for the paths before her seem boundless. We must try to choose her steps, so as to bring before our readers certain less known instances of individual triumph over evil or promotion of good, each with a typical interest of its own, that may make it an encouragement or an example to a different class of reader.

Let us review the history of a certain good man, who fell a victim to religious intolerance during the persecutions of Queen Mary's reign. He had begun life as a London 'prentice, careless and reckless in the extreme. Anybody looking at him would have been inclined to foresee that he would perish in a drunken brawl rather than at the martyr's stake. Vice may not invariably end in crime, though it does so more frequently than the unthinking suspect; but crime always begins in vice. This lad's drinking and debauchery required means of support, and to find these he resorted to gaming. Perhaps he won sometimes, as beginners are generally permitted to do, but finally he lost, and then he was tempted to take some money from his master's coffers to retrieve his position, and then lost that too, and recognised himself as what he was—a thief, and one, in those days, in danger of the death penalty. It was no use turning for help to any of his wild companions. Some would have no means, some might be only too ready to betray. So, in despair, he bethought him of his master's servant, a plain, good woman, at whose religion he had often made a mock. He knew that, out of her modest wage, her thrift had enabled her to make frugal savings, and he trusted that an appeal to her womanly kindness might bring forth a loan to save him from a violent death, either at his own hand or on the gallows. She received the outburst of his despair gently and without reproaches, and listened to his petitions for a while in silence. Then her mind was made up. She would give him her help to save his life in these straits, if he would give her a chance of saving his soul from its still greater peril. Her savings should be at his command, if, at least until they were repaid, he would solemnly promise her to abstain from drinking and loose company, and faithfully to attend divine worship and the religious instruction publicly given, making also a daily study of his Bible. He gave the promise drearily enough, because he did not see how otherwise he was to help himself. She was on the spot to watch that he kept it; and she had been wise in her stipulations. At light lived to see the suffering which doubtless she would have been strong and wise enough to recognise as a glorious triumph. But at any rate, they were soon together in those heavenly habitations where she had indeed made friends of the mammon of unrighteousness.

"She received the outburst of his despair gently."—p. 260.

the moment that the evils were dismissed from his heart, and it was for the present swept and garnished, she had taken care that it was not left empty, but that softening and hallowing influences should come trooping in. The wild 'prentice stood appalled at his past life, seeing it in the new lights that fell upon it. He became sober and diligent. When the little loan was refunded, he did not forsake the goodly ways into which it had led him. In due time, from a humble disciple, he became a teacher and a guide to others, and in the end was called to seal his testimony with his blood. We are not told whether the good woman who had turned his face from darkness towards the

We will turn to the far different story of another serving-maid who, in her youth, was privileged to enter the family of one of the most apostolic men of modern times—Oberlin, the saintly pastor of the Ban de la Roche, who entered a savage district and turned it into a paradise. "Louisa" caught her master's spirit of practical beneficence, and threw herself into all his good works, some of which he could scarcely have carried on without such disinterested assistance. Though early deprived of his wife, no anxieties concerning his family or his household were suffered to weigh on his heart, or to encroach on the time or energies which were involved in larger interests. "Louisa" could be implicitly trusted, and the pastor's house, with its unceasing industry, its severe thrift and wise enterprise, was exactly the example which supported his precepts. Louise spent all her life working for her master and furthering all his works, asking only, as the special recognition of this devotion, that he should cease to pay her wages, and simply give her money for her clothes, when she required it, as he did for his children, assuring him that he would find she required very little! Oberlin himself said, long afterwards, that nothing had ever seemed to hurt Louisa so much as the necessity for any money transactions! A simple servant she remained all her life, though be sure she was her master's beloved friend, and the honoured adviser of his children. But such a character is like a city set on a hill; it cannot be hid, and the most casual visitors at the parsonage soon recognised the real value of "the old woman called Louisa, dressed in a long woollen jacket and black cotton cap," who came to give them welcome and tendance, but whom they soon discovered "to be house-mistress, intimate friend, maid-of-all-work, schoolmistress, entertainer of guests," and, as one jolly added, "probably assistant minister, though we have not yet heard her in this capacity." Louisa Scheppler remained in her master's family to the end, tending his old age, and becoming a sacred charge to his children; and when her half-century of devoted service closed she was buried near him in the little graveyard of the district which their labours had transformed.

We must remember that Oberlin had to deal with a neglected race, savagely ignorant and fierce, living in an isolated spot, to which the ordinary appliances of civilisation could not penetrate. He was at once their pastor, physician, and law-giver. He made their roads; he instructed them in agriculture; he founded schools; he established hospitals; and who can realise how much his labours were lightened and facilitated by the unfailing sympathy and co-operation of this devoted servant? Is it not certain that his strength must have been undermined, and highly possible that his invaluable life might have been shortened by many years, if family anxieties and domestic burdens had been added to his labours—if "Louisa" had not been as strenuous and as faithful at her post as he was at his? O if more women would only "think on these things"—if, instead of mean ambitions for high wage and little work, they would cherish noble aspirations to uphold the hands that are stretched out in the world's service—what a glory would flood the quiet ways of domestic labour!

In our earlier paper we made allusion to the blessed influence exerted on John Bunyan by his godly wife; but we must not forget the further edification and uplifting which, when his heart was really awakened, and yet sorely tossed and troubled, he received from the simple Christian conversation of some good housewives, sitting at their cottage doors. He has told us that their recital of their spiritual experiences, and of the inward peace and joy for which they thanked God, was as a heavenly revelation to his perplexed soul. We can easily fancy the little group, sitting in a shady corner among the level Bedfordshire lanes—one or two probably busy with pillow-lace; another perhaps shelling peas; the fourth, a young mother, nursing her baby. On any summer morning there are many such groups to be seen in the length and breadth of fair England. But are there many conversations going forward which could be edifying or cheering to any living soul? Only out of the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh, and if those women had been full of foolish vanity and frivolity, or, worse still, of petty carping and spiteful malice, who knows how much poorer the world might be to-day, though it seemed to them that their only hearer was a rough young countryman?

We will not stop to say much about Sarah Martin, the humble dressmaker, who was the first to think that it might be a Christian duty to carry some instruction and comfort to the ignorant prisoners lying in the wretched gaol of her town, and whose persevering ministrations, carried on in her scanty leisure from her toil for daily bread, led at last to systematic work in the same direction. Her name is constantly found in the collected biographies of philanthropic women, and we are inclined, at present, to keep as much as we can in the by-ways, and tell rather of those whose works are with us, though their very names are almost forgotten.

Such a one is "Old Jimmy o' the Hey," a working man, at Little Lever, near Bolton, who, long before Sunday-schools in their present form were thought of, had his heart so touched by the helpless ignorance of the neglected children of his neighbourhood, that he felt he must make some plan to teach and help them. He got his bread through the week by winding bobbins for weavers, but he had the leisure of the Lord's Day, and he resolved to consecrate it to the service of the Lord's lambs. He began by taking children into his little habitation, and teaching them to read and write, and telling them stories out of the Bible. As the numbers increased, he fixed regular hours, assembled them twice on each Sunday, and in default of either clock or bell, called them together by sounding an old brass pestle in a mortar. His good work drew commendation from a few of the local gentry and employers of labour, who sent him help in the shape of small sums of money, but he persevered in his dependence on his own industry, and devoted these to the assistance of three branch schools which he was able to form, as more children flocked to him than he could possibly accommodate or control. It was efforts such as his which gradually led to the establishment of Sunday-schools as they exist at present—an organisation whose power for good can be limited only by the number and genuine zeal and piety of the teachers working in it, for it has indeed a field "white unto harvest." Nor need the example of "Old Jimmy o' the Hey" end only in this, its widest development. For there are still " gleanings " which only individual hands can gather up, and which, without them, must go ungathered. Within reach of men and women whose own Sabbaths are not more profitable or refreshing because their devotion is solitary and their leisure selfish, there may be often found children or young people who are not in any safe family fold, and yet, for some reason or another, are out of the reach of organised effort—perhaps in some remote glen, or on some lonely moor, or else in a crowded city, and yet in some way isolated from the masses round them, and the agencies which reach those. Who can tell what forces for good may lie latent in some boy or girl, whose listless, miserable Sundays now pass away without joy or blessing, because no hand touches the right chord? And yet, all the while, some of us are discontentedly—

"Seeking for some great thing to do,
Or secret thing to know,"

and missing our crown because we fail to remember that "Wherever in the world we are,

In whatsoever estate,
We have a fellowship with hearts
To keep and cultivate,
And a work of lowly love to do
For the Lord on Whom we wait."

Not so acted Mary Anne Clough, of Glasgow—a name which we think will be known to but few of our readers, but which deserves to be held in highest honour, though she was but a factory girl, standing all day among flying spindles in a dense and dusty atmosphere. But the story of her intrepid obedience to the Master's call, "Go work to-day in My vineyard," cannot be better told than in the words of the late Dr. Guthrie:—

"She had no position, as they say, in the world; nor money in the bank. I do not know that she was in any way distinguished from others by the greatness of her head, but she had, what is better far, a large heart—a kind, loving, Christ-like heart. Seeing around her many poor boys employed in the foundries who, not only utterly neglected, but early initiated into lessons of vice, could say, 'No man careth for my soul,' she had compassion on them. 'I am but a poor working girl,' she said to herself, 'but I will try in a loving spirit if I can win them to God, and to what is good.' A noble resolution! So soon as formed, she sought to carry it into practice, asking and getting the use of a room below the factory where she wrought. She opened it on a Sabbath in June, 1862, and ere long had gathered in some forty lads, with ragged clothes and dirty faces, from smoking clubs and the back courts where they were wont to spend their Sabbaths in gambling, rude play, and wild merriment. For two years she persevered in this course, willing to spend and be spent for Christ; nor abandoned a work she loved so well till failing health compelled her to resign it into the hands of others. Nor were her efforts to bless and save these boys confined to Sundays. They engaged all her spare time throughout the week. This noble girl, abundant in labours in season and out of season, so soon as the day's work was over, took her way to the homes of the boys—if homes many of their lodgings could be called. . . . Many a night she might have been seen by the glare of the drinking shops that threw their lights into the thick air, wending her lonely and weary way, an angel in disguise, on her errands of mercy, through the ruffian crowd of the city's darkest, foulest streets. . . . God owned her labours. . . . So distinguished, indeed, from others of the same class and calling, by their superior industry, decency, freedom from profane language, and general good account, were those under her training, that 'Mary Anne's boys' became a proverb in the foundries. . . . Some are now teaching Sabbath-schools, and adorning the doctrine of God their Saviour, whom, be it remembered, not ministers, nor preachers, nor parents, but this poor factory girl, 'turned from the error of their ways.'"

Such was the labour which resulted in the foundation of the great Glasgow Foundry Boys' Religious Society, which, at first confined to those employed like Mary Anne's original protégés, is now extended to include working boys of every other class, and working girls as well. Its operations are divided into four great branches: one, aiming directly and incessantly at the highest life of the rising race for time and for eternity; the second, gathering the children together for gratuitous instruction, with sewing for the girls, and sometimes a drawing lesson for the boys; the third, or social reform department, dealing with such matters as drill exercises, flute bands, singing classes, Saturday-evening entertainments, excursions into the country on Saturday afternoons, and on one great annual festival for a whole week at a time; while the last, or provident department, labours at such prosaic matters as savings banks, cheap clothing schemes, and the like, and by its excellent management secures that the popular and attractive parts of the society's programme shall be actually more than self-supporting!

Such is the great tree of munificence which has grown from the mustard-seed planted by Mary Anne Clough. If wisely watched and managed, as we cannot doubt it will be, to suit the changing exigencies of time and circumstance, who knows but it may grow on with increasing strength for centuries!

We have ourselves watched the early developments of a somewhat kindred movement in the opening of a room in a great Northern capital for the evening rest and recreation of working girls of the lowest class. Three sisters, two of whom were dressmakers, and the third a day-school teacher, had their hearts touched by the tales they heard of the miseries and temptations of this class of girls, when away from home, or having homes that are worse than none. They did not want to hear, and then only shake their heads and sigh. They wanted to do something. They enlisted the sympathy of friends, they collected funds to pay the rent of a room in a "close" off the dismal "High Street," and then, night after night, and at every other leisure hour, they literally "gave themselves" to the cheer and help of their sadder, weaker sisters. Their "club-room" is fairly launched now, and has inspired "branches" of varying utility in various other places. It is a work beset with difficulty. Among its undoubted benefits is its introduction of utterly helpless and friendless girls to those who can give them aid and advice, who can place those who are dying of overwork and insufficient food in convalescent homes, or with kind Christian people who will bridge for them the otherwise hopeless gulf which separates those engaged in rough factory labour from the safer and healthier paths of decent domestic service. Among its dangers are the possible friendly association by its introduction of still respectable girls with those who are undesirable companions, and the temptation its concerts, games, etc., may give to the "gadding about" of girls who have decent homes, where they should be learning the duties of domesticity in the society of parents and little brothers and sisters. Nobody is more alive to these difficulties of the scheme than are its original promoters, and yet, so long as the whole is kept under loving personal supervision, most of these may be averted. Even in the discovery of these drawbacks, the lesson and encouragement of their prompt and earnest effort remains, since it is ever true that if—

"I reach a duty, yet I do it not,
I therefore see no higher; but if done,
My view is brightened, and another spot
Seen on my moral sun,

"For, be the duty high as angel's flight,
Fulfil it, and a higher will arise,
E'en from its ashes. Duty is infinite—
Receding as the skies.

"And thus it is, the purest most deplore
Their want of purity. As fold by fold,
In duties done, falls from their eyes, the more
Of duty they behold.

"Were it not wisdom, then, to close our eyes
On duties crowding only to appal?
No: Duty is our ladder to the skies,
And climbing not, we fall."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

THE CAPTIVITY AND RESTORATION OF JUDAH.

NO. 12. THE IMPIOUS FEAST.

To read—Daniel v.

HE FEAST. (1—4.) Twenty years since events in chapter iv.; Belshazzar, grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, now reigning in Babylon. A great feast held—probably at some religious festival. Notice the characteristics of the feast.

(a) Merriment—mirth, song, eating and drinking.
 (b) Security—no heed given to enemy at gates—army of Cyrus besieging Babylon—trusted to strong walls, etc.

(c) Impiety—drank out of holy vessels from the Temple—praised the false gods.

II. THE HANDWRITING. (5—9.) Revelry suddenly stops. King sees the hand of a man writing on the wall. Who is it? Probably an angel. King full of fear. Notice his face is pale with terror. His limbs tremble. His thoughts (i.e. conscience) trouble him.

He offers a reward for an explanation.

III. THE WISE MAN. (10—24.) The news spreads through the palace, reaches the Queen. She comes in, reminds him of Daniel. What character does she give him?

(a) Holy because God's spirit in him.

(b) Wise because taught of God.

So Daniel is sent for. Old man of eighty-two comes in. The King tells his difficulty—asks Daniel to interpret—offers rich rewards. What does Daniel say? He refuses the gifts, as Elisha did those of Naaman. (2 Kings v. 16.) He reminds the king of the story of his grandfather's life—how God had humbled him and lifted him up again. He rebukes Belshazzar for his wickedness—he had not humbled his heart—he had not glorified God, but had insulted Him in this impious feast.

IV. THE INTERPRETATION. (25—31.) This was the meaning—

Mene, Mene, "numbered, numbered"—the kingdom was reckoned up—its days finished.

Tekel, "weighed," i.e. tried in the balances and found wanting.

Uparsin, "divided," i.e. broken up. Part of the word, "Pares," also meaning "Persia."

King did reward Daniel, but did not himself repent. That night Persians, having drawn off waters of Euphrates, which watered the city, into another channel, stole up dry bed of river, took the city, and killed the king.

God's word soon came true.

V. LESSONS. 1. A day of reckoning certain. Belshazzar, feasting and forgetting God—thought only of this life. Like "rich fool" in parable—his soul that night required of him. (St. Luke xii. 20.) So will ours be.

2. The blessedness of a good conscience. What a contrast between the king trembling and aged Daniel fearing God. Innocency will bring peace at the last. (Ps. xxxvii. 37.)

NO. 13. THE DEN OF LIONS.

To read—Daniel vi.

I. DANIEL HONOURED. (1—9.) Darius, set over kingdom of Babylon by Cyrus, sets vast kingdom in order—appoints 120 officers (satraps) over provinces (called princes Dan. iii. 2, and lieutenants Ezra viii. 36). Daniel one of three chief presidents. Notice his position; it was one of—

(a) Great power. Lived almost like a king: ruling other officers, appointing and collecting taxes, judging causes, etc.

(b) Great temptation. Power almost unlimited—might have been unjust, tyrannical, etc.; also could have levied unfair taxes, been dishonest, etc. How did he behave?

The other presidents hated him. Why?

His honesty put them to shame. Besides, he was a Jew—a stranger—put over them. So their envy led them on to malice and hatred. What charge can they bring against him? Only his religion. He was faithful, honest, diligent, but he prayed to God. So they set a trap to catch him. Got the king to sign a decree that no prayer was to be said to any but him for thirty days.

II. DANIEL TRIED. (10—17.) As soon as decree was signed, what did he do? Went to his house as usual, did his day's work, and said his prayers as usual. Notice about his prayers; they were—

(a) Regular—three times a day—at the third, sixth, and ninth hours. (Ps. lv. 17.)

(b) Reverent—kneeling on his knees.

(c) Full—not hurried over; though he was "Prime Minister," he "prayed and gave thanks."

(d) Open—did not seek to conceal himself, but kept up Jewish custom of looking to Jerusalem. (See 1 Kings viii. 47—50.)

Meanwhile his enemies watched, saw, reported to the king. The king was sorry—saw how a trap had been laid; but must keep the law once made—yet knows something of Daniel's God—believes He will deliver him.

III. DANIEL SAVED. (18—24.) Contrast the king and the prisoner.

(a) The King—restless, disturbed—can neither eat nor sleep.

(b) The Prisoner—quiet, happy—has had presence of God's angel—comfort of a good conscience.

Now the king rejoices; Daniel is rescued, his enemies destroyed.

King does his best to undo the past.

(a) He acknowledges God publicly.

(b) He commands all in his kingdom to fear God.

(c) He honours Daniel.

IV. LESSONS. 1. The value of prayer. Daniel called on God daily. God heard and helped him in trouble.

2. The value of courage. Daniel serving God openly—not afraid to die; won over whole kingdom to God.

3. The ministry of angels. (See Heb. i. 14.)

NO. 14. DANIEL THE PROPHET.

To read—various passages.

INTRODUCTION. Have had several lessons from book of Daniel. So far have read of the events in his life and of the kings of Babylon with whom he was connected. Historical part of the book ends with chapter vi. Rest of the book contains prophecies. Can now sum up the story of his life and character.

I. HIS LIFE. (a) Youth. Remind how at age of fourteen refused to defile himself with the king's meat—chose plain food and water in preference to wine.

An example of temperance and soberness.

At age of seventeen made president of whole province of Babylon. (ii. 48.) Ruled long and well—continued in high office, esteemed and loved during reign of Nebuchadnezzar and succeeding kings.

An example of diligence and faithfulness.

(b) Old age. Was as much valued by Cyrus and Darius, the Persian kings who conquered Babylon, as by those who reigned before. Made Prime Minister by Darius. (vi. 2, 3.) Most likely he it was appointed by Cyrus to write decree that Jews might return to Jerusalem. (Ezra i. 1, 2.) All this time noted for two things—doing his duty to God and man. Remind of his praying three times daily. Also setting apart time for special prayer and fasting on behalf of the people. (ix. 3, etc.)

An example of earnest prayer.

All this time so diligent in business as to win respect from all. Even enemies could find no fault.

Like Joseph, found favour with his master—trusted, revered, honoured. His hoary head indeed crown of glory, because found in way of righteousness. (Prov. xvi. 31.)

An example of faithfulness.

II. A TYPE OF CHRIST. In the following ways:—

DANIEL.	CHRIST.
Called Son of Man. (viii. 17.)	Called Son of Man. (St. Matt. xii. 8.)
Greatly beloved. (ix. 23.)	"This is my beloved Son." (St. Matt. iii. 17.)
Prince of House of David. (i. 4, 6.)	The same. (St. Luke i. 32.)
A man of sorrow. (vi. 17.)	Christ in Garden. (St. Matt. xxvi. 37.)
Prayed for the people. (ix. 3.)	Prayed for disciples, etc. (St. John xvii. 1.)
Princes raged against him. (vi. 6.)	Rulers against Christ. (Ps. ii. 2.)
Promoted to honour. (vi. 28.)	Exalted at God's right hand. (Phil. ii. 9.)

LESSON. Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life.

NO. 15. DANIEL'S PROPHECIES.

To read—various passages.

I. VISION OF FOUR BEASTS. (vii. 1—14.) Daniel an old man, over eighty, specially favoured by God with view of future. Had visions in night—like Ezekiel (Ezek. xxxvii. 1), and St. John at Patmos (Rev. i. 9, 10). This vision corresponds with four empires figured in Nebuchadnezzar's dream of image (chapter ii.) :—

(a) Lion with eagle's wings—kingdom of Babylon strong and swift to conquer.

(b) Bear devouring much flesh—kingdom of Persia swallowing up other kingdoms.

(c) Leopard with four wings and heads—kingdom of Greece, noted for activity and intelligence.

(d) Fourth beast with iron teeth and nails of brass—great Roman Empire—would subdue and stamp down other nations. As in Nebuchadnezzar's dream stone destroyed the image, so in this a little horn destroys the great beast. This is a Person—even Jesus Christ—the Ancient of Days—being in the beginning with God. (St. John i. 3.) He shall reign for ever. His Kingdom alone not to be destroyed.

LESSON. At the name of Jesus every knee shall bow.

II. PROPHECY OF CHRIST'S COMING. (ix. 17—27.) The seventy years' captivity nearly come to an end. Daniel reads prophecies of Jeremiah (verse 2) and gives up time to solemn prayer and intercession. Notice—

(a) He humbles himself in sackcloth and ashes (verse 3).

(b) He confesses his own and people's sins (verse 5).

(c) He acknowledges God's goodness and mercy (verse 9).

(d) He prays God to behold city and Temple lying waste (19).

His prayer at once heard. Angel Gabriel sent quickly from heaven to comfort him and tell him of coming of Christ.

Prophecy literally fulfilled.

Time was seven weeks of years—i.e. forty-nine years—from decree of Artaxerxes to the restoration of Jerusalem.

Threescore and two weeks—i.e. sixty-two weeks—of years (434 years) to the beginning of Christ's ministry.

Notice how Christ fulfilled the rest of the prophecy.

(a) He made reconciliation (24) by His sacrifice.

(b) He brings in righteousness.

(c) He seals up—i.e. fulfils—all prophecy.

(d) He makes intercession for us.

After His death Jerusalem was destroyed (verse 26).

The last end shall be with trouble and desolation by the punishment of the wicked, and then will follow the final triumph of Christ.

LESSONS. (a) The ministry of angels. Daniel saved in the den of lions, and visited during prayers. This still their work. (Ps. xxxiv. 6, 7.)

(b) The triumph of Christ. Sorrow, trial, war, etc., prevail for time. Christ shall finally bring peace and joy.

2. Thy ministering spirits descend,
To watch, while Thy saints are asleep;
By day and by night they attend,
The heirs of salvation to keep:
Bright seraphs, despatched from the throne,
Repair to their stations assigned;
And angels elect are sent down,
To guard the elect of mankind.

3. Their worship no interval knows;
Their fervour is still on the wing;
And while they protect my repose,
They chant to the praise of my King.
I, too, at the season ordained,
Their chorus for ever shall join;
And love and adore, without end,
Their faithful Creator and mine.

MAGGIE'S WATCH.

A STORY FOR CHILDREN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "ANYHOW STORIES," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

MONTREUX, as all grown-up people, and even a good many children, know, is a very lovely place far away in Switzerland. It is on Lake Lemman, that beautiful lake through which the Rhone, wandering from its valley, goes on and on between the mountains towards the city of Geneva, whence it again sets forth on its travels alone. It is nearly at the head of the lake where the mountains are grandest—great mountains, that only part sufficiently to form a gateway for the Rhone Valley, with the river in its midst. It is through that gateway that the river finds the lake. In winter the mountains and all the places at their feet are covered with snow, and straight through the little town of Montreux the folk go sledging, while down all the sloping paths the children whisk so fast on their little wooden sleighs that they become a mere flash of black stockings and bright woollen caps. But in summer the lake is bluest blue, and the mountains are every shade of misty colour that light and warmth can make them: blue, and violet, and softest grey. There are dark masses of fir-trees on their sides, and here and there the little clouds cling to them. Sometimes they are quite hidden by clouds in the early morning, and then it seems as if the heavens had stooped to lovingly wrap them round. Altogether, they are as beautiful as Mother Nature knows how to make her children. For do you not often feel that the woods, and forests, and mountains, and flowing rivers are all Nature's children? How proud she is of them in the summer, when the sun makes her rich, and she can dress them gaily and rejoice in their beauty! In the winter she is poor, but she gives them all she can—her berries and the few green things that are left her—and at last she covers them with soft white snow, and waits till it shall please her lord, the sun, to come back and make her rich once more. And then, how she rejoices in his smiles! She decks her children in her best, and together they make that most beautiful time that we call Summer.

A great many people go to Montreux all the year round, for it is always lovely, and in the winter it is said to be good for people who are not strong. Maggie thought she should like to stay there for ever; it was quite difficult to understand how anyone who had once seen it could like being anywhere else. To be sure, as yet she had only been there a fortnight—over the end of August and the beginning of September—but she felt certain that she could never like any other place again. She only wondered all the world did not come there and live; and it never occurred to her how much all the world would spoil it. The only thing that grieved her was that Janet had not seen it, and while she was wishing and wishing that Janet could be suddenly dropped down by her side, mother told her that she had taken a little flat at Montreux for the whole winter, and so they would not go back to England till the spring.

"And as I have sent home for Janet and nurse," mother added, "they will be here in ten days." At this Maggie simply jumped for joy, for no one knew how much she had longed to see Janet again.

Maggie and mother had been travelling for months with Auntie Vee, as they always called Aunt Victoria, but now Auntie Vee was going home, and mother, and Maggie, and the nurse were to settle down at Montreux. Maggie was nine years old, and Janet was seven, so they were quite little girls, and they were very fond of each other. They had not at all liked being separated, especially in the summer; but Auntie Vee, who was delicate, had said she could only have one little girl with her; so Maggie was taken abroad, and Janet was left at home on a visit to grandmamma.

And now a very important thing happened to Maggie. It was the day before Auntie Vee went back to England, while they were still staying at the hotel at Montreux, before the flat was ready, and of course before Janet had arrived. It was after luncheon (for Maggie dined late, just like a grown-up person, when they were staying at hotels), and while they were sitting in the shady garden that went right down to the lake. Mother was knitting, Auntie Vee had been reading, but now she had put down her book, and was evidently thinking. Maggie stood leaning over the wall looking down at the lake, trying to count the fishes, for the water was so clear she could almost count even the pebbles at the bottom. Over them all three, over the walk, and the little lawn with the seats, the great shady trees spread out their branches, keeping off the rays of the morning sun. They were not very tall, but they were the very shadiest trees that Maggie had ever seen. She thought sometimes that they must be like the trees in terribly hot climates, where tigers and lions lived, for she had often read of forests that were dark and cool in the mid-day sun. It was very hot at Montreux just then—really too hot; it was all very well for the fishes who could swim about in the nice cool water, which no doubt was much better than any umbrella, and she didn't mind it when she was beneath the trees, but—"Maggie!" said Auntie Vee. Of course Maggie instantly forgot all about fishes and trees and lions and tigers, and went and stood beside Auntie Vee. Auntie Vee kissed her, and looked at her very thoughtfully for a minute, and then in a most grave voice she spoke. "My dear," she said, "you have been a very good little girl since you came abroad with us, and I should like you to have something in remembrance of our travels. Now tell me, what would you like best?"

Of course Maggie was much surprised and delighted. The colour came to her face; she considered for a minute; then, leaving Auntie Vee with a kiss, she went and put her arms round mother's neck.

"Might I have a little dog?" she asked.

But mother, remembering that the landlady of the flat to which they were going had a little white dog with a sandy tail, answered—

"No, my pet, not a dog, for the little dog belonging answered, and perhaps looked foolish, she wanted to be quite sure that this was not a dream. She looked at mother. Yes, there was mother—real mother, and not in a dream, with the catseye whistle fastened to her chain. And there was Auntie Vee, with her beautiful cap, and hair streaked with grey, and her dear, sad face, that seemed to say something Maggie didn't understand, but that often made her long to go and kiss her.

"Maggie stood leaning over the wall, looking down at the lake."—p. 268.

to the house in which we are going to live might not agree with it."

So Maggie thought again, and looked up suddenly, as if she were about to speak, but said nothing, only the flush on her cheek grew deeper, and a puzzled look came to her eyes.

"I wonder if she would like a watch?" said Auntie Vee.

"A real watch?" asked Maggie, doubting.

"Yes, dear, a real watch, of course," answered Auntie Vee, with a smile.

Maggie waited for a moment, as if to remember whether she was awake, or had dropped off to sleep and was in the midst of a dream. Dreams were so disappointing, for though they often had really lovely things in them, yet she could never take them out of the dream, and put them under her pillow ready to play with when she was awake. So, before she

"A real watch!—oh," and then she hid her face on mother's shoulder, and gave a little cry for joy, and of course there was no occasion to say any more. No one wants you to say "Yes" when you are so pleased you really can't, especially when it seems much too small a word with which to say how glad and surprised you are.

"Then it shall be a watch," said Auntie Vee. "Suppose we go and buy it at once!"

"Oh yes, at once!" Maggie exclaimed, thinking that this was the most delightful afternoon she had ever known. So she ran up-stairs as fast as she could, and tumbled once on the way, but didn't mind a bit, she was so excited, and she put on her big white hat, and hunted everywhere for her gloves, till she remembered that she had left them in her blue-dress pocket, where of course she found them, and then they all set out to choose the watch.

They looked in at every jeweller's shop in Montreux. It was very difficult to decide which watch to choose, for all displayed charming ones in their windows, but at last they thought one looked nicer than the rest, so they went in, and there they found a dear little silver hunter that was wound up without a key.

"Oh, Auntie Vee! I should like a watch without a key," Maggie said. "I am quite sure a key would be always getting lost; besides, it might not fit. It wouldn't if it was too large, you know, or too small."

"That is quite true," Auntie Vee answered.

"And then," Maggie continued, "I like this watch so much because it has a lid just like mother's gold one, and it won't be so likely to get broken. Oh, I should be so miserable if I had a watch and it was broken!" So the little keyless hunter was bought; the man put it into a dark leather case, and Maggie carried it back to the hotel herself, feeling so happy she really did not know whether she was her real self, or quite by accident had been changed into somebody else.

Mother and Auntie Vee said they would have afternoon tea in the garden, for they were never tired of sitting beneath the shady trees; and as soon as Maggie had finished her cup of milk, she went and looked over the wall at the water again, which she was never tired of doing. The fishes were swimming as briskly as ever; she wondered if they knew about her watch; she longed to call down and tell them about it. She wished she were quite alone, so that she might do nothing but look at it, instead of pulling the case out of her pocket every two minutes, opening it, taking one long look at the contents, and then slipping it back into her pocket again. Then she wished that someone would ask her what time it was, and just as she wished this, mother, sitting by the little table behind, said—

"What time is it, my Dickie-bird?" for she often called her little blue-eyed girl Dickie-bird. Maggie thought it sounded nicer than her real name—more as if mother loved her very much indeed.

"I'll tell you," said the Dickie-bird joyfully. She opened the case, took out the watch, touched the little spring, up flew the lid, as she called it, and there were the two hands and the little white face. "A quarter to five," she said absently, and very gravely; for suddenly she had thought of something that had come into her head the moment the watch was bought, and kept coming back again and again. "May I get on your lap, mother?" she asked, and before mother could answer Maggie was there. "I want to speak to you," she whispered.

"What is it?" mother asked, putting her face down to Maggie's, for she saw that no one else was to hear. Maggie looked up half afraid, and turned to Auntie Vee.

"I don't want you to hear, Auntie darling," she said very gently, "but it is not anything about you." Then getting as close as possible to mother, she whispered, so that no one else in the world could hear, "I do so wish Janet had a watch!"

THREE TRANSFIGURATIONS.

(EXODUS XXXIV. 30; ST. LUKE IX. 29; ACTS VI. 15.)

BY THE REV. T. M. MORRIS, IPSWICH.

IN these three Scriptures we have reference to three very remarkable incidents in three very remarkable lives. These incidents are distinguished by obvious and unmistakable differences, and yet, when more closely and carefully examined, they will be found to present several striking points of similarity and correspondence.

The three scenes, circumstantially considered, are very different, each incident fitting in, quite characteristically, with the remarkable life in which it occurred.

In the first scene we have Moses coming down from his lengthened interview with Jehovah on the mount which was touched, and as he enters the camp we can see Aaron and all the people falling back from him in astonishment and terror, as they look upon his face, still shining with that strange and supernatural splendour in which his whole nature has been bathed.

In the next scene we have the Lord Jesus, on the Mount of Transfiguration, in rapt communion with His Father, and we are told by those who were "eye-witnesses of His majesty" that they could see, while He was praying, a wonderful and indescribable change pass over Him. He is their Master still; the familiar lineaments are distinguishable, but the fashion of His countenance is altered, and the glory which seems to break forth from His entire person, and in the splendour of which He is transfigured before them, renders even the coarse and humble clothing with which He was attired "white and glistering."

And now we pass from these lonely mountain summits to the crowded court-house of the Jewish Sanhedrim at Jerusalem, the Council having been hastily summoned to inquire into and adjudicate upon certain charges which had been brought against the evangelist Stephen. And we can still see him, standing where accused persons stood, the very spot where his Divine and gracious Master had stood so short a time before, calmly listening to the calumnious charges which were being urged against him. And as he stands there, all who are in that court see the fashion of his countenance alter. But they do not see his face overspread with the pallor of an unmanly fear; they do not see gleaming forth from his eyes the fires of a fierce indignation or of a bitter vindictiveness; they do not see the hard, iron set of countenance which marks a merely stoical resolve and endurance. No; the change which engages the attention of every eye, and fills every heart in that crowded court with astonishment, is a change of a totally different kind. The face upon which all those murderous and malignant eyes are turned is gradually transfigured before them, and in that comparatively dark court-house becomes illuminated and lustrous with a heavenly radiance and beauty, so that everyone there, as he looked upon Stephen, felt as though he were looking rather upon the face of an angel than upon the face of a man.

We can see these three pictures still. The inspired historians, by a few graphic strokes, place them before us distinct, vivid, life-like, each having its own strongly marked and characteristic features; and yet each claiming relationship to the other two in virtue of certain points of similarity and correspondence which can scarcely be overlooked.

That which at once arrests our attention as one of the most remarkable of these points of agreement is the fact that in each case we see what must be regarded as an exceptional season of emotional and spiritual exaltation, associated with and followed by an outward visible change which was instantly recognised by others.

In each of these three cases selected from sacred history—in the first two certainly—we have the manifestation of a supernatural splendour. But if we leave out of account what is supernatural and miraculous, we may take these three instances as suggesting a great and abiding truth or principle, varied and oftentimes striking illustrations of which we are having constantly presented to our notice.

That truth may be thus generally stated:—That we cannot be the subjects of any real, profound spiritual experience, without affording some outward sign and indication of the fact, which those around us, and who are perhaps themselves total strangers to anything like a corresponding experience, cannot fail to appreciate.

What illustrations of this principle have we in the cases now under consideration! Here is Moses coming down from his lengthened communion with God; he has no need to tell those whom he meets where he has been, or with whom. His face, his whole appearance, bear testimony to the company he has been keeping—the atmosphere in which he has been dwelling. A heavenly radiance clings to him, and refuses for a while to “fade into the light of common day.”

Our Saviour's experience on the mount is ever referred to as something exceptional. This was not the first time that He had retired into a mountain apart to pray. These disciples had before this been witnesses of His devotions; but now, as with reverent eyes they look upon their Master as He holds communion with His Father and their Father, with His God and their God, they feel that this is no ordinary season of fellowship, and as they look upon Him in this rapt, ecstatic communion, they see a mysterious change pass over Him, and while He prays the fashion of His countenance alters.

And it need not be said that Stephen's experience at the moment referred to was exceptional. He has come to the supreme crisis in his life. His whole moral, emotional, spiritual nature is highly strung; the tension is extreme, and every chord is ready to vibrate in sympathetic response to those spiritual influences which were playing around and upon him, and to which no one else in all that court was sensible. And as Paul years after, when he stood before Caesar, saw the Lord, invisible to all others, standing by and strengthening him, so we may suppose Stephen saw by his side the loving Saviour, Who had actually stood on that very spot so short a time before, and as he looked with eyes of love and trust into that Divine face, so full of tenderness and pity, his own countenance lighted up at once, and the hard and cruel men who were sitting around him felt as though they were looking upon the face of an angel. In each case, then, we see what was a remarkable and exceptional spiritual experience declared—made known to others by a sign which they could recognise and read—in each case the fashion of the countenance was altered.

We are all familiar with the fact that emotional changes, and those especially which are linked with the more profound experiences of human life, do ordinarily declare themselves by some alteration in the fashion of the countenance. A man's countenance, to a much larger extent than he himself imagines, affords a revelation of his character. The otherwise unexpressed feelings of the heart betray themselves by those slight and subtle facial changes which the most self-possessed of men are not able completely to suppress or control. And if these passing emotions are revealed by signs which are as fleeting and short-lived as themselves, the profounder and more continued experiences of men impart a permanent set and fashion to the countenance. And we have such an instinctive belief in the significance of the human face, that we are always drawing conclusions as to the characters of men from their countenances.

If God has providentially ordered things in such a way, established such a correspondence between the outward and inward, the material and the spiritual, that men can scarcely fail to afford to those around them some indication of the thoughts and feelings of their hearts, even in the common and ordinary experiences of life, are we to suppose that the greatest, the grandest, the most sublime and blessed of all experiences shall make and leave no impression upon a man such as those around him can recognise?

Is it credible that any one can come, we do not say to Mount Sinai, but to Mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and the blessed fellowship of those who are there assembled, and no one know where and with whom he has been? That a man should habitually frequent the company and enjoy the fellowship of the Master, and no one say of him, He has been with Jesus? Or do we think that anyone could, in however humble a way, share the faith, and courage, and self-sacrificing devotion of Stephen, and have all this so completely hidden that no one would recognise the grace of God which was in him?

We might single out any of the experiences of spiritual life, as illustrating the principle we have been considering. Let us take those suggested by the three incidents quoted.

Take first the experience of Moses. We do not know the nature of the manifestation made to him, or the character of the intercourse he had with God on that lonely mountain height—we know, however, that he had the law revealed to him in the light of Divine love. We are apt to think of that Sinaitic revelation as a somewhat hard and ungracious one, but it was far from being so. We can distinguish the blended voices of mercy and judgment, the Gospel and the Law. God makes Himself known as the Redeemer of Israel before He utters the word of command: the First word is, "I am the Lord thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage." Yes, we have the promulgation of law, but even then and there it was law set in the light of love. And when the great legislator came down from the mount, with his heart full of this sublime idea, we need not wonder that his face glowed with a heavenly radiance. And we all remember how the Apostle Paul uses this incident in order to set forth a more distinguished privilege which belongs to all Christian believers. We have a more remarkable revelation than Moses. We have the Law more evidently set in the light of love. We have the glory of God shining upon us from the face of Jesus Christ. We have such a display of redeeming love and grace as was never vouchsafed before, and "we all, with unveiled face, reflecting as a mirror the glory of the Lord, are transformed into the same image from glory to glory, as from the Lord the Spirit." The result of seeing the glory of God in Christ is moral and spiritual conformity to Christ—not a merely temporary reflection of the glory, but a permanent transformation.

If we look to the great example of our Divine Redeemer, the special phase of spiritual experience brought under our notice is that which we speak of as prayer, communion with our Father. We are told that He ascended this mountain in order that He might pray, and there, lifted above the noise, and tumult, and excitement, and manifold distracting influences of this world, we see our Saviour in prayer, and while He prayed the fashion of His countenance was altered. If our Saviour sought such moments of retirement, if He found it needful to have seasons of special communion, we certainly cannot do without prayer. We need strength and inspiration for our life and our work. If we shut ourselves off from God, from Christ, from the Holy Spirit, from the invisible world, by neglect or restraint of prayer, that neglect will not be hidden, but will make itself known by an impoverished and enfeebled life. But, on the other hand, if we live as enduring the sight of Him who is invisible, if we are in the habit of holding intercourse and communion with God in prayer, that fact will declare itself in our lives, our characters, our spirit and temper, perhaps even in our very faces. We cannot frequent the Mount of Communion without its becoming to us the Mount of Transfiguration.

If we look to Stephen, we see the glorification of life, the energies of which are going forth in unstinted and untiring activity, in noble and uncomplaining endurance. He appears to have been a clever, competent man, and on that account was probably chosen with the others to serve the Church in the diaconate, but he was also an eminently devout man, full of faith and of the Holy Ghost, a man of fine, well-balanced character, not slothful in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord—just the man to live the life and do the work which in merest outline we have set before us by the evangelist: an able, active, devout man, whose religion was affording sufficient and continual proof of itself in many ways, and which never declared itself so remarkably and so illustriously as when, standing there in the crowded council-chamber, those who looked upon him "saw his face as it had been the face of an angel." And so, if we have Stephen's spirit, and, like him, are full of faith and of the Holy Ghost, in the activities of life which tax to the utmost our energies, and in the sufferings of life which tax to the utmost our powers of endurance, we may afford a display of the power and beauty and glory of religion which will impress men with a deeper sense of its reality and worth than perhaps anything else could.

Do we share in any degree the experiences we have been considering? Let us not forget that they should be associated with certain visible, appreciable changes in life, character, temper, spirit, speech, which those around us, and who are themselves strangers to such experiences, shall not fail to recognise.

WINTER FRIENDS

THE winter daylight softly closes,
A crimson flush is in the sky,
The shadow of our dead June roses,
Or those that only sleeping lie.
No fair white carpet in the garden,
No diamond pendant from the eaves,
Only a murmur of prayer or pardon,
Under the glistening laurel leaves.

And while the sad grey clouds come darkening
And blending into solemn night,
I linger in the twilight, hearkening
For tender voices, footsteps light !
Voices and footsteps long departed,
Forgot by others, come to me ;
I hear them when I'm lonely hearted,
Above the winds and murmuring sea.

But never when the earth is ringing
With joy and gladness can I hear
The angel voices softly singing,
The angel footsteps drawing near :
Never when all is mirth and gladness,
Never when summer suns are bright ;
Only in hours of restful sadness,
They cheer me through the winter night.

H. BROOKE DAVIES.

CLEANING THE CORNERS.

A FRIEND of mine once told me that when he was a boy his father one day sent him to clean the windows. He got a cloth, and began rubbing away at the panes. By-and-by his father came to see how the work was getting on. He found the little fellow rubbing at the middle of a pane, where it was already clean, and never touching the corners, which were full of dirt; and said, "Never mind the middles of the panes—they are always clean; clean the corners, clean the corners!"

That boy never forgot what his father said, and afterwards saw how well it applied to his life and the lives of others, as well as to window-panes.

The most of us are fairly respectable people, and I trust not a few of us real Christians. We avoid big sins and all sorts of common wickedness; but I fear some of us do not watch enough against little sins and shortcomings, and especially we do not give heed enough to the cultivation of the Christian graces, which make life so bright and beautiful. We are really very good. We are not thieves, liars, swearers, nor drunkards. We have a character to keep up, and the rub of the respectable world, without much trouble on our part, keeps it—keeps the middle of the pane clean, even where there is not much of Christian principle. It costs us no trouble to keep it clean; in fact, I may say it keeps itself clean. But what about the corners? "Oh," you say, "it does not much matter about them; they are but corners—nobody heeds about them." So you leave them to be a spider's den, full of cobwebs and dirt and the remains of dead flies. But it does matter. It is slovenly housekeeping. Many a bright character-pane is all but spoiled by its dirty corners. When people go to look at the sunlight through it, their eye at once catches the cobwebs, and the very sunbeams seem to have a tint of dirt in them. Many a noble-hearted Christian, whose walk is guided by sterling principle, has his influence for good greatly hindered by some small but objectionable cobweb or dead fly in the corner, to which he pays no attention.

There is Mr. A, who is the very soul of honesty in his business, and would scorn to take advantage of any man. He pays his accounts when due, and owes no man anything. But then he takes care they do not owe him either. Not that he means to be merciless—far from it; he will put his hand in his pocket without a grudge to help the needy, and is a liberal giver. But business is business, and he is one of those who have a terrible idea of exactness and punctuality—excellent points if not too rigorously applied—and never thinks of the straits to which he sometimes puts a poor debtor who could honestly plead, "Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all." And so he gets the name of being a hard-hearted, pitiless man, and his good deeds are very much forgotten.

Then, on the other hand, there is Mr. B, who does not pay his bills when they are due. Sometimes he is easy-going, and when an account comes in if he has not the money handy he does not put himself to any trouble to get it, and forgets all about it until the account comes in again and again. Sometimes he is greedy, and grudges to pay, and keeps and uses the money as long as he can, while he pays no interest—money that then belongs to another, mind you. He considers himself perfectly honest because he will pay sometime, and thinks his creditors ought to be thankful to get their money at some distant date. But he forgets that his creditors have also bills to pay, and what are they to do if they are not paid themselves? He forgets that every day he keeps their money after it is due, he is robbing them of what it would be worth to them, as certainly as if he put his hand into their pockets and took it. That little cobweb of dishonesty in the corner needs a smart wipe. And Mr. A would be just the man to do it.

We sometimes also see the light of a Christian's life greatly obscured by the corners being dusty with small meannesses, and miserable economies and savings, which would not enrich him though he lived as long as Methuselah and added them all up, and which give his name an ill savour. For a wretchedly small pecuniary gain he suffers a great big loss in moral and spiritual influence. The man who would split a halfpenny with you is held in even greater contempt than the man who would keep it altogether to himself, and his power for good is correspondingly lessened. There is such a thing as economy run into extravagance. Give the brush of generosity fair play, especially in very little things; the loss is small and the gain is great.

But it is in social life, more than in commercial, that dusty corners abound. A man may be guided by high principles. None question his truth and uprightness. He would think it a grave sin to swear—so it is—but he hardly seems to think he is breaking a command when in a selfish fit he is grumpy to his wife and family. Yet the same authority that forbids bad words forbids needless harsh words.

Another, a good man too, may be troubled, or rather a troubler of others, with a sharp, sarcastic tongue. Now, sarcasm is a good weapon, and very effective, when used on proper occasions. Such times occur but seldom, and that sword must be used but seldom and with great tact, for it has two edges, and may cut ourselves as well as others by stirring up needless resentment. "The heart of the wise teacheth his mouth."

There is no truer saying than that "evil is wrought by want of thought as well as want of heart." Men and women, full of kindly feeling and good intention, are continually doing and saying things that cause trouble to themselves and others. "I never thought of it," is their excuse. But why did you not think? It was your duty to think.

There is an equally grimy angle that stands opposite. That is the littleness of spirit that takes offence at thoughtless words and small things, where little or no offence was intended. Yet there is nothing more common, or poisons social intercourse more than that. One person makes a thoughtless remark, meaning no ill. The other takes umbrage, shows it, tells acquaintances about it. The first wonders at that, and is sorry, but pride comes to his aid, and he is not going to eat humble pie—that is, he will not condescend to explain or apologise and get the difference smoothed over, which is what he ought to do if he had either wisdom or manliness. And so it goes on, till the molehill probably becomes a mountain; unless some mutual friend, who knows the matter, wisely and kindly intervenes. To the same perverted category belong all the petty spites, and huffs, and standing on dignities, and cold-shoulderings, that nip like hoar-frost many a sweet summer-growth of social intercourse, to the great discomfort of all concerned. Away with such unchristian nonsense! Let us all be above such miserable meanness; let us be men and women, and not children.

"Be not soon angry," is a wise injunction. We all know people who are ready on the smallest occasion to fire up and explode in a most unreasonable manner. The temper corner—if I may call it that—is a notable one to keep bright. Even the best of men in a passion are apt to say things they bitterly regret afterwards; and others regret it too, for "grievous words stir up anger"—one fire kindles another, and you cannot tell what it may end in. A hot temper is sometimes christened high spirit, but it often brings its possessor very low—when the flush of passion gives place to the blush of shame; at least it ought to, if the man has any spirit at all. But there are those who seem to think that other people should respect their temper. They lament their misfortune in having it; but there it is, and nobody should say a word in objection, lest it bite. They have no thought of muzzling it themselves, or do not want the trouble. But a quick temper is a powder magazine; take care! And there is always plenty of combustible material dangerously near. "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city."

Another corner is home rule: I mean in its most local and limited sense—in the home. Good rule there is the foundation of a nation's righteousness and stability—a foundation deeper and broader than any Parliament can ever lay. Well, we sometimes find fairly good home rule combined with a spice of despotism and capriciousness. Where perfect obedience is required the laws should all be just and reasonable, and carried out in like manner. But sometimes they are too strict, and youthful ingenuity learns to evade them on the sly, and lie about it in act if not in word. A too strait-laced government will produce either rebellion or deception. Then, on the other side, is too slack a rule. Disorder is allowed until it runs riot, and then punishment is often dealt out promiscuously, in a passion, or out of all proportion to the crime, which the victims naturally resent, and get hardened instead of feeling corrected. One of the worst possible methods is the enforcing of good advice by dreadful stories about the goblins that will catch those who don't take it. Young people soon outgrow that, and see with contempt the dusty corner.

Once more: why are some good people never able to get on with other good people? Evidently one or both parties have an obscure corner or two to clean. Along with sterling virtues, and many good qualities, they may be too self-willed, opinionated, or have some unpleasant odd cranks and twists, or maybe they are what the Scotch call "pernickety," too particular, having one or more small disagreeable ways, and bothersome little formal rules of life, which are as unalterable as the laws of the Medes and Persians—things which are no great harm in themselves, but which are a great bore to those who have to put up with them, and especially to those who have to serve them. I believe if they had to stand the same thing from others they would find it about as irksome as wearing a strait jacket. "Oh, well," you say, "of course it isn't nice among our acquaintances; but aren't servants hired to do our work?" Certainly; but they are not hired to put up with your irritating peculiarities as well. Try to put yourself in their place, and how would it feel to meekly bear it all? Remember, "as ye would that others should do unto you, do ye even so unto them." That is the rule, and in its application the Bible draws no line where to stop; it includes all. By walking in an atmosphere of Christian politeness, instead of keeping ourselves and others in hot water, we shall find that with few exceptions we can get on smoothly with others; for "with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again"—not a doubt of it.

These are a few of the corners that need attention; and numerous others will occur to us all. True, the middles of the panes are clean: that is a great matter, and these are but corners. They really do not so much obscure the light as that they are not nice to look at—they indicate neglect. Then they always catch the eye of those who may be getting light through our windows; and human nature is so apt at seeing the dirt instead of the light. This, by the way, is another corner—a bad one—which it is as well to mention while I am at it. Let us look for the good in others—the light and not the cobwebs. But all the same the cobwebs and dirt are unsightly and injurious—sweep them away. How nice it is to see a window with every pane spotlessly clean and transparent! How beautiful the soul that is not only free from open sins, but adorned with all the fair graces of the Spirit of God, and through which the light of the Sun of Righteousness can shine with bright and winning radiance, that others seeing our good works may glorify our Father who is in heaven. How beautiful and fructifying is the pure light of a spotless life! "Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things."

SOME REMARKABLE CHURCH TOWERS.

ST. MICHAEL'S BELFRY, BECCLES.

ALTHOUGH there are probably more churches with towers than without them, and consequently all of us may be supposed to be sufficiently familiar with these grand old structures, it will be seen, on further scrutiny, that some are more curious than others, and worthy of closer examination.

The tower of Jarow church is of rare interest. It is not square, nor nearly so, as most towers are, but measures twenty-one feet one way, north and south, and only thirteen the other way, east and west. And it is more than venerable, more than curiously and cumbrously quaint, in its antiquity. It has ripened and ripened for more than a thousand years, for its stones were first brought to the site by Saxon labourers between three and four hundred years before the Norman Conquest was effected, and though they may have been almost re-set, so to speak, in the course of the subsequent centuries, they are still the same, as far as we know, that formed the tower in the days of Benedict Biscop and the abbot Ceolfrið, that is to say, in the reign of Egfrid. As a fact, it may be mentioned, some north-country antiquaries do not assign an earlier date for this tower than A.D. 1075, when the monastery of Jarow, then lying in ruins, was handed over to one devout Aldwin, who made many improvements in the structure, and reinstated Divine worship within its walls; but it is more than probable these are wrong, and that he only altered it, and left some portions of it untouched. All the Saxon towers in Northumbria still remaining are nearly square, and are placed at the west end of the nave. It seems, then, more than likely that this one followed the rule, and was only broadened out to its present proportions by Aldwin, whose additions westwards also altered its position and made it central, as we now see it. But taking it as handed down to us, it is, as has been said, of rare interest. It is of four stages. On the ground floor, over the chancel arch, on its western face, is embedded the original dedication stone, which has been faithfully preserved, and is inscribed to the following effect:—The “dedication of the Basilica of St. Paul on the ninth of the kalends of May, in the fifteenth year of King Egfrid, and in the fourth year of the Abbot Ceolfrid, under God the founder of the said church.” On the first floor, in the eastern wall, are two arched openings looking eastwards. On the second are two double-light windows on the north pen. Writing of Benedict Biscop, the founder, he says:—“He sent messengers to bring over glass-makers to glaze the windows of the church and its aisles and chancels. And so it happened that when they came they not only accomplished that particular work which was required of them, but from this time they caused the English nation to understand and learn this kind of handicraft, which and south sides, and on the west side, what we may take as evidence that this portion of the tower is part of the original Saxon work—an angular-headed window. And then the walls on the north and south sides are “weathered in,” or sloped towards each other, so that the topmost stage is smaller than the rest. On each side of this are window-openings, all unglazed, and within are the bells. When we take our eyes from the tower and look around, it is impossible not to think of the Venerable Bede, who lived in Jarrow monastery all his long life, and whose chair is still standing in a place of honour in the chancel. Here he worshipped, here he sang, here his beautiful thoughts came to him. We know when he had departed to the heavenly Kingdom, as his scholar Cuthbert has it, he was buried in the south porch, and that his remains were afterwards brought to a still more honourable resting-place within the church, and finally, when the remembrance or impression of his sanctity was deepened and intensified, his bones were removed to Durham Cathedral. And there comes to mind Fuller’s testimony as to the degree of estimation in which he was held:—“If thou art a saint, pray for me,” said a foreign bishop, in accordance with the superstitious practice of his day, as he presented a copper coin at St. Cuthbert’s shrine. “Thou art a saint; pray for me,” he continued, as he offered a crown at the shrine of Bede. We are not without some particulars of the church from his was of no inconsiderable utility for the enclosing of the lamps of the church, or for various uses to which vessels are put.” And from this early adoption of glass arose the old saying that it was never dark in old Jarrow church.

Chesterfield, in the land of minerals and fossils, peaks and dales, stupendous and precipitous rocks or tors, mountain streams and rivulets, that we know as Derbyshire, has a cruciform church of much curiosity on account of its tower. This is capped with a remarkable spire made of wood and covered with lead, which has the appearance of being spirally twisted. Seen from the surrounding country, from any point of view, it has the appearance of inclining towards the spectator. This perplexing feature is not less than 230 feet high.

In the same picturesque county, only away from its rocks and streams, its stalactite caverns and petrifying wells, in the heart of the busy county town, near its Irongate, Sadler Gate, Fryarsgate, St. Mary’s Gate, and Bridgegate, looking down upon the thoroughfares with their factories and constant traffic, and upon the troubled windings of the Derwent, is another remarkable tower. This is in the church of All Saints’, the whole of which was taken down and rebuilt by Gibb, in the last century, except this fine old portion of it, which he saved. It is surmounted by ornamental battlements, and on a fascia below them are inscribed these words:—"Young men and maidens."

The tower of Ancroft church belongs to Plantagenet times. Unlike other towers, it does not rise from the ground upwards, but it has been set on to the west end of a small Norman church that was built without one. We may see the remains of the original Norman edifice, a small grey structure consisting of nave and chancel only, which afforded, doubtless, sufficient accommodation for the sparse population of that day. And then came a time when a tower for security or observation was required, and the old Norman gable that finished the west end was taken down to the level of the side walls, and a strong square tower was built upon the height thus gained. One may see the old Norman stones, all rounded at their edges by centuries of storms, rising to the full height of this first stage, and then we note the different style in which the Plantagenet masons went to work. This church is on the eastern coast of Northumberland, opposite to Holy Island, and it was one of five chapels that belonged to the priory on the island before the Reformation. It has known many fortunes, or misfortunes, for this part of the country was frequently ravaged by the Scots, but it seems to have reached its greatest desolation at the beginning of this century, when it was roofed, like a barn, with red tiles, and a great ash-tree grew in the centre of the tower, which was much dilapidated. It is once more, however, kept in a state of repair that would gladden the hearts of its first Norman builders, and not be without satisfaction to the Plantagenet masons, who so fearlessly raised the tower upon their work.

There is a little dove-coloured church out in the grey and green and heathery moors, in the old moss-trooping part of the same county, so plaintively hoary, antique, and simple that it must not be passed over. It has a tower at the west end, a nave with a north aisle and south porch, and a chancel. The venerable arch between the nave and chancel is a low, wide, sweeping curve, and marks its Norman origin. The pillars of the aisle are cylindrical, and have fluted caps that pass from the round of the pillar to the square of the abacus gracefully, and each channel of the fluted work is enriched with a row of beadlike ornamentation called billet-heading. The interior of the little edifice is as white as snow with whitewash, except for a few damp stains upon it here and there, and except for the lofty three-decker pulpit, with its crimson cushions and fringes, and the rows of dark pews that match it in colour. In some old time, perhaps a century or more ago, a low white ceiling has been placed to hide the older open-timbered roof, that may have admitted too much of the fresh air from the adjacent moors and hills in the sharp winters; and about the same time some alterations were made to the fenestration, and perhaps the outer north wall was rebuilt, for it has been rebuilt almost as a blank. The chief bulk of the edifice, however, is of great antiquity. A Saxon king gave Edlingham, with other lands, to the same monastery on Holy Island to which Ancroft subsequently belonged, and it is recorded that a church was immediately built in it. The tower is of the dimensions of other Saxon towers, but it has none of the distinguishing signs of Saxon masonry by which we can be sure it is of Saxon workmanship—no "long and short" work, no herring-bone work—though it has no distinctive mark of any later period. There is no entrance into it except from the inside of the church; and there is no window in it within the reach of a moss-trooper, even if he were on horseback. Looking closely at the small and narrow doorway through which we have passed into it, we may note it has a narrow, semicircular door-head, and that the great bar that kept the door fast was on the side nearest to the nave, showing that the tower was not used as a place of refuge, but as a place of detention: that the inhabitants of the scattered houses comprising the village did not shut themselves up in it for safety, as might be supposed, but that they shut up in it any prisoners they had taken and wished to detain. At the western angle of the ancient porch a stone projects from its course, as though intended for a mounting-block, from which, in the days of pillion-riding, the congregation could conveniently seat themselves on their horses; but on looking more particularly at it, traces of a circle, as of a rough dial-face, may be made out, which suggests the probability that it did double duty—as block and sundial.

Some Norman towers are encrusted, so to speak, with arcading, as in the case of that of St. Clement's church, in the quaint old Cinque Port, Sandwich. The exterior of this tower is enriched with tier upon tier of small semicircular arches on cylindrical columns, and presents an aspect of the most alluring ripeness and pathetic interest. It seems to tell us of the pomp and circumstance of the centuries it has seen, the musterings of men, the departures for the crusades and wars, the going and coming of the ships the port was obliged to furnish the king, the traffic of its merchants, as well as of the inexorable recession of the sea that has left Sandwich, with its old gateways, its half-timbered and gabled houses, and its grassy boulevards, what it is.

The tower of the handsome and ancient church of Yatton, in Somerset, attracts the eyes of the numerous crowds of travellers who change trains at Yatton junction, for it is surmounted by half a spire, and from the sunken roof of this half-spire rises a glittering vane. It is a very fine building, with many large perpendicular windows, and a clerestory, and with very handsome trefoiled open-work parapets, rising one above the other, on the aisles and their gables, on the nave, on the top of the tower, and on the top of the high turret at one angle of it; and surmounting all this pile of sober yet captivating ornamentation is the stump of a spire.

The tower of Aldwinkle church, in Northamptonshire, reverses these proportions, for it is capped with a spire that is rather more than half the full height of the tower; that is to say, the tower is three stages in height, and the spire is also three stages in height, and then has the addition of a capstone and a vane upon it. The tower is square, and the spire is octagonal, and the way the square dies into the octagon, or is "broached," is cleverly managed. From each stage of the spire are four gablets, diminishing in size with their height. The flatter the country, the taller the spires, as a rule.

Curiously, many of the towers in Norfolk and Suffolk are round. There are in all, in England, about a hundred and seventy-five circular church towers, and, with the exception of about a dozen of them, they are all in Norfolk and Suffolk. Curiously, too, the examples that are not in those counties are close at hand—two are in Berkshire, two in Sussex, one in Surrey, two in Essex, two in Cambridgeshire, and one in Northamptonshire. They are not scattered all over the kingdom. Some of them are only seven feet in diameter, and some of them are as much as nineteen feet. The walls of all of them are about four feet thick. The entrance is always on the east side, from the nave. The original windows are of the smallest dimensions, mere narrow loopholes; but in many cases larger openings have been made at different stages, in subsequent centuries.

Worstead, in Norfolk, familiarly known by name for its production of the twisted yarn known as worsted, has a grand church with a fine fourteenth-century tower, rich with flowing geometrical details, and of similar outlines to the type recognised as Somersetshire and Gloucestershire towers. Buttresses on both sides of each angle "weather in" five times from the base to the topmost stage, where they die into the base of the pinnacles at the four corners. There is no spire, but it is finished with a richly wrought parapet and furnished with grotesque gargoyles to carry off the rain. Each pinnacle is surmounted by a vane. The tower has a feature, however, not common to the cider counties' tower. This is the provision of elaborately perforated air-holes of a rose form, enclosed in squares, with label mouldings, with terminations over them, in the bell-ringers' chamber, in the intermediate stage between the head of the fine west window, over the handsome doorway and the large double-light louvre windows of the belfry stage. These are not of frequent occurrence.

We have several examples of the isolated bell-towers common on the Continent, known as campaniles. In some of the Herefordshire village churchyards, made of the same stone as the ancient churches, decked with the same discs of the same lichens, there stand venerable bell-towers, with their internal timbers only so many rough-hewn trees, all still gallantly performing the part for which they were erected. Some of them are close to the churches, others have a wide length of grassy mounds and white tombstones between them. Some of them are more pretentious, as in that at Ledbury, which stands apart from the church, on the north side of it, and is a truly handsome structure. Suffolk has also a very fine example of an isolated bell-tower in the churchyard of St. Michael's, Beccles. This is truly a fine piece of mediæval architecture, four stages in height, full of sumptuous and interesting details.

The tower of Kibworth church, in Leicestershire, attained a sudden celebrity, one July morning in 1825, by bowing over from the summit to the base, pausing for a few seconds, and then falling to the earth, in the words of an eye-witness, "in a cataract of ruins." Various premonitory symptoms, such as bulgings, fissures, and threatening sounds, had called attention to the decayed condition of parts of it, and workmen were engaged upon the repair of it, when they heard peculiar noises, and they all left it, and gathered together in the churchyard, and watched it till it fell. It was a lofty tower, and with the spire measured 169 feet in height. Fortunately, no one was injured, and a new square tower without a spire, with four pinnacles and a parapet, has since been erected in its place.

We may be sure many an anxious glance was bestowed upon ancient towers presenting signs of decay for some time after this catastrophe. The tower of Hereford Cathedral, for one, was vigilantly scrutinised. And finally it was decided that one by one the piers, or "grand legs," it rested upon should be removed and built up anew and more strongly from the ground. This was actually done. The mighty tower was shored up about forty years ago, and one pier successfully removed, and the ancient fabric rested on the other three piers whilst this was rebuilt, firm, compact, and stalwart. Then another pier was removed and rebuilt; and then the two others. And the immense tower, thus strengthened, still stands in all its old majesty, intact.

We know Peterborough has not been so fortunate at the present day. And only recently one of the "three tall spires" of Coventry was in some danger, owing to dilapidations in the tower, which have, however, been happily remedied without taking it down.

The absolute beauty that is given by towers is, perhaps, exceeded by the sacred grandeur of their associations. "The name of the Lord is a strong tower," we are told. And we can scarcely look upon them without recalling the culmination of the Psalmist, "The Lord is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer; my God, my strength, in whom I will trust; my buckler and the horn of my salvation, and my high tower."

Concerning church spires, especial mention may be made hereafter.

PROMISES FOR THE SORROWING.

BY THE REV. W. MURDOCH JOHNSTONE, M.A., VICAR OF EAST TWICKENHAM.

THE sorrowing have an absolute and unlimited promise for themselves, and Jesus Himself describes their present state as one of blessedness. They are happy now in their sorrow; and hereafter, in God's good time, that sorrow will yield her place to comfort. Most people, indeed, who have felt what agony is, and the bleeding of the heart and the breaking of the spirit, have known a sweet and secret something that hid itself away from the surface, and yet exercised a soft and calming influence over the dismal circumstances of life. It was not a struggling gleam of sunshine or an inspiring blast of the mountain winds of the soul; but rather it was a twilight gloom, a sky of grey and unbroken fate, a quiet eventide, when the man whom disaster has made a sport mingles with the Fixed, Untouched, Eternal One, and feels the strength of His hand and the beneficence of His aid.

The value of the world sinks; the glittering fabrics of fame and wealth dissolve; material things look gross and darksome; and the mind, without an effort, almost without intention, uplifts itself to the great height, and rests in the contemplation of God.

There can hardly be a greater blessing than this. It is for such a condition that the Apostles contended as they asked us to set our affection upon things above, and warned us not to love the world. It was for such that Christ died, imploring us to strive after that spiritual union with Himself and His Father where the soul hungers not and thirsts not, but rests beside the river of life, and underneath the trees that bear their fruit always, and scatter their leaves for the healing of humanity.

We cannot understand sorrow in all its bearings unless we look at it in Him, and in that portion of His life where it culminated—the agony of the last temptation. It is there, in the Garden, that we see: I. How lonely sorrow is. The old words, that the heart knoweth its own bitterness, have found the ages testifying to their truth. Christ, within the very band of those He had taught and led, had not a brother who could bear Him company. No Magdalene was there, nor did Mary of Bethany sit then at His feet to learn the deepest secrets of existence. We are alone in our sorrows. For a time most people are alone with the sorrow itself. Its present weight is on breast and shoulder. It bears a bandit's blade, and it is piercing through every muscle and nerve of suffering. They look it in the face, and it is all loathsome. They question it to themselves, and demand why God sent it or let it come; why Job should groan while the Bildads of earth escape. Besides, sorrow has a subtle power of bringing up the past. Its ghosts are conjured, not for the Sauls of half-hearted godliness, nor the Macbeths of gross ambition and crime, but for the tender mother who weeps by the cradle of the dying babe, and for the hoary saint who mourns the last of the sons he reared. While memory is thus active, both feel too keenly that—

"Ready in the wildest night to respond to far-off signals of distress."

(See p. 315.)

"A sorrow's crown of sorrow is remembering happier things."

In that remembrance there is no companion.

Such a time is indeed a critical moment of life. Sorrow leaves us not as it found us. It is a spiritual agent, and we are hardened by it or softened, drawn nearer to God, or driven into further disobedience and revolt. Blessed is he who discovers in the loneliness of his sorrow that he is alone with God too. I believe that man prays best amid suffering. Fear ceases to haunt him, and earthly hope has lost its lustre. He may be struggling like Christ in the Agony, but it is a struggle like Jacob's, that will not be denied the blessing. There is not only earnestness in it, but the man himself—body, soul, and spirit—is fighting. It is the most real time of life. The gates of brass and bars of iron are real, and with blows fiercer than those which battered in the gate of the Bastille he lays on them with the sledges of prayer.

II. It is in Christ's Agony that we see what the disappointments of sorrow are. Nothing measures friendship so accurately as adversity. It is a test too severe for many a companion of sunny days. It demands for its high standard a range of life and feeling, a culture of gentle perceptiveness and tact, which the worldly schools teach not. We are misunderstood in our sorrow. Not one of the Eleven knew what Christ was doing. No John had yet looked up and seen the heaven of His mystery opened. Oh, it is hard to be slandered by articulate ignorance: hard, while we are alone, to feel that those we have admired and loved bear clownish hearts and sluggish brains. Is it impossible that they should rightly appreciate our suffering? We do not expect that the Judases whom we know should care: nor that the Thomases and Bartholomews should comprehend it all; but it seems that the James, the Peter, the John, who stood beside us in the death-chamber, and talked with us on the hill of glory, and listened to Moses and Elijah too—where the vast spiritual world revealed itself for a minute to the material—might comprehend it somewhat, and not be overpowered by the pangs of sorrow on the mind. But they are asleep—dead to one watching and praying, and dead to the prospects of their own suffering. It is hard for us to bear disappointment in our friends, as it is hard to sit and watch our hearts bleed out, drop by drop, alone. Yet blessed are they that mourn.

(1) There is first the blessedness of prayer. I have remarked that prayer amid sorrow is real above all other prayer. The spirit-world comes into touch with us. The old Word of God, which we learnt and partially understood in earlier life, stands out, a thing of life itself. Its promises that apply to our case are culled and cherished and pleaded. Faith is on its trial. Can it trust these promises now? If they are broken, or if, as he understands them, they are unfulfilled, can he trust himself to the God who lives behind them? It is then that prayer becomes—

"The Christian's vital breath,
The Christian's native air."

And just as the old man revisits the home of his youth, and walks once more the lawn on which he played or the hills over which his boyhood roamed, and feels the hallowed memory of a godly mother upon him again, so do we feel in these prayers of the sorrow-time, that whether we understand or not, whether or not the interpretation of hope and promise was accurate, whether or not either applies to our present case, yet we will trust our Father, and cry, "Thy will be done." This leads us on to see a new blessedness in (2) Submission. There are two kinds of it: viz., helpless surrender, and an active desire that whatever God sees best should be effected. It is because the difference between these is unrecognised that the submissiveness of many an impenitent death-bed is accepted as a proof of conversion and faith. The greatest worldling will give up opposition when he believes it to be useless; yet surrender is not life. I have seldom known a godless man die who was not, as he said, "resigned." But no resignation has any value unless it be accompanied with an active desire that God's will should be done. It was for this Christ prayed. One earthly human need was about Him, but in both clauses of His petition He consulted the Father's wish, and in one He regarded it alone.

Many of the readers of this magazine have no doubt been often compelled to give up their own plans and schemes for the sake of God's: to conquer a temptation that threatened them, or trample down an oppression of sorrow that bade them leave the track of eternal life. I may appeal to their memories, and ask if they did not discover in the moment of their stern resolution a whole Eden of happiness. They had toiled through a dark gorge, unlit by any ray from the sky, unrelieved by flower or stream, and suddenly they saw its end, and stepped out into a perfect paradise of close and of far-reaching beauty. Even here there remaineth a Sabbath-rest for the people of God.

(3) There is the comfort of support. An angel was called by the Father, and sent with His comfort to the Son. He bore the assurance of the Father's sympathy. He was the guerdon of Heaven that Christ was not forsaken, even then. "Father!" he had called: but the heavens responded not. "Father!" a second time went up, and immediately the angel came down. He stood out, like many an earthly friend, at a distance, but came close enough to strengthen Him. The battle was not removed. The temptation rolled not like a thunder-cloud down the Kedron defile, to the grim wastes and fires of Hinnom. But He was able to pray more earnestly than ever, "Thy will be done." No one with anything of chivalry or the high romance of life within him would flee from earth's trials. There is no Strong-heart shaped without them; and what we yearn for is courage and strength to contend and to conquer. Here, again, the seen and the unseen are mingled: and when the saint suffers and sorrows and prays in his agony, God's messenger stands beside, to console him, and to whisper, "Blessed are they that mourn."

"WANTED, A GOVERNESS."

CHAPTER X.

"O little feet! that such long years
Must wander on through hopes and fears, Must ache and bleed beneath your load;
I, nearer to the wayside inn
Where toil shall cease and rest begin,
Am weary, thinking of your road!"
LONGFELLOW.

HILTON comes home to dinner, but is unusually silent. I contrive to leave him alone with Maggie for a little time during the evening, yet it does not seem to improve the state of affairs. Thus the long, miserable day comes to a miserable end; and though I begin the next with almost a feeling of certainty that they will have had an explanation before night, it ends as miserably as its predecessor.

Patience was never one of my virtues, and I have seldom endured an evil more than three days, without making a vigorous effort to put an end to it. Therefore, when the third day ends and still there is no sign of a reconciliation, my patience is exhausted, and I determine, as the only feasible plan of helping to put an end to the quarrel, to speak to Hilton about it.

It is an easy thing to determine on, but a difficult one to perform. Several times during the day I try to speak to Hilton, alone, and bring the conversation round to that subject; but he is reserved and unapproachable. And even when, after dinner, I muster up sufficient courage to call him aside, on the pretext of wanting his opinion about some work that I have been doing, he is so cool that I feel half inclined to say nothing about it. However, after making a few insipid remarks about things in general, I come boldly to the point and say, "Mr. Hilton, am I mistaken in thinking that you and Maggie have had some disagreement lately?"

"Certainly," he replies freezingly. "We have had no disagreement that I am aware of."

"I beg your pardon. Of course it is no business of mine, but I fancied that you had not been on friendly terms during the last few days."

"Perfectly! so far as I am concerned!" he says, with peculiar emphasis on the pronoun. "Maggie has been behaving in a most unaccountable manner, but I am not aware that I have said or done anything to offend her."

"Perhaps there is some misunderstanding," I suggest, hesitatingly. "Don't you think it would be kind of you, as the stronger of the two, to try to remove it?"

"I am powerless to do so," he answers, shrugging his shoulders. "I have done all that I can do. I must leave it to her own common sense now, to see the folly of such conduct."

"I hope you don't mind my speaking to you about it," I say apologetically.

"Not at all," he answers, with charming indifference; and we rejoin the rest. I have obtained at least this information—that Hilton is no obstacle to a reconciliation.

At bed-time I go into Maggie's room, and try to induce her to tell me the cause of this estrangement; but she has suddenly grown even more reserved than Hilton. She assures me solemnly that there has been no quarrel, no disagreement of any kind, and therefore there can be no reconciliation. It is only that she can never feel the same towards Hilton again. And she entreats me not to mention the subject any more, as it is a very painful one to her. So I come to the conclusion that I had better not interfere in the matter again.

Mr. Bloomfield is not long in discovering that there is, as he says, "a screw loose somewhere;" and he comes to me for an explanation of it. I tell him that I am as ignorant on the subject as he is, and advise him not to speak to Maggie or Hilton about it, as I have already done so without success.

"No; best not say anything about it," he says. "It's only some lovers' quarrel, I suppose. It will come right of its own accord. Silly children! But there—we mustn't expect to find old heads on young shoulders!"

"In the evening we have some music."—p. 285.

For a little while Maggie is listless and melancholy; but gradually a change comes over her. She rouses herself to join in any conversation that is going on, tries to anticipate the wants of those around her, and wherever she goes, and whatever she does, seems to be looking for an opportunity of making herself useful. I know what it all means. I have seen the same kind of thing before.

Many good, earnest women, when they meet with some great trouble or disappointment, deliberately set themselves to make the best they can of their lives. The best, that is to say, for others—for themselves, they desire nothing but the knowledge that they have done their duty. I don't mean that they become sisters of mercy, or even that they spend their time in acts of devotion and piety. No, they may mix in the world the same as ever; even go to dinners and garden parties, and be as cheerful as any there; only, if you ask them to come away in the midst of it all, how cheerfully they comply!

You will see such a one devoting herself to neglected and disagreeable old people; or driving home from the picnic in that despised seat in the pony-carriage, with the two old maids and their dogs. Or you may ask her to give up some long-talked-of pleasure, in order to stay at home and perform an objectionable duty, and she will do it, without the suspicion of a frown. Or she will steal away to busy herself about some household task, and let another take the praise for it without a murmur.

Ah! hers is a beautiful, noble life, like a river of water in a thirsty land; yet, if I loved her, it would make me inexpressibly sad to see that sweet, calm cheerfulness; that wintry smile, that decks her lips, yet never rises to her wistful eyes.

These women may make their lives good and useful, and even tranquil and contented, but they are never eager, never glad. Their eyes don't dance with laughter; their faces don't dimple over with smiles at the least provocation; they don't spring out of bed in the morning and sing as they go down-stairs. No, they rather get up soberly, and ask for strength and guidance for the day.

Once, when I was very young and very miserable, I had serious thoughts of trying to live such a life myself. And now it makes my heart ache to see that my little Maggie is drifting into such a one. I would rather see that than apathy or fretfulness; but I want to see her happy. Youth is the time for gladness, and if it isn't glad, it fails in some measure to fulfil its end. Besides, she could be just as useful. Why, I know that the old bright sunshine of her laughter did us a hundred times more good than this new taking thought for our sakes. Mr. Bloomfield misses it, I am sure, and tries all kinds of ways to bring it back. Sometimes when I look at his homely face, that has such power of expressing mirth and good-humour, and see it so sober and grieved, tears of vexation start into my eyes. He has worked so hard to make this pleasant home, and gather these young people about him (two of whom at least have no near claims on his generosity) to share its comforts. And all he asks in return is, that they will enjoy it and be happy, and they will not. Young people fancy that all the romance, and all the sentiment of life, are centred in them and their imaginary troubles; but they are very much mistaken.

The evenings are long now—dreadfully long. Hilton goes out a great deal, and when he is away everything seems flat. We talk, of course, but there is no heart in the conversation; how can there be, when we talk for the sake of talking, and not because there is anything we want to say? When Hilton is at home, however, the case is rather different. He has several times surprised me by insinuating that I am abstracted, and that I take no interest in the conversation. I take no interest, indeed! Why, the moment anyone speaks, I am busy with my mental scales weighing the words to see what effect they will have on the listeners, and whether they will tend to heal the breach, or widen it. And, being so occupied, what time have I to talk myself? I take no interest, indeed!! Hilton has begun to follow Julia's example in calling Maggie, "Margaret." He has become very unjust to her, and accuses her, sometimes directly and sometimes only by sarcastic allusions, of being cold-hearted and unsympathetic, and even bigoted and wise in her own conceits. I hear him say it, and my indignation almost chokes me. How can he be so blind?

Week after week goes by, and Christmas comes, and still there is no sign of a reconciliation. Mr. Bloomfield follows all the customary rules for making Christmas a festive season. He gives liberally to the poor, provides a handsome present for each member of his household, and invites two poor relations to spend the day with us.

We wish each other "A Happy Christmas!" when we meet in the morning, and try very hard to make it a merry one; but, somehow, we don't succeed. The poor relations are not very good company; they seem to be uncomfortably awed by their surroundings, but they profess to be enjoying themselves immensely!

In the evening we have some music. Hilton, who has a good baritone voice, sings some manly songs with great expression. Then Julia plays two or three pieces in a dashing style, but very incorrectly; and Maggie sings a dreamy little melody, and gets very shaky in the middle of it, probably because she remembers the day when Hilton chose it for her to learn. And finally, in order that nothing may be wanting to complete the hilarity of the evening, Mr. Bloomfield yields to Hilton's request, and sings us a song, a merry song, that he used to sing in his early days. And though I laugh and applaud and pretend to be as jolly as a sand-boy, deep down in my heart there is an angry pain. Why cannot they forget their foolish quarrel, for this one day at least, and let him see them happy? I believe it only needs a word from either of them to turn all this discord into harmony—and they will not say it. And then the question arises, "Is it possible that the cause is of a more serious nature than we have imagined?"

CHAPTER XI.

"O purblind race of miserable men,
How many among us at this very hour
Do forge a lifelong trouble for ourselves,
By taking true for false, or false for true?"

I AM sitting up-stairs in our little room, making a hood for Jack's baby—the seventh baby!

The afternoons are so short now that, although it is not much past three o'clock, I can scarcely see, and I do so want to get it finished to-day. All at once it occurs to me that the drawing-room, by reason of its situation, must be lighter than this; and I immediately gather up my work and proceed there.

I have just got halfway down-stairs, when Mr. Bloomfield and a gentleman come out of the drawing-room, and walk quickly to the hall door.

The gentleman is a stranger to me, and as his back is turned towards me, I can only see that he is tall and grey-haired. Mr. Bloomfield says something to him in a low tone, and opens the door in what looks very like a stealthy manner. Then closing it after him in the same stealthy way, he walks past me into the study.

"I wonder what book she can have fallen asleep over."—p. 236.

All this has happened so quickly that I have not had time to think whether I ought to advance or retreat, and stand with one foot poised ready for the next step. When, however, Mr. Bloomfield passes, I feel in an instant that I have seen something which he would not have wished me to see. And although it was not my own fault, I feel guilty, and am thankful that he does not look up.

Directly the study door is closed, I go into the drawing-room and stand close to one of the windows, so as to get as much light as possible on my work. Some minutes have been lost, however, and the light is fading rapidly; it seems no lighter here than it was up-stairs. I look round the darkening room in despair, and catch sight of the fernery beyond. "Surely it must be lighter there under the glass roof," I think; and once more collect my things and move on. I walk down the two low steps that lead into it, and then stop short, and stare with astonishment. Just inside the door is a little rustic seat, and on this seat, with her head resting against the rockwork (a hard pillow, surely), and an open book on her lap, sits Julia, fast asleep.

I wonder what book she can have fallen asleep over—not one of her favourite sensational novels, I am sure; so I stoop forward to read the title—but, behold! the book is upside down; and now it has slid down to the ground, for I have disturbed Julia, and she is awake and yawning sleepily.

"I am sorry I woke you," I say apologetically; "but are you not afraid to sit here in the cold?"

"No, I shall not catch cold," she says. "Besides, I have not been here long."

I feel rather puzzled by what I have seen. How long did Mr. Bloomfield and his visitor remain in the drawing-room? Was Julia here all the time? and, if so, was she asleep? I believe Mr. Bloomfield has been in the drawing-room nearly all the afternoon; so, unless Julia has been here all the afternoon too, he must have seen her come through, and in that case has not said anything that he would object to her hearing, and it is all right. If she did not come in that way, how did she get in? I look round; and seeing the door leading into the garden, a suspicion of the genuine nature of her sleep crosses my mind, and I ask quickly, "By which door did you enter?" She picks up her book and goes up the steps into the drawing-room, and I conclude that she will not condescend to answer me. But at the door she turns round with a kind of lazy grace, and says, with unusual amiability, "I beg your pardon for not answering your question. I came in through the garden."

I have no faith in Julia. If she has spoken the truth, she must have heard all that passed in the drawing-room, unless, indeed, she went to sleep before the visitor arrived, which is extremely unlikely. But, after all, it is very stupid of me to attach such importance to this occurrence. That tall man may have been the most commonplace of callers, and Mr. Bloomfield's stealthy manner may have existed only in my imagination. I have been making much ado about nothing, which has become the fashion in this house lately. I shall have to curb this imagination of mine, or it will rob me of my common sense, which is a far more valuable attribute.

In the meantime here is the baby's hood unfinished, and the light nearly gone. How very annoying! At any rate, I must match these silks by daylight, and then perhaps I can finish it this evening. I think that if I go out into the garden I shall get the advantage of all the light there is, and I shall not mind the cold for a few minutes. The door is locked on the outside— Well, the baby's hood will not be finished to-night, that is quite certain—and Julia has told me a silly, useless lie.

The next day passes, and the next; and on the third I am called down into the drawing-room, and find Mr. Bloomfield and Maggie there, and that same tall man. Maggie is seated on his knee, her arm is round his neck, and I know, without being told, that he is her father. He has grey hair and a bronzed, lined face, that has once been handsome, and is still aristocratic and commanding. We look suspiciously at each other, and I believe dislike each other from the very first.

Maggie smiles at me through her tears, and expects me to share in her happiness. I suppose I do, to a certain extent, but I am afraid not quite so heartily as I ought. Then Hilton comes in and is introduced to Mr. Giffard, and I hear various particulars of his life in India; that he has made some very successful speculations; has had some dangerous illnesses, and has been living for several years in a part of the country where the postal regulations are notoriously bad; that he has written several times to his father and received no answer; and that at last he saw in an English newspaper the news of his father's death, and started without a day's loss of time for England. He says that, being tired of India, he intends to settle in England, and thinks of taking a furnished house in London for the present; and Maggie, of course, will live with him.

His manners are very aristocratic, and he speaks like a man who has not only seen the world, but has been accustomed to command. Poor Mr. Bloomfield seems to be rather overawed by him, and is less sociable than usual. I have learned to read Hilton's moods by this time; and I know that he too is not at his ease, though a stranger would never detect it.

At last, after a long conversation, which has had an under-current of dissatisfaction and constraint throughout, he rises to take leave of us. But Maggie seems as though she would like him to stay longer. (I believe she feels half afraid of not seeing him again, if she lose sight of him now.) So he suggests that she should go with him; and after a few minutes' hesitation it is so arranged.

I go up-stairs and help her to pack up a trunk which is to be called for during the evening; and while I am so engaged she kisses me a hundred times, and says that she will always love me, that we must be just as good friends now she is going to live with her father; that she will come and see us almost every day; that I must go and stay with her whenever I can, and so on, in the old childish, happy way natural to her before that unhappy disagreement with Hilton. Dear child! I believe she means every word of it; though I know from experience how such promises are sure to end. I would not say a word to mar her new-found happiness for the world; although I am inwardly rebellious that it should be taking her away from us.

When the trunk is packed, we go down-stairs again, and Maggie hugs Mr. Bloomfield and whispers protestations of undying affection, and is in a nervous flutter of delight.

And he kissees her and says, "God bless you, my darling! You won't forget your poor old uncle, I know."

Then she hugs me again, and now there is nothing left but to say good-bye to Hilton. She holds out her hand to him with a frank smile. I might have known that she would have no room in her heart to-day for anything uncharitable.

"Good-bye," he says coldly. "I hope you will be happier in your new home than you have been here;" and he adds, in a sarcastic tone, meant for her ear alone, "I am not surprised that you are so anxious to leave us."

"You are persistently unjust," she says, in a firm voice, drawing her lithe young figure up proudly. And in another minute they are gone, and we are left to make the best we can of it. We don't like her leaving us, but we cannot prevent her going; we don't like Mr. Giffard, but we cannot prevent his taking possession of his own daughter. In fact, the only thing we can do is to fall in with the old adage, "Grin and bear it."

"Well, it isn't so very extraordinary, after all, you know," says Mr. Bloomfield. "We might have known that her father would come after her some time or other. When a man is in foreign parts you mustn't conclude he is dead, just because he doesn't write home for a year or so. Why, some men go ten years without once writing, and the mails going out every month regularly. Inability to write home seems to be one of the diseases of the place, like the yellow fever. What fools we must have been ever to have expected anything else! But I certainly did," he adds, as an undeniable fact, "I certainly did expect something very different."

Hilton says nothing, but goes out whistling a lively air. I have noticed this of Hilton—that whenever he is particularly out of conceit with himself and the world, he whistles a lively air.

CHAPTER XII.

"Love, that hath us in the net,
Can he pass, and we forget?"

I GET up the next day with a very dreary feeling. When one has been accustomed to think of any person, the last thing before one goes to sleep at night, and the first thing when one wakes in the morning; when one has been in the habit of planning for them and worrying about them all day long, and testing everything that was said or done by the simple questions, "Will it please her?" "Will it annoy her?" Then, when one suddenly finds that that person is taken out of one's reach and rendered independent of one's care, one is apt to feel (for a time at least) that one's life is rather empty.

It is nothing to me now whether Hilton is sarcastic or the reverse: it is nothing to me now whether Julia is spiteful or amiable. In fact, I have lost the cause of my motive power, and feel limp and dejected.

It seems unnatural for me to be here without Maggie; and, as the day wears away, I reflect that perhaps I may not be wanted here any longer. I was not wanted before Maggie came; why should I be wanted now that she is gone? I feel sure that Mr. Bloomfield would never have the heart to turn me away; but it would be too horribly galling to stay and feel that I was not wanted. So once more I have a business interview with him and propose to look out for another situation.

This time he does not wait for a consultation with Hilton, but scouts the idea at once.

"Come, that's too bad!" he says; "I can't have all my friends leave me at once. Is the house so dull that you can't bear to stay in it now she is gone?"

"No, indeed!" I reply; "no house could ever feel so much like home to me as this."

"Then you must stay," he says.

I gladly dismiss the idea of leaving, and as he looks rather melancholy, I do my best to cheer him; and in so doing forget that I am dejected myself.

Maggie comes to see us almost every day during the first week, and seems more affectionate than ever. Then her visits cease, without any explanation or apology; and we should conclude that she and her father were out of town; but that we hear, from various sources, of the grand style in which they are living, and the great people with whom they associate.

Whether Hilton is seriously annoyed at her conduct, I cannot tell; I watch him closely, and test him in every way I can think of, but to no purpose. He is oftener away from home, perhaps, and rather more difficult to please than formerly; but, with that exception, he is the same as ever.

On the occasion of one of Maggie's visits he is away from home; and I take care to be the one to tell him about it. But he only raises his eyebrows slightly, and says "Oh, indeed! is she quite well?" and seems to take no interest in the subject whatever.

Then I am stupid enough to try to get an insight into his feelings, by watching his face while he reads a slip of paper which I found in one of Maggie's books. It is the beginning of a description of the old house at F—, carelessly written in some idle moment, and there is a half-finished sketch of the house on the other side (which probably accounts for its having been kept at all).

This is the description:—"My home was the dearest, sweetest place in all the world; or at least I thought so. It had once formed part of a famous monastery, but, at the time I knew it, Ichabod might have been written on every crumbling stone, for its glory had indeed departed. Noble patrons no longer visited it; portly abbots no longer feasted within its walls; of the room that had once contained its treasures, nothing was left but a few feet of crumbling wall; even its dungeons, once the pride and terror of the neighbourhood, were used as a receptacle for lumber. Still, it was beautiful in its decay! Old Father Time had dealt very gently with it; and, like some brave old warrior, it reared its head proudly to the last, and defied the elements!"

"I might have spared myself the trouble."

That is all—a mere scrap of writing. But there is something in the last few lines that seems to speak so plainly of her affectionate pride in the old place, that I hope it may lead Hilton to speak to me about her.

I might have spared myself the trouble, for he only says, as he hands it back to me, "What a queer old place! I can't say that I see much beauty in it."

One day, at dinner, Julia remarks, in the most innocent way imaginable, "Isn't it odd that Margaret never comes to see us?"

"Very!" answers Hilton laconically.

"I did not think she would have forgotten us quite so soon," she continues. "But I suppose it is only natural under the circumstances. I saw them drive past in their carriage while I was out this morning; they looked so grand."

Julia speaks mildly. She can afford to be charitable now: the bare facts are more condemnatory of her rival than any word of hers could be—and she knows it.

"Bless her heart! she hasn't forgotten us," says Mr. Bloomfield.

"What is your opinion on the subject, mon père?" asks Julia, raising her eyes demurely to Hilton's face. No one would recognise Julia now as the same girl who used to sit through long evenings in moody silence. She has the course quite clear, and she is doing her utmost to captivate Hilton. She dresses to please him, studies how best to flatter his vanity, asks his advice on all possible occasions, and pretends to a thousand little ignorances and weaknesses, so as to make him feel his own superiority.

Of course he responds to all this—what man could help it, aided as it is by her great dark eyes? They have adopted towards each other a tone of light repartee; and she has taken to calling him "mon père." Why she has adopted that form of address I cannot imagine; but it is wonderful how much expression she contrives to throw into those two short words.

Being thus forced to give an opinion of some kind, Hilton answers gravely, "I must confess that Margaret has acted in a way that has surprised me very much. She certainly has not behaved well."

"What a cold-hearted creature he is!" I think. I have been feeling much the same about her myself, but I would never have owned it.

Yet, in spite of all this seeming coldness, and in spite of his response to Julia's advances, I cannot decide that he has really become indifferent to Maggie. Indeed, I fancy that I detect something like a tone of proprietorship in his censure. I think he speaks in much the same spirit in which he would acknowledge a fault of his own, which he cannot honestly deny, and yet considers himself very virtuous in admitting.

One evening, not long after this, when Julia and Hilton are out to dinner, Mr. Bloomfield and I are surprised by a visit from Maggie and her father.

It is late when they call, and Mr. Giffard seems to be in a hurry to get away again, but it is quite long enough to remove those ugly doubts which have crept into our hearts in spite of all our efforts to keep them out.

When Hilton is told of it, he makes no particular comment; but presently begins to abuse his host of the evening; whom he finally denounces as a "Proud, bigoted, pious humbug!"

"Don't you think that is just bordering on the verge of strong language?" asks his father mildly.

"So he is!" retorts Hilton, in a deep, savage tone, that only requires a little more provocation to blaze out into uncontrollable passion. (These habitually self-controlled people are, as a rule, horribly passionate when they are once roused.) "So he is! Pride and that sort of piety always go hand in hand. I don't believe that man would care a straw about religion if he were not anxious to get one of the highest seats in heaven."

I am wickedly pleased to see Hilton lose his temper. There is something so human about it—so like other people. Besides, it helps me to answer that question, which I have been asking myself for so long, namely, has he any lover's love for his cousin Maggie? This burst of indignation against pride and piety, happening just now, inclines me to think that he has.

"Hilton!" says his father, reprovingly.

"Oh, but, uncle dear! you don't know what a horrid man he is," cries Julia, perching herself on the elbow of her uncle's chair, and putting her arm round his neck.

"Well, well, then I suppose Miss Scott and I may be glad we were not asked," says Mr. Bloomfield. "We've had a very comfortable evening at home—haven't we, Miss Scott?"

"Very, indeed!" I reply. "And it was fortunate that we were at home when Mr. Giffard called."

"Why on earth did he come at such an unreasonable time!" asks Hilton, with a growl.

"Come, come, Hilton!" says his father, bantering, "you mustn't be so hard on people. Miss Scott and I did not see anything unreasonable in the time. Did we, Miss Scott? Now I'll just tell you what he came about. He is going to buy the house down at F—, where his father lived; and there were reasons why he wanted to see me about it to-night."

Hilton's face is rapidly clearing (I suppose he imagined that Maggie had planned this visit so as to avoid meeting him); but he is not going to come out of his ill-humour all at once.

"It is a most inartistic place," he says, with an assumption of the same growl.

"When did you see it?" asks Julia, in surprise.

"I've never seen the place itself," he answers; "but I've seen a sketch of it. The front is abominably flat, and the windows are too small."

"Look here! if you are going to be so cantankerous, we had better all of us be off to bed," says Mr. Bloomfield, getting up and pretending to be in a great hurry to get out of his son's way.

"Very well," replies Hilton; "you needn't wait for me. I shall do an hour's read before I go."

THE SAGES OF ALL AGES.

PLATO.

BY THE REV. T. F. THISELTON DYER, M.A.

HE name of this highly gifted Greek sage has long ago become proverbial, and it requires but a slight acquaintance with his writings to appreciate his exalted attainments—both intellectually and morally. Indeed, in whatever aspect we view his life and its surroundings, we find not only abundant evidence of his magnificent genius, but are forced to halt and admire the remarkable versatility of his proficiency in the many accomplishments of life. In truth, it has rarely been granted to humanity to possess the talents which rendered his life so grand and illustrious; and hence it is not surprising that a peculiar mythical reverence surrounds even his very name. But it should be remembered that his proper name was not that which his well-merited fame has immortalised, but Aristocles, after his paternal grandfather; that of Plato, it is said, having been given him by his gymnastic master—a characteristic of his athletic frame. So eminent a teacher could not escape the poetic fancies of his countrymen, anxious to pay an appropriate tribute to their poet-philosopher. It is related that whilst sleeping, when a babe, in a bower of myrtles on Mount Hymettus, bees lighted on him, and dropped honey on his lips as a prophetic emblem of that sweetness of style which in after years would distinguish his eloquence. Indications, however, of his persuasive and graceful mode of speech soon developed themselves, for his rich and gorgeous imagination tempted him to cultivate poetry, and the following epigram is a simple and pretty illustration of his tender, sympathetic nature:—

"My Aster, you are gazing on the stars.
Would that I were the stars, that so I might Gaze in return with many eyes on thee."

But he soon relinquished his poetic fancies for more serious pursuits, and, on becoming acquainted with Socrates, devoted his whole time and energies to the study of those abstruse and leading philosophical subjects which have always had a fascination for great minds. Accordingly, his friendship with Socrates was the real commencement of his famous career—a career "resplendent with the graces of taste, wit, and imagination," and enriched and adorned with a profound, acute, and highly speculative mind. Henceforth, to quote the words of Milton—

"Divine philosophy,
Not harsh and rugged as dull fools suppose,
But musical as is Apollo's lute," was the dream of his life, and his deep, meditative spirit was never weary of searching for light and truth. Unfortunately, however, at the early age of twenty, the death of Socrates threatened for a time to strike a blow at his bright career of promise; and on losing his beloved and respected friend, he quitted Athens for a time, and went to Megara on a visit to Euclid, afterwards making a series of journeys, in the course of which, it is said, he made himself acquainted with the Pythagorean fraternity, and was courteously allowed by them to have access to writings and information respecting their doctrines.

Eventually he returned to Athens, where "eager scholars flocked around him. With a mind richly stored by foreign travel and constant meditation, he began to emulate his master, and devote himself to teaching." Here, in one of the most beautiful suburbs, he possessed a small house near the well-known "Academy," in whose shady plane-tree walks, "whether in pursuit of knowledge for its own sake, or for counsel in the direction of public or private life," were assembled together the master-spirits of the age to converse with the Athenian sage, and imbibe the wisdom which fell from his lips. In a short time Plato made Athens an object of interest to the civilised world of his day, and eager inquirers after knowledge flocked from all parts for enlightenment on difficult topics. But, as might be expected, his brilliant position exposed him to the shafts of envy and detraction; and "the high aspirings of his mind were clogged and weighed down by that corrupt heathenism with which he was surrounded." And yet, in spite of his eminent reputation, he was noted for his amiability and retiring character, and when one day asked if there would be any saying recorded of him, he answered, in his usual modest manner, "One must first obtain a name, and then there will be several." Added, moreover, to his reticence, he was naturally shy; and, as it has been pointed out, "the instance given of his vanity in putting himself forward at the death of Socrates, as competent to retrieve the great loss in his own person alone, bears evident marks of a calumny." Although his appearance was elegant and graceful, yet his demeanour was marked by a serious gravity, which did not escape the ridicule of the comic poets, as in the following :—

"O Plato! how your learning is confined
To gloomy looks, and wrinkling up your brows
Like any cockle."

Indeed, as a writer adds, "his brawny shoulders were bent with thought, as only those of thinkers are bent. A smile was the utmost that ever played over his lips; he never laughed;" and "as sad as Plato" became a proverbial phrase. Who can wonder that this was so, when we contrast his ardent, intense craving for knowledge in the great mysteries of life, with the coarse freedom of Diogenes and the excessive affability of Aristippus, not to mention the shallow knowledge and frivolous gaiety which characterised society at this period? He was possessed also of another quality, so essential to success—self-control under provocation; and it is related, among other anecdotes, that he declined to inflict due punishment on a slave because he was under the excitement of anger. Such traits of character in a marked manner distinguished his life from those around him, and materially enhanced the influence and dignity of his teaching. As a man of the world, he was thoroughly acquainted with human nature; and his shrewd and accurate perception of the motives which guide men in their life-purposes was effective in his discourses. As a moralist, too, our sage was ever foremost in condemning abuses, and did not, when opportunity offered, refrain from expressing his views, even although by so doing he exposed himself to ridicule and hard sayings from those who cared little for such advice. On one occasion it is said that Plato, seeing a man playing at dice, rebuked him for it, as he was wasting his time for a trifle; "although," he added, "the habit is not a trifle." This was worthy of our sage, and a warning that many would do well nowadays to remember. Equally judicious, too, are his remarks on intemperance: which, perhaps, if carried out, would deter thousands from giving way to this wretched propensity. To those who were addicted to drink he would say, "Look in the glass," and then they would abandon their unseemly habit. Untruthfulness in any form he despised, and one of his noted maxims was this: "Truth, my friend, is a beautiful and durable thing, but it is not easy to persuade men of this fact." And another of his sayings was: "The sweetest of all things is to speak the truth."

Turning to Plato as a philosopher, the most forcible and convincing proof of the enduring monument of fame which has been raised to his memory rests not only in the wide reception and circulation of his writings, but in the high esteem in which his views were held by the most erudite schools of thought in after ages. Then, as a writer has remarked, "how great the influence of Plato was on the philosophy of the Romans is clear from the philosophical writings of Cicero. And even when Christianity threw into the shade all systems of man's wisdom, the only philosophy which maintained its credit at the first was that of Plato." The great St. Augustine declares himself a warm admirer of our sage, and hence it may be justly asked, What rendered his teaching so attractive as to secure for it such lasting appreciation? One reason undoubtedly was the exalted views he propounded relative to man's existence in this world. He did not pass over, as impossible of solution, this great problem of human life, but encouraged and induced men to turn their thoughts to something higher than the mere surroundings of every-day life. In short, "he did not look on life with the temporary interest of a passing inhabitant of the world. He looked on it as an immortal soul longing to be released from its earthly prison, and striving to catch by anticipation some faint glimpses of that region of eternal truth where it would some day rest." Such a view of life, it must be acknowledged, was far in advance of previous philosophies, and indubitably stamped Plato as a religious thinker, whose opinions, however faulty and erroneous they might be in certain points, were on the whole in harmony with what was afterwards taught in the Christian schools. His convictions, so thoroughly in antagonism to the materialistic tendencies and spirit of the age in which his lot was cast, were vigorously assailed, and cruelly disparaged as the untenable and fanciful conceptions of an over-imaginative mind. But our sage's wisdom was not to be influenced by opposition, however formidable it might appear. What he felt to be the truth he fearlessly taught, and his name must ever be illustrious even from this one circumstance: that, in a period of heathenism and low morality, he stood out courageously as the "eloquent advocate" of the immateriality and immortality of the soul. Professor Archer Butler sums up Plato's philosophy thus:—"The body is the prison of the soul, which, however, defies its oppressor; and the aim of virtue is to preserve the distinctness of the two, and realise liberty even in bonds, looking forward, as its recompense, to a total enfranchisement." Leaving man's immortality here, it may be noted that, according to Plato, so far as the soul has any good or truth in it, it is formed after the ideas of the good and true. This exalted view of our nature reminds us of that recorded in the early chapters of the sacred narrative, and was the basis on which our sage maintained that all human conduct must be framed. In accordance with this ethical doctrine, the soul, originally made in the likeness of the Deity, must ever find an attraction of like to like; and hence the necessity of inculcating, as worthy of man's imitation and attainment, the love of all that is beautiful, upright, and true. To attain this end, he taught the importance of educating all persons so as at all times to perceive the false appearances of good by which the mind is frequently deluded. Accordingly, as it has been pointed out, "he shows that there are false pleasures as well as false opinions, that men's ignorance extends not only to mistakes in regard to their wealth or bodily accomplishments, but as to their moral character, for that most men think themselves better than they really are." Hence the great value of philosophy is to open the eyes to see the true value of things, and to analyse between falsehood and truth, good and evil; while the effects of a bad education, on the other hand, in addition to misleading men, are apt to give them an unfair bias in their moral choice. The standard of our sage's morality was a lofty one, and admitted of no compromise, for indirectly it pointed mankind, collectively and individually, to the perfect ideal of all that is true and lovely as an emanation of the Deity.

Another reason of the veneration in which Plato and his works have been held by Christian teachers is his undoubted sympathy with Monotheism. His teaching upheld the existence of "a Supreme Intelligence, whom we call God, the Fountain of all force, and the Creator of all order in the universe, the sum of whose attributes may be expressed by the simple term—the Good." As Professor Butler remarks: "The unity of God and the detection of Polytheism" are openly exhibited in his Dialogues: a circumstance, in truth, which was an immeasurable advance on preceding philosophical doctrines. But at times the ambiguity of his language has given rise to misconception, and it has been argued by his opponents that the enigmatical language in which he indulged was capable of a double meaning. His peculiar position, however, necessitated his writing occasionally in this fashion, and "with the fate of Socrates before his eyes, he must have felt the necessity of employing such language as, while it would be intelligible to the thoughtful, might yet admit of a popular interpretation for the jealous defenders of the popular system of belief and worship." Anyhow, the works of Plato, regarded as a whole, admit of none of that uncertainty which adverse critics have suggested, but abound with passages whose lucidity is undeniable.

Again, according to Plato, it behoved all men to be humble, considering how limited at any time must be their knowledge. He exposed the vanity of those who laid claim to information the accuracy and truth of which they could never ascertain nor prove. Instead of accepting current opinions, our sage rather demanded a positive evidence of their truth, and would not consent to believe what as yet was open to doubt. By so acting, he not only discredited many existing errors which had been firmly believed, but he made men sensible of the difficulty of arriving at right conclusions where man's knowledge was very small. It is by consulting his Dialogues that we become familiar with Plato's views on various subjects, although the dramatic form is generally adopted. It has been objected, too, that this mode of writing forbids us from accepting as his own opinions those ideas which are frequently started by him for the sake of ventilating discussion in every form. As a modern philosopher remarks, however, Plato no doubt thought that "conversation was more instructive than reading; but he knew that reading was also instructive, and he wrote to obviate as much as possible the necessary inconvenience of written discourse; he threw all his works into the form of a dialogue." Hence there is every reason to believe that the Dialogues which he has bequeathed to posterity are the embodiment of his opinions on those leading questions which concerned man's welfare in his efforts to make his life good and beautiful.

Space will not permit us to enlarge on the life and teaching of this illustrious sage. The general characteristic of all his teaching is the high tone of its religious and moral feeling, which has been briefly summed up as the beacon held out "to warn men of the debasing allurements of pleasure, and of the misery consequent on the indulgence of passion." It further may be regarded as "a glowing exhortation to seek for true happiness not in externals, or by aiming at a more human standard of virtue, but by internal purification, and by imitation of the perfections of the Deity." Such a noble life, although it lacked the influence of Christ's teaching, was worthy of men's admiration, especially at a period when the Sun of Righteousness had not yet arisen to scatter and disperse the clouds of heathen darkness.

DR. LUTHER.*

THERE are biographies and biographies. Some of us can remember, in bygone days, when our stock of juvenile literature—not so plentiful as is furnished for young folk now—had been read over and over again, turning hungrily to the memorials of departed worthies, many of whom deserved better treatment than they received at the hands of narrator and printer. The latter personage, never unimportant, becomes of more consequence to the reader as “we see time’s furrows on another’s brow,” and begin to take care, in our later years, of our eyesight. “This is the smallest edition procurable,” said one, proudly exhibiting a miniature volume to a well-known minister. The latter replied that time had taught him the wisdom, he hoped, of always using the largest! Personally speaking, we are always grateful to the printer who gives us clear, legible type; and, before we express our obligations to Dr. Peter Bayne, we have a word of appreciation for the “knights of the case” as concerns their setting forth of Dr. Luther.

Managers of free libraries, friends who wish to make a present to Y.M. or Y.W.C.A. book-shelves, parents who are looking out for some new book to read aloud to the group beside the fire, make a note of this work on Martin Luther. When the younger ones have departed, and the olive-branches in their teens are gathered round you for a quiet hour, you will find much in these two volumes of Dr. Bayne’s “Martin Luther” to interest and instruct and fill with suggestions the awakening minds. We mention this because we know of boys and girls who really enjoy a deeper book now and then, in the intervals of travel and fiction; but it must not be supposed “Martin Luther” has been specially written for juveniles. It is a thoughtful, earnest, important work, specially appropriate to the present age, when England here and there would appear to be “going back” rather than cherishing the principles of Protestantism. We have sympathy with our friends who say in effect, “Let us go back to the things of old, the systems so long forsaken;” our trouble is that they do not go back far enough. Would that the Master’s followers would go back as far as to the simple scriptural teachings, the glorious liberty of the Gospel, and of those who first accepted it!

* “Martin Luther: his Life and Times.” By Peter Bayne, LL.D. (Casell and Company.)

"At fourteen he started off for Magdeburg."—p. 291.

In a paper like this, we can only glance at a portion of the contents of this important biography, which opens by considering Luther from various points of view, in relation to present-day thought, the law of spiritual progress, etc. The writer does justice to the existence of true devotion, sincerity, and heavenly life in the Church from which Protestants have come out. There is throughout the pages an entire absence of bitterness, rancour, and bigotry; indeed, Dr. Bayne shows that during years of fervent religious life, Luther found it was possible for him to remain in the Romish Church, and in that Church he preached that salvation is not payment for task-work, but the renewing of a man through faith in Christ. Against empty formalism spirits here and there had for centuries protested, and when, at last, Luther comprehended that "the very fire of God, in the centre of the Christian temple, needed trimming," he felt the conviction that he dared do no less than lighten the deepening darkness for his country and the world, whatever the cost might be.

Martin Luther, who "burst open the door at which Wickliffe had knocked, who told Papacy to stand out of the world's light," was born about the year 1483, the time when Savonarola was burnt in Florence, and when Raphael, "whose name stands for the entrancement of beauty," saw the light. Some appear to have been warned by the stars that an arch-heretic would appear in the autumn of 1483. On the other hand, there is a Protestant myth that on the St. Martin's Eve when Luther was born, the evening star was brighter than ever before. Papist legends insist upon a close association of our hero with Beelzebub himself; certain it is, as the author remarks, that Luther threw his inkstand at our spiritual enemy not once, as tradition has it, but continuously, and to some purpose, for strongholds of evil succumbed to the writings of the freedom-apostle.

Young Martin Luther soon found that "life is real, life is earnest;" he never forgot his hard-working mother bending beneath the load of faggots she carried on her back, and John Luther, a poor miner, had to wring his livelihood "from the niggard earth." From sturdy John Luther and his ancestors, stubborn in conflict when life's work was warfare, Martin Luther inherited "an immense reservoir of fighting power;" from his mother, peace and tenderness. All through the stormy future the mother never wavered in her belief in her son.

His training was of a Spartan character; even Margaret Luther severely visited offences upon the evil-doer; but his home-memories were ever sacred and revered. Years after, when he arranged a marriage service for the Protestants of the Fatherland, he immortalised his parents by asking the pastoral question thus: "Wilt thou, John, take to wife Margaret?"

John Luther soon rose from amid his comrades, and he was ambitious likewise for his son. Martin must be thoroughly well educated, and prepared to shine in the legal profession, for which he was destined by his father's dearest hopes. At fourteen, with his friend, John Reineck, he started off for Magdeburg, where it seems likely that the boys endured a good deal of hardship, though their minds must have been enlarged, not only by their studies, but by the busy importance of the town and its commercial life. Martin's impressions of Magdeburg were chiefly ecclesiastical; he remembered Prince William of Anhalt-Bernburg, a Franciscan, begging for bread, and looking like skin and bone. The prince soon died, but all were transported with reverence for such virtue, which must infallibly be a passport to heaven! Martin also remembered a painting in Magdeburg, representing the Catholic Church: a great ship (piloted by the Holy Spirit) contained the Pope, cardinals, and bishops, and a crew of priests and monks; laymen were struggling in the water, some clinging to ropes thrown by priestly hands, as the boat sailed on to heaven. Luther was much impressed by the safety of the ecclesiastics as compared with that of people in secular callings.

At the end of a year, Martin was removed from Magdeburg to Eisenach, "a jewel on the great green robe of the Thuringian wood." Here the rustic lad was delicately polished and refined, being brought under the influence of Ursula Cotta, who found him singing at her door, and took him to her home and heart, and became to him a second mother. To her he seemed a deep-hearted, rather monkish sort of boy; she would fain have drawn him more into the religion of gladness. "Ursula put the flute into his hand," literally perhaps, but also in a far wider sense.

At eighteen, Martin Luther went as a student to Erfurth, "a place of fat, flat meadows," but distinguished for its learning and university. His favourite study was philosophy—"Aristotle as manipulated by the school divines;" in 1502 he took his bachelor's degree; in 1505 he became M.A. One day, rummaging in the University library, he found a Bible, and read it with intense delight; he found much herein beside the lessons read in the services, and longed to possess a whole Bible for himself. His statue shows him to succeeding generations stretching forth his hand, holding out the Word of God to his dear Fatherland.

John Luther was by this time thoroughly proud of his son, and pictured him a foremost lawyer, and the husband of a wealthy bride. In 1505, full of hidden yearnings and "thoughts too deep for words," Martin went home for a visit, and, ere he returned to Erfurth, he was deeply moved by hearing of the sudden death of a student killed in hunting. His solemn feelings were intensified during his journey by a violent storm, which so powerfully affected him that he sank to the ground crying, "Save me, sweet St. Anne, and I will become a monk!"

The storm ceased, the vow was made, and Martin tarried not for parental consent. He gathered his friends around him one evening, and music and ordinary conversation beguiled these farewell hours; next day they heard he was in the Augustinian convent, where he seems to have carried his Plautus and Virgil to cheer the solitude of his cell. But John Luther! Poor John exploded with dismay, deliberately withdrawing from his son his favour and countenance.

In 1507, however, when Martin was ordained a priest, John Luther, who had lost two other sons by death, consented to be present. A banquet followed the service, and some of the brothers undertook to sermonise the father a little, when he indignantly exclaimed, "Have you never heard the Scripture command about honouring father and mother?" What about monkish virtues in this connection? Was Martin startled—Martin, who had not paused, ere settling his life, to tell his parents of his intention?

John Luther considered his son's life now as good as ended, but the spiritual struggles that would issue in the freedom of thousands went on in the heart of the priest. Dr. Bayne shows him in the dark valley, amid argumentative schoolmen, in Rome itself, and, at last, gradually but surely, paints him as understanding that the Infinite God is not to be propitiated by self-mortification, but loved "because He first loved us"—

"The sons of ignorance and night
May dwell in the Eternal Light Through the Eternal Love."

Luther's was a nature capable of warm attachment. From the Elector Frederick downwards—or upwards!—to Melancthon, we hear of his devotion to his friends, and the efforts he put forth even for their physical welfare: to these friendships we are indebted for priceless letters, which are themselves a history.

In 1512 Luther took the degree of Doctor in Theology; ere this, Frederick, Elector of Saxony, had appointed him philosophical lecturer in the Augustinian Convent of Wittenberg, a place ever memorable by reason of the Theses posted on the door of its Castle church. This event took place on the 31st of October, 1517, and was caused by the operations of Tetzel a vendor of Indulgences, who affirmed that pardon and peace were to be gained by the clink of the coin in the money-box! "Ye that would not forego sin's sweetness, yet fear its punishment, pay your money and have its worth." Up rose Martin Luther, and nailed up his manifesto, treating of repentance, the sin of turning godliness to merchandise, and excusing the Pope—yet withal herein accusing him—of being surely ignorant of the way in which this trade went on.

Thus was the battle-note sounded. Rome tried exhortation, conciliation, argument, alike in vain against the heretic who poured forth his opinions so presumptuously by mouth and by pen. At last—and the intervening storms had but strengthened this massive soul—a Papal Bull was issued against him, with the result that it was publicly burnt at Wittenberg!

Being called to appear before the Diet of Worms, he maintained an unshaken position: "Unless I am refuted by the testimony of Holy Writ, I can, and will, recant nothing. Here I stand; I can do no other. God be my help!"

The Elector Frederick, alarmed for his safety, caused him after this to be captured in a friendly way, and hidden in the fortress of the Wartburg, where he meditated, wrote, and prayed "among the birds." The country, however, could not do without him; it demanded to hear his voice—it needed his hand. He was the counsellor of princes and people, an active figure on the historical stage, while adjusting pastoral questions, and inveighing powerfully against enforced clerical celibacy, monasticism, and the like. In later years we hear of "Katie," a runaway nun, who aroused his interest so much that he thought about finding her a husband; she remarked she would marry Luther, if he liked, but not the individual in question!

Horried Papists cried out bitterly against the union of those who were once monk and nun, but the skies did not fall, and "Katie" took good care of the Doctor, and put an end to his bestowal on his acquaintances of testimonials, etc., offered to himself. It is beautiful to read of the dear child he loved with all his mighty heart, yet was called to give up, and of his letter to his little son—little Johnny Luther—about the garden of heaven, where there is room for the children, with music and gladness, and all things sweet.

Music was to the heart of Luther one of God's best gifts. He considered it an effectual weapon against the Evil One, as well he might have done, who sang himself so gloriously as in the immortal hymn, "Ein' feste Burg ist unser Gott."

The last scene of this strange, battling, triumphant life, is very simply told: he was taken suddenly ill with pain and a sense of oppression, and three times those around him heard him say, "Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit. Thou hast redeemed me, thou faithful God." Quietly his eyelids closed, and the great, loving, fiery heart was still.

OUR VISIT TO SOME AGED PILGRIMS.

WHEN the Aged Pilgrims' Society was founded, eighty years ago, the transition from the old order of things to the new can hardly be said to have become complete, although signs were not wanting that an awakening was taking place which would open the way to better things.

How dead the Christian Church became in the eighteenth century through neglect of its proper work was best known to those who lived to deplore the irreligion of the times. Without Sunday-schools, without missions, without any of the philanthropic agencies which are now a necessary part of the machinery of the Church, Christian life flagged and degenerated until a deadly rationalism in many places superseded the old evangelical fervour of Puritan times. Bible, missionary, and tract societies were the outcome of the Methodist Revival, besides many smaller agencies, such as the useful Society to which we would now briefly call the reader's attention.

When, in the year 1807, a number of Christian friends resolved that they would co-operate in the duty of making some provision for aged necessitous persons, they were really giving a practical expression to the apostolical injunction, "Remember the poor." In those days people needed to be educated in the art of charity; for, although vast sums were collected in poor-rates to be squandered on the peasantry, true charity more often than otherwise missed her mark. In the early part of the century the population of England and Wales amounted to a little less than nine millions, and of these nearly one million and a quarter were in receipt of parochial relief; that is to say, the working classes had their industry discouraged, and taxpayers groaned beneath crushing burdens in order that millions sterling might be distributed among those who were not careful to work so long as they could live upon the parish. Thus a system of pauperisation obtained, rather than that true charity which found expression in the Aged Pilgrims' Friend Society, which has now very fitly to be congratulated on becoming an octogenarian. During eighty long years this Society has dispensed comfort to a large number of pensioners, saving them from want, delivering them from the workhouse, and enabling them to preserve their homes intact. In 1885 a sum of £7,000 was distributed among 1,118 pensioners.

There are homes for a certain proportion of these pensioners at Hornsey Rise, Camberwell, Stamford Hill, and Brighton, the first being a Jubilee memorial, the cost of which was chiefly provided by two munificent friends, Messrs. Box and Pope. The former gave £12,000 in the first instance; and some years later the latter found means for constructing forty additional rooms. There is, therefore, at the present time, accommodation for 122 inmates, who have their rooms partially furnished for them, and have, besides, an allowance for coals. The mere maintenance of so large a building is alone a heavy burden, however, amounting as it does, inclusive of the local rates, to £500 a year. It is felt that a special fund ought to be provided for this purpose.

On one of the late autumn days of last year we visited the large asylum at Hornsey Rise, and happening to go when the wet and discomfort without contrasted with the warmth and comfort within, the institution was, in a sense, seen at an advantage; but on a warm summer day the estate, with its pleasant gardens, would doubtless appear as quite a semi-rural retreat to visitors from the more crowded quarters of London. In the board-room are portraits of the Prince and Princess of Wales, presented by themselves on the occasion of their visit to the Alexandra Orphanage, which is nearly opposite. Here also will be found a plentiful assortment of ornaments and fancy articles made by the inmates. The chapel is a neat little building, where services are regularly held; but as there is no chaplain, these have to be conducted by various friends who volunteer for the occasion. There is also a library of some thousand volumes, which sadly needs replenishing with something new and attractive. Still, some of the older divines, who are represented on the shelves, and who were reigning favourites one or two generations ago, are probably still appreciated by the ancients who read them. Living in, or on, the past so far as this world is concerned, as many of them necessarily do, they show only little craving for what is new; with them the old is better.

as herself, has a sewing-machine added to the other furniture of her cosy room. Another, who took to birds and flowers, confessed that she had every comfort, and could not be too thankful. She fully appreciated the rule which allowed the inmates to

"This was the most interesting room we had entered."

To walk through the building, to call on some of the inmates, is the readiest way of seeing for ourselves some of the representative characters who here find a home. Many social grades are represented, but although some have been so much better bred or educated than others, it is striking to see how Christianity brings them, as it were, to one level of respectability. We encounter one who is a reader of Dr. Doudney's books, while her neighbour—formerly an organist at Chatham—has a piano, which occupies a lion's share of the space in her little room. She plays a tune, apologising for the instrument being out of sorts owing to the draught. This old pilgrim was once a teacher of music, and is now a most cheerful neighbour to all lovers of melody. A little further on we find a married couple who have occupied their room for fifteen years, and who were married on the 22nd of June, 1828, or nearly sixty years ago. The veteran Christian still looks on his wife with pride and affection, although, as he ingenuously confesses, "She is four years and ten months older than me." He then tells how he and his partner commenced life together long before the Queen was crowned, and attended for ten years at the Tabernacle in Moorfields under the preacher and journalist, the late Dr. Campbell. They speak of their happy home, and declare that they have no wish to have a better until they go to heaven, and they tell how graciously and generously the Lord has dealt with them in their poverty. One single pilgrim, who wishes that every old woman was as comfortable gratify their own little fancies, by having their own things. She had quite a companion in her bird, and highly complimented the pretty little creature's singing powers. Going on, we next visit a woman who is eighty-eight years old, and who finds a pastime in knitting, and the apartment seemed to be ornamented with her work in every possible way. In point of ingenuity, however, she and all others were far outstripped by a veteran, an ex-local preacher and West-End pastry-cook, whose room presented quite the appearance of a museum, such was the number of models of his own make which it contained. In one place we saw Windsor Castle and Eton Bridge; the ruins of the Temple of Minerva kept company with the Clock Tower at Newington Butts, and Temple Bar with Canterbury Cathedral. This was the most interesting room we had entered, and no one could leave it without feeling that an innocent hobby is one of the best things for lightening the hours of old age.

Such are examples of the inmates at Hornsey Rise; and in this and the other asylums there are altogether 180 inmates. Then, as already intimated, there are hundreds of others in various parts of the three kingdoms who regularly receive pensions. It is said that "the Society's" help forms a nucleus around which other gifts naturally cluster, and by the regularity and certainty of its payments it gives the pensioners that feeling of independence which it is desirable to maintain as much as possible. Members of poor churches throughout the country, and other recipients, who through various causes are not in membership with any church, find the pensions peculiarly useful." The "other gifts" referred to in the above quotation are in some instances very extraordinary. Thus, in 1884-5 Mr. J. T. Morton, of Caterham, gave 1,224 large boxes of groceries, each containing an abundant and miscellaneous supply of articles needed by the housewife, to the pensioners and candidates. The same friend also sent nearly 4,000 yards of flannel for the women, and ready-made things for all of the men, and also to such of the women as could not make up the material for themselves. He also gave half a ton of coal, thrice repeated, to all pensioners not receiving fuel from other donors. Such open-handed generosity, besides liberal help in money, is as singular as it is gratifying. What is more especially needed, however, is a larger number of small subscriptions to enable the committee to extend help to the ever-increasing number of applicants for their bounty.

According to the accounts last made up, by far the greater number of pensioners are women; while over 800 were more than seventy, 245 were more than eighty, and 15 were more than ninety years old. Of course, among persons so aged, the rate of mortality is high; more than a hundred will die in the course of a year. Many who are nominated die before assistance can be given.

Speaking of 152 persons who were nominated in one recent year, the committee tell us:—"The average age was seventy years. Thirty-three of the number were men; the majority of the women were widows. The employments were various, needle-women chiefly predominating. The pitiful struggles made by so many with their needles gives this class a powerful claim upon our sympathy, and such cases as these, with failing health and eyesight, and increasing years, are specially dependent on others.

Some of the recipients live with single daughters, striving to keep their little homes together; others, having children too poor to help them, endeavour, by the exercise of extreme self-denial, to give them a little aid." Many of the men nominated had followed such useful occupations as carpenters, shoemakers, and gardeners.

The steady progress made by the Society is encouraging; for at the start, in 1807, there were only three pensioners, receiving in each case five guineas.

Thirty years later the distribution to between two and three hundred recipients had increased to over a thousand pounds. From that time to the present there has been a steady advance. The total number of pensioners assisted since the commencement is now not very far short of 5,000; and the sum given to these has reached a total of nearly £190,000.

The Society had been some time in existence before it possessed any Home of its own. That at Camberwell, opened in 1835, was the first; and the land for this was given by the late Mr. W. Peacock. In 1871 the first part of the Hornsey Rise Asylum was opened, the land having been paid for by subscriptions, while the building was erected by Mr. J. Box. The Brighton Home, the gift of Colonel Croll, was opened in 1879. The Home at Stamford Hill, which is partially endowed for coals, etc., was the gift of Miss Sarah Ward. Then there is another house, built and endowed at Gerrard's Cross, Bucks, by Sir J. W. Alexander, which will ultimately become the property of the Society for the use of pensioners.

Thus we have given the history of a very useful institution, and one which seems to increase in usefulness in proportion as it grows in years. Should anyone need further information, they will receive what they require by applying at the London Office, 83, Finsbury Pavement, E.C.

AFTER LONG YEARS.

A STORY IN THREE CHAPTERS. BY THE AUTHOR OF "TOO DEARLY BOUGHT," ETC. ETC.

CHAPTER I.—IN THE CHURCHYARD.

THERE was a soft coating of snow everywhere, on the smooth grassy corner of the churchyard not yet tenanted, on the long, low mounds so suggestive in their dim outlines of on the tall, solemn pines, and on the tiny laurels. All the windows were fairly wreathed, and the ivy on the tower and chancel had caught the feathery flakes, and held them, for it was freezing. The air was full of that intense silence that makes a winter's night so beautiful and impressive, and a cold, pale, distant moon revealed every object clearly.

It was Christmas Eve: an ideal Christmas; from the old church came the sound of cheerful young voices, and gleams of light flashed through the dark, shining masses of evergreens that hung on the walls and clustered round the pillars, still in disorder. There were bright wreaths on the dusty cushions, sweet flowers scattered over the moth-eaten seats, and on the carved oak screen in front of Sir Richard Darrell's pew hung garlands of ivy and holly. Inside the pew, on a stone effigy of a dead and gone Sir Richard, stood a basket of hot-house flowers and exquisite ferns. On a ladder in front of the old oak pulpit stood Madeline Hope, the Rector's only daughter, weaving with deft fingers a wreath to surround the faded crimson cushion, which her father would not have exchanged for the most exquisite specimen of art embroidery. By her side stood a gentleman handing her sprays of holly chosen with the utmost care, for the pulpit was Madeline's special task; on the other side of the ladder stood, or rather lounged, another gentleman, who looked as if he had no special interest in the proceedings; a third gentleman, tall, muscular, with kindly eyes that contradicted his grave, resolute face, was busy in the chancel; still, he managed to observe the group round the pulpit attentively.

“I'm getting on,” Madeline said, after a long and busy silence. “Is it not lovely, Dick?”

“Not particularly,” the young gentleman replied, who was leaning against his crusading ancestor. “You might have used those flowers and ferns. Crinkle said I might as well have taken the pots and plants since I cut all the blooms!”

“I'll make your peace with Crinkle, Dick,” Madeline said, descending the ladder, and looking lovingly at her work; “though I am sure he will be proud when he sees how lovely his flowers will look in Miss Leslie's old Chelsea jars; but I could not put them on the pulpit.”

“Why not, Madge?”

“You know father has such a dear old notion about evergreens. He thinks them emblematic of hope and faith eternal; they live through the heat of summer, the snows of winter; they smile and shine on the duller days, and are freshest and greenest when the world looks worst, and are boldest and bravest in adversity, like a heart at peace: so father says; and he loves the shining holly, with its cheerful crimson berries, more than all the camellias and orchids at the Manor.”

“I wanted to send you some orchids, but Crinkle sent the key of the house to uncle; but you will use the Christmas roses and lilies, Madge—I only secured them at great personal risk!”

“I can quite understand that, and they shall be placed where even Crinkle must be proud of them.”

“Are you finished?” the other gentleman said, drawing nearer. “I have a long drive, dear, and I want to see you home first.”

“I can't leave the church just yet, Philip.”

“Madge seldom leaves till ten,” Dick Darrell said carelessly. He didn't like Captain Philip Sandford.

“I can imagine no reason for Miss Hope remaining from home till that hour,” the Captain said stiffly.

Madeline glanced at Dick reproachfully, and then turning to the Captain, said gently, “I cannot go home just yet, Philip. I know father likes ‘to be with himself’ as long as possible on Christmas Eve; we are seldom finished before ten, and I have only to run through the churchyard. We always sit up for the waits, and sing a verse of ‘Christians, awake!’ just as the church clock strikes twelve. Can you not remain and spend the evening with us, Philip?”

“Impossible; we dine at eight; besides, your programme is not very tempting. I wish you had accepted mother's invitation to spend Christmas with us.”

“Oh, Philip! how could I leave dear father? he would miss me so!”

“So would others: Mr. Richard Darrell, for instance.”

“Philip,” Madeline said gently, “what do you mean?”

“Nothing, except that I am due at home, and have a long, cold drive. So good-night; I hope you will enjoy yourself and be very happy without me.”

“One doesn't associate happiness and enjoyment, in your sense of the words, with Christmas Eve, Philip; but I trust we shall feel, as father and I have felt for many years, grateful for the past and hopeful for the future. It has been a sweet and solemn season for me all my life, and the festivity of Thorpe would only make me sad."

"And your gravity would only make me gloomy, so on the present occasion perhaps we are as well apart. Good-night, Madeline," and, with a very low bow, Captain Sandford left the church, leaving Madeline very much puzzled.

"Philip's out of sorts to-night; what has annoyed him?" Dick Darrell said, joining her.

"I hardly know; perhaps he is disappointed that I did not accept his mother's invitation, and go to Thorpe; but never mind, he will be all right to-morrow."

"Can you spare me half an hour to-night, Madge? I have something to tell you."

"Certainly, Dick; you will come in, as usual?"

"No, I want to see you alone; I want your advice and assistance—yours only," he said, with nervous eagerness.

"One moment, Dick; you know Philip Sandford and I are engaged!"

"Of course—all the parish knows it; but what I have to say concerns myself; if you can't spare a minute to an old friend——"

"Dick, that's not like you. I can see you are in some fresh scrape, and if I can do anything to help you, I will—most gladly."

"I knew it, Madge. Forgive my impatience; but I am in real trouble this time."

"Cannot father help you?"

"No, Madge, it's a woman's voice must plead for me, a woman's tender heart must judge me. Spare me half an hour before you go in; I will not trouble you again, Madge. I leave England in three days."

"Poor Dick! he makes most of his troubles himself, and, I'm afraid, bears them very badly," Madeline mused, as she went on with her work; "and yet he looked strangely grave, and his voice was different to-night. I hope the dear boy has not got into a serious scrape!"

Mr. Gordon, the curate, who was busy in the chancel, watched the changes of Madeline's beautiful, earnest face with mingled feelings of anger and anxiety. He had known her for many years, been intimately associated with her in parish work, studied her character closely, and came to the conclusion that she was the most sweet, gracious, steadfast, unselfish woman that ever lived; she was his ideal of "a perfect woman, nobly planned," and yet he did not feel quite satisfied with her conduct that evening. It struck him as if she were playing off graceless Dick Darrell, the heir of Sir Richard, the greatest man of the county, against Captain Philip Sandford, of Thorpe, who was little more than a soldier of fortune, since his estate was heavily encumbered, and his mother, Lady Sandford, had a life interest in it.

The relations between Madeline Hope and young Darrell were somewhat peculiar. Twelve years before, a pale, delicate-looking boy of eleven arrived at the Rectory one evening, with a request from Sir Richard Darrell, of the Old Manor, that Mr. Hope would take charge of the lad (who had just arrived from India, having lost both his parents there), bring him up, and educate him as Sir Richard's nephew and heir. The Rector did not care to undertake the task, but there seemed no alternative except sending him to a public school, for his uncle, shut up in the Old Manor, amid old servants, would not even see him, and Madgie, the Rector's only child, pleaded hard to have the pretty, sad boy for a playfellow. Mr. Hope, who could refuse his motherless little daughter nothing, reluctantly consented. So little Dick Darrell became an inmate of Kenyon Rectory, and pupil of the gentle, learned, unworldly Mr. Hope. For several years the Rector tried in vain to induce Sir Richard to see his nephew, but the old gentleman sternly refused.

"He will have the Manor some day: that I cannot help; but it shall never be his home while I live," he used to say; but when Dick was about fifteen, he consented that the boy might pay him an occasional visit. At first Dick refused to go unless Madgie accompanied him, for he was somewhat afraid of the terrible uncle he had only seen once. Madge was afraid, too, but she was curious, and agreed to go with him just once. So the two children, outwardly brave and inwardly trembling, started to see the terrible guardian. He was not such an "ogre," after all—only a thin, delicate-looking old man, with a high, sharp voice, and restless dark eyes. He glanced at Dick sternly at first, then a little more kindly, and sighed as if he experienced a certain sensation of relief.

"You're a Darrell; you resemble the first Sir Richard in features; you have all his self-will, thoughtlessness, and obstinacy too, I suppose. Go and tell Crinkle to give you some peaches—all boys like peaches."

"I don't," Dick said boldly. "I like grapes, and so does Madgie."

The old gentleman frowned, and looked so fierce that Madgie trembled; contradiction in any form was unknown to Sir Richard; then he glanced at the shy little girl standing behind Dick, and a sort of spasm passed over his face.

"Come here, my dear, and tell me your name," he said gently.

"Madeline, Sir Richard."

"Ah! I thought so. Faces, like history, repeat themselves," he murmured, stroking her long golden curls. "Madeline is a very pretty name, and you are very like your mother; be a good girl, and take care of Dick—Crinkle!"

"Yes, Sir Richard," the old gardener answered through the open window. He was ostensibly sweeping up the dead leaves, but in reality trying to hear something of the conversation between Sir Richard and his nephew.

"Cut some grapes—black Hamburgs—for these children, and a basket of flowers, the best you have—no, no, not the orchids, but anything else—and send them to the Rectory at once; and tell Mr. Hope to send his little girl to see me again, and give the boy a sound thrashing; all boys deserve to be thrashed."

"I don't," Dick said sturdily.

Sir Richard frowned terribly, and Crinkle, dreading a storm, hurried the children into the conservatory.

As Madeline grew older, she became quite a favourite with crusty old Sir Richard, who seldom saw his nephew, and then only to find fault with him. When Dick went to college and got into scrapes, it was Madeline who pleaded his cause; it was to her he confessed all his misdemeanours, and till within a few weeks the Rectory had been his only home; but, greatly to Dick's astonishment, his uncle had asked him to spend that Christmas at the Manor, and kept him almost constantly with him: studying his character, the old gentleman said; trying his temper, everyone else thought.

"He glanced at Dick sternly at first."—p. 300.

It was therefore quite natural that Dick should seek an interview with Madeline, equally natural that she should grant it; and when the decorations were finished she joined him in the churchyard. For half an hour they paced up and down the broad moonlit path, talking earnestly; then they paused at the gate leading into the Rectory garden, and Dick, taking both Madeline's hands, bent down and kissed her forehead tenderly, whispered one word in her ear, and then hurried away through the fields. Madeline entered the house slowly, with a very white, troubled face, and for the first time for many years she did not join in the music of the waits.

CHAPTER II.—DOUBTED.

"ARE you quite resolved to give me no explanation of last night's adventures, Madeline?"

"There is no explanation possible, Philip, while you speak to me in that tone and look at me in that way. Indeed, there is no explanation possible at all, nor, so far as I can see, necessary, unless you have any to offer. I should like to hear some good excuse for your spying. Yes, dear Philip, it's a very unpleasant word, and I do not wonder you wince; still, you did play the spy last night. How came you to be lurking in the churchyard when I thought you were at home?"

It was Christmas Day, and Madeline and Captain Sandford were standing by the drawing-room fire; the Rector had retired to his study for an hour's rest; Madeline had settled herself for an hour, too, but not to rest: she had a very difficult problem to solve with regard to poor Dick Darrell's affairs, and a very painful duty to perform. She was aroused from her reverie by the entrance of Captain Sandford, and in a moment her whole face changed.

"Philip dear, this is an unexpected pleasure! I did not dare hope to see you to-day; I thought you could not leave home."

"I have no doubt the wish was father to the thought," he said gloomily, without noticing her outstretched hand. "I have come because I could not rest without some explanation of your conduct last night. I witnessed your interview with Richard Darrell in the churchyard, and I want to know the meaning of it."

"It was nothing, Philip dear; Dick was in a worse scrape than usual, and he wanted to tell me," Madeline said earnestly. "Surely there was no harm in that!"

"No harm in my promised wife walking with Mr. Richard Darrell after ten o'clock at night—no harm in holding her hands and kissing her!" Captain Sandford cried, working himself into a fearful passion. "You have strangely unsophisticated notions, Miss Hope. I must have some further and better explanation of that very interesting and impressive interview."

"I can give you no other explanation, Philip," Madeline replied, with quiet dignity. "I told my father all that I can tell you: namely, that Dick is in serious trouble, and wants my help. My father bade me do what I could for him, and asked no further questions. Surely if my father trusts me you can, Philip!"

"Why should I, since you have no confidence in me? I cannot conceive any happiness without mutual trust."

"Nor I," Madeline replied sadly. "I am sorry I cannot explain fully all Dick said to me last night; but it is a secret, and I have given my promise not to mention the matter to anyone except his uncle, and not even to him for a certain time. The matter does not in any way concern us: that is all I can say."

"Then you have said either a great deal too little or too much," Captain Sandford said gloomily. "I confess I am not satisfied, nor am I greatly surprised. I must have been mad to think I had any chance against Mr. Richard Darrell. Everyone but myself saw clearly enough which way his attentions pointed!"

"Philip!"

"It only remains for me to wish you joy of your conquest, and say adieu. It will probably be farewell for ever, as my regiment is under immediate orders for India. There is warm work before us, and I at least have little reason to dread the front. Good-bye, Miss Hope. I cannot wish you happiness just yet, but I wish you no ill; some day I may be able to say I forgive you!"

"Philip, I do not understand! You surely cannot be leaving me in anger, and perhaps for ever! What does it all mean? You are trying to tease me."

"No, darling, but you are teasing me, perhaps," he said hastily. "Tell me it's only a joke, Madeline; say you will explain everything."

"There is nothing to explain," she replied, in pained bewilderment. "I have told you all there is to tell. Dick's secret——"

"And yours! Pardon me if I have seemed impatiently curious, but I thought our relations entitled me to some small share of your confidence. I was mistaken. Farewell once more;" and before Madeline fully realised the meaning of his words, he was gone, with jealous rage and anger in his heart, stifling and crushing out all his nobler and better feelings. It was well that he did not encounter Dick Darrell just then, for he was incapable of listening to reason. Early the next day he left Kenyon to join his regiment, firmly resolved to forget even the very name of Madeline Hope and his brief dream of happiness, and mistrust the very name of woman during the rest of his life.

Madeline made no murmur; if she suffered, it was in secret, bravely and cheerfully. She took up the unexpected burden laid on her shoulders, she faithfully kept the promise she made to Dick, and performed the service she undertook none the less loyally that it cost her so much.

CHAPTER III.—RIGHTED.

TWENTY years is a long time to look forward to, but sadly short to look back upon. To Madeline Hope, standing in the old church at Kenyon, it seemed but a very little while since she stood one Christmas Eve with Dick Darrell and Captain Sandford. There was another Dick Darrell standing almost in the same spot and attitude: a frank, handsome, boyish face, with the other Dick's sunny smile and without his troubled brow. The Vicar was there too, a grave, portly man, with keen eyes and a firm mouth. Twenty years ago he had been the curate, and desperately in love with Madeline Hope; now his two boys are her most devoted admirers. They were looking at the pulpit which Madeline had just finished decorating, and Mrs. Gordon and the boys were trying to persuade her to go back to the Vicarage with them.

"Break through your rule just this once, dear," Mrs. Gordon said kindly. "I know you prefer being alone on Christmas Eve, but every rule has its exception. You know my cousin from India is coming——"

"Jane, my love, don't worry Madeline," the Vicar interposed hastily; "she will have other opportunities of meeting the General."

"You look tired, auntie," young Dick Darrell said, earnestly. "The church is too hot, or cold, or something."

It was not either heat or cold that turned Madeline's cheeks so deadly white, and sent such a pain through her heart. A moment, a meeting she had long dreaded, was at hand. Philip Sandford was coming home. She knew the Vicar's wife was his cousin, that in all probability he would return to the Hall some day, and had often wondered how they would meet after so many years. Since that Christmas Day when they had parted in anger, twenty years before, Madeline had never seen or heard from her old lover, but she had not been quite ignorant of his glorious career in India; and now he was coming home. If he had come footsore, weary, begging his bread from door to door, she would have welcomed him gladly ; but famous, covered with glory—would he even remember her? And he would come to her old home, and stand, perhaps, on the very spot where they parted. Madeline felt she could not meet him there.

The world had not gone very smoothly with her since that memorable day. Before the next June roses bloomed her beloved father had passed suddenly away, "ceased upon the midnight, with no pain," and she had to leave the dear old home. She was not left unprovided for, but an addition to her income was most desirable. So she took morning pupils, and after a time became daily governess to Mr. Gordon's ever-increasing family. Dick Darrell's secret proved a heavy one. He had contracted a clandestine and wholly unsuitable marriage, and it was to entreat Madeline's friendship and intercession for his little son that he sought the interview which caused so much sorrow and misunderstanding; for his heartless wife had deserted both him and her baby. Dick, hopeless and heart-broken, left the country, and Madeline never heard from him. For the baby she pleaded with Sir Richard in vain; he would not acknowledge the marriage or receive the child. Everything in the world he could he alienated from his heir and bequeathed to the County Infirmary, and he died without forgiving Dick or even seeing his little son. The child was absolutely unprovided for; all efforts to trace his father proved unavailing; so he was left on Madeline's hands to bring up and educate as well as she could. He knew no home, no love, no relative but Auntie Hope, and all the love of a warm, generous heart he lavished on her, and was already beginning to make her more substantial returns, having secured a situation in a wholesale warehouse in Manchester.

Meantime, the pleasant chatter in the church went on; everyone was busy and happy, and Madeline, whose particular task was finished, stole out into the quiet churchyard, and almost mechanically paced up and down the narrow path leading to the Rectory, thinking of poor Dick Darrell.

"Will he ever return to see his son?" she mused aloud, "or has he passed to where 'beyond those voices there is peace'? Poor Dick! does he know, I wonder, what a wreck he made of my life?"

"No; it was I wrecked your life, and my own too, Madeline—I, by my insane jealousy, my pride, and my passion, ruined our happiness. Can you ever forgive me?"

"Philip, Philip! at last!"

"At last I know the truth, and I have only come to England to ask your forgiveness. Three months ago I met Dick Darrell, and he told me all. Can you pardon me? is it too late to make amends?"

What Madeline said she never could remember, nor how long it took her to say it, but her reply seemed to satisfy General Sandford, and it was only the clashing of the bells that reminded them how long they had loitered in the quiet churchyard.

A few weeks after, there was a very quiet wedding in Kenyon Church, and General Sandford and his wife settled down in the old Hall, having for their permanent guest a prematurely aged and feeble man, subject to long fits of mental aberration. He is the wreck of Richard Darrell. He had spent fifteen years in a Tartar prison, and his health and reason gave way under the tortures he suffered. The only thing that ever interests and pleases him is the presence of his son, whose devotion is touching to see. The old Manor is let, and the income, wisely invested, promises in a few years to make a competence for young Dick, but unless he can add to his fortune by business it will be long before he can reside there in a manner befitting his position.

Madeline and Philip are very happy in the quiet autumn of their lives; the shadows have passed away like the winter snows, and their mutual love has not lessened by waiting so many long years.

SYMPATHY.

(JOHN xi. 35.)

SYMPATHY divine,
Which called forth loving tears,
Which made our sorrows Thine,
And banished all our fears!

We mourned our loved one gone,
Clasped in the arms of Death;
But, Lord, Thy word alone
Recalled his vital breath.

It was Thy potent voice
Which made our brother rise,
And caused us to rejoice,
To see him with our eyes.

What though with napkin bound,
And mould'ring in the grave?

What though a stone was found,
And laid upon the cave?

Nor bars nor bolts withstand Thine own Almighty word—
At once, at Thy command,
"Come forth," the dead man heard.

And rising 'midst the throng
Of mourners, thus he proved
How Jesus all along
Their brother much had loved.

Dear Jesus! give us grace,
'Midst all the ills we see,
Thy loving steps to trace,
And show like sympathy.

REV. JAMES HARRIS, M.A.

"The smallest stream that murmured past seemed conscious of the grandeur around."

GOD'S RIGHTEOUSNESS LIKE THE GREAT MOUNTAINS.

"Thy righteousness is like the great mountains."—PSALM xxxvi. 6.

BY THE REV. HUGH MACMILLAN, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E.

A FEW months ago I was in the heart of one of the grandest mountain regions in Scotland. The scene around me was truly magnificent. Great peaks towered up to the clouds, their summits scarred and weather-beaten, their sides seamed with torrents. The shadows of the stooping clouds lay upon their broad shoulders like dark pine-woods; and here and there some sunlit spot glowed with brighter greenness, like the gleam in the inside of an emerald when held up to the light. The highest peak of all was shrouded with mist, which, like the veil of the Temple, formed for it an inner and more awful sanctuary. There was a hush in the air, as if some great presence was expected. The smallest stream that murmured past seemed conscious of the grandeur around. It was a scene in which the world-sick soul might recover its spiritual tone and feel the greatness of its destiny.

While wandering in the midst of it, and looking up reverently at the great peaks that bounded the horizon, the words of the Psalmist, "Thy righteousness is like the great mountains," came home with new force and meaning to my heart. I thought of that Great Power Who is nearest to us when man is farthest off, and Whose infinitude is best symbolised by the grandeur of the mountains. I thought of the mountain-worship of the ancient inhabitants of this country; of the cairns which they erected on the summits of the highest hills, as the altars where they felt themselves in thought and feeling, as in actual position, nearest heaven, and realised how natural it was. Mountains, so far from the world, so high above it, have been associated with all that separates man from the beasts that perish, and enables him to realise his immortality. The dying Jacob, in blessing his sons, and the dying Moses, in blessing the tribes of Israel, spoke of the precious things of the everlasting hills. The exiles on the Babylonian plains looked with longing to the far-off hills of their native land, which spoke to them so powerfully of the wonderful deliverances vouchsafed by God in former times to their fathers. As the mountains were round about Jerusalem, so the salvation of God was the defence of His people. The hills of the Holy Land were the great altar-steps that led up to the immediate presence of God. They smoked with His terror; they were transfigured with His glory. From the Mount of Beatitudes came the great discourse which links religion and morality in the most perfect harmony; and on Mount Calvary was transacted the greatest event in the universe—was planted the Cross of infinite love and self-sacrifice, which draws all men to God and to one another in Him. Well, then, might the righteousness of God be compared to the great mountains, among which it was first revealed and the grandest manifestations of it given!

THE ELEMENT OF GRANDEUR.

1. The first point of comparison is grandeur. In one sense, indeed, we cannot compare the righteousness of God with the greatness of mountains, for they belong to altogether different spheres. The one is a moral quality, and the other is a physical object. The one is uncreated and self-derived, the other is a dependent creation. The smallest thing that has life and self-consciousness, the humblest creature that knows right from wrong, is transcendently more valuable and important than the grandest mass of dead matter. But though in this sense we cannot find any comparison between the creature and the Creator, there is another sense in which we see an interesting relation between them. We can say that what the mountains are in the physical sphere, the righteousness of God is in the moral. It is a question of analogy. It is a comparison, not of things, but of terms. We say that as the great mountains affect the eye and mind, so the righteousness of God affects the soul. They produce upon our minds an impression which is somewhat akin. A well-known German philosopher said that the two things which impressed him most deeply were the starry heavens and the moral law. No one can stand beneath the clear midnight sky in winter, studded with brilliant stars, without being profoundly stirred. No one who has a sensitive conscience and a keen moral perception can think of the majesty of the Divine Law without being awed. And the Psalmist in the nineteenth Psalm places the two revelations of God, in nature and in the Law, side by side in the most suggestive and impressive manner. The mountains—which are the grandest objects of nature, which mingle with the clouds and claim kindred with the skies, which announce the rosy dawn long ere the darkness has left the valleys, and wear upon their brow as a diadem the star of evening—appeal to us in the same way as the Law of God, which draws the soul of man with silent but irresistible power from the visible to the invisible, from itself to the whole universe which it affects. It is not, however, the lesser hills which men have often climbed, and from whose tops they have looked down upon the earth, that are alluded to in the comparison; but the great mountains, the virgin peaks of the world which have never been trodden by human foot, which enthrone sublimity on wondering fear; and the farther we recede from them, the more astonishing they appear. Like these great mountains is the righteousness of God, which rises high above all man's puny efforts after a righteousness of his own. As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are His thoughts higher than our thoughts, and His ways than our ways. Our goodness reacheth not unto Him. Our righteousness is mingled with low, selfish, unworthy feelings and motives. The best of it is on a level with the frailty of our frame and the weakness of our moral nature. The most righteous man is full of imperfections. He is partial, unequal, variable. The ten commandments were written upon tables of stone, hewn out of the rocks of Sinai; but these ten commandments, although they are the transcripts of God's nature, are no more to that nature in its entirety than the tables of stone are to the whole bulk of Sinai. They are limitations and adjustments adapted to our small capacity and limited powers. And even these commandments we cannot keep. We are continually breaking them in thought, word, and deed. We have seen an end of all perfection; we see how fugitive, how faulty, how unworthy of reliance is man's most perfect virtue. But God's commandment is exceedingly broad. His perfection flows around our imperfection, round our restlessness His rest. His righteousness, like the great mountains, creates a solitude around it; it is unique, unequalled. It is stainless as the untrodden snow on the highest peaks. It is solid as the substance of the rock. It is glorious as the sunset glow which incarnadines the mountain-top with celestial fire. As the highest mountains cannot be measured by the eye from their own base, appearing dwarfed and foreshortened, and require to be ascended in order that a true idea may be formed of their size, so the righteousness of God cannot be estimated aright by sinful man. It seems the more wonderful the nearer we seek to come to it in our character and conduct. The higher we climb, the farther off does it seem, and the saints that have stood on the highest pinnacle of grace have realised most truly how unapproachable it was, how its sky-line soared aloft into the inaccessible empyrean, and have felt themselves, in comparison with it, to be the chief of sinners. The righteousness of God is not like the lower hills of our northern land, whose inferior size needs the concealing and exaggerating effects of mist and cloud, the enhancement of mystery; but like the mountains of a southern clime, whose grandeur is so inherent that it can be unveiled to the purest and most unclouded sky: and the more we gaze, the more perfectly satisfied does the eye become.

THE ELEMENT OF STABILITY.

The next point of comparison between the righteousness of God and the great mountains is stability. Mountains are the most enduring of all earthly objects. They stood there, with the stars, when time began. They are the pillars of the earth, that continue firm and unchanged while all else is slowly but surely passing away. Year after year, age after age, they remain unmoved, while the fleeting generations of men, like broken billows of the sea, spend themselves at their feet. Whole dynasties have passed, and feeble scars are all that time has engraved upon their brows. Amid the wreck of centuries and races fled, they stand mute monuments of all, sublime, alone. But the righteousness of God is more stable than the everlasting mountains. It is the Divine principle which maintains the mountains in existence; which weighs the mountains in scales and the hills in a balance; which determines their exact shape and position, and size and material, in accordance with the most perfect balancing of nature, and the most efficient carrying on of her operations. The mountains are what they are, and stand where they stand, according to the strictest laws of equity. And shall not the Divine righteousness, which is the cause of all this wonderful order and harmony, prove more stable than the objects themselves in which it is seen illustrated? The mountains shall depart and the hills be removed, but His kindness will not depart from us, nor the covenant of His peace be removed.

The righteousness of God, I have said, is compared not to little hills, over which the waves of time and change that submerge the plains might be supposed in some degree to pass, but to the great mountains, to the highest of all, which might seem to be raised far above all the perturbations of earth. And yet, strange to say, the highest mountains of the earth are the youngest. The Alps, Andes, and Himalayas are far more modern than our own Grampian Hills, and witness to the most extraordinary changes that have within comparatively recent times affected large parts of the earth's surface. Not only are the torrent, the avalanche, and the storm waging fierce, incessant war against the mountains and wearing them down; but the viewless air, the sunbeam, the rain, and the snow are disintegrating their rocks perpetually. And thus the mountains, as the poet says, "change their shapes and flow from form to form."

"Like clouds they shape themselves and go."

It is but a question of a little longer time with them, for they are only more permanent forms of vapour. But the righteousness that moulds and upholds the mountains is from everlasting to everlasting. It is an essential principle in God's nature; it is the fundamental truth of religion. He upon Whom creation hangs, and in Whom all His creatures trust, is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. Destitute of this unchangeable righteousness, He would cease to be God. No dependence could be placed upon the laws of nature were a capricious being regulating them; and human life would be a fitful, feverish dream, harassed continually by the mysteries of accident and chance. But invested with this glorious attribute, inwoven, as it were, into His very nature, and constituting the imperishable aspect in which all His other attributes are displayed—what a sublime object of contemplation does He present to the devout soul! We recognise the stability of God's righteousness in the persistency of the great world-covenant, that seed-time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, day and night, shall never cease. We recognise it in the certainty with which sin is punished and virtue rewarded, holiness is happiness, and wickedness is misery. We recognise it in the immutability of His sacred Word, not one jot or tittle of which shall fail of being fulfilled. We recognise it in the wonderful tenacity of His purpose of grace, which dates from the past eternity, and shall extend to the future. During all the ages and the great changes which they involved, He abandoned not the work of His hands. Through man's Fall, and the consequent overthrow of the moral government of the world, He remained true to His original design. The faithful Creator became the merciful Redeemer. Under the new conditions which man's sin produced, He carried out His own righteous and loving plans. Amid the varying dispensations of His providence He is without variableness or shadow of turning.

THE ELEMENT OF GOODNESS.

The last point of resemblance between the righteousness of God and the great mountains is in the element of goodness. Formerly the rough, wild, storm-breeding mountains were associated only with gloom and terror. Their bare rocks, and snowy peaks, and dark forests repelled all human sympathies, and seemed to belong to an alien, accursed land. This feeling among intelligent people is now, however, completely changed. Our age is more poetical, and in more senses than one it is more spiritual. The spiritual elements in mountain scenery—of which the rocks, and the forests, and the snow-fields are the material robes—are more clearly apprehended and more powerfully felt. We now recognise that the places which our forefathers regarded as howling, unprofitable wastes are in reality the sources of fertility and health. Mountains are more precious than cornfields and meadows. Without them no meadows or cornfields could exist. Without mountains no human being could live upon the earth. Without mountains there would be no dry land; and one shoreless ocean would tumble round the globe. By elevating some portions of land above the rest, and so forming mountains, God conserved all the land. These elevated portions attract the clouds, which form the sources of streams and rivers that water the plains and create life and fertility wherever they flow. The very materials of the soil are ground and washed down from the mountains by these streams, which sow the dust of continents to be. It is worthy of notice that the great mountains of Scotland are in the west, and rise abruptly from the sea; while the great level plains are in the east. Most of the great rivers of Scotland flow into the eastern ocean, and they have created the plains through which they flow by the soil which they have brought down from the mountains. So is it in South America. So is it everywhere. Mountains are also the cause of the varied climates of the world. They regulate the direction of the winds, and the rainfall, and the distribution of life; while the parched earth revives in their cool shadows, and is refreshed by their showers and breezes.

Mountains, we thus see, are the most useful and indispensable objects in nature. Their existence is a perpetual monument of God's wise goodness; their ministry is a proof of His constant beneficence. It is true, indeed, that they occasionally generate storms and tempests and floods, which work havoc among the fields and possessions of man; but these exceptional and temporary outbursts of wrath are meant to issue in larger and more permanent good—to remove evils which would be infinitely worse than any disastrous effects which they may happen to produce. The very wrath of the mountains praises God, and subserves His wise and gracious purposes towards His creation. And in this respect of goodness are not the great mountains a striking symbol of the righteousness of God? Many, indeed, regard the righteousness of God with dread. They associate it exclusively with the terrors of Sinai; they recall the awful effects of it in the destruction of the world by the Flood, and in the overthrow of Sodom by fire, and in the frequent terrible punishment of the Israelites on account of their backslidings and idolatries. They never think of the righteousness of God without thinking of the doom inflicted upon our first parents on account of their sin, and of all the inherited evils and dark miseries which have flowed from that sin and borne its appropriate fruit. Righteousness seems to them only a stern attribute—a severe, rigid, inflexible element of God's nature, with which no idea of gentleness or tenderness can be connected. Instead of being the manifestation of His love, they place it in contrast with His love. They view it, not as the display, but as the opposition, of mercy. They set up an antagonism between the Father and the Son in the work of man's redemption. They conceive of the Father as full of pitiless wrath and vengeance only, and of the Son as full only of loving-kindness and tender mercy. They think of the atoning death of Christ as a salvation out of God's inflexible hands. They believe that His righteousness would be equally satisfied by the salvation or by the destruction of a sinner.

These conceptions of God's righteousness are as erroneous in their own sphere as are the conceptions in another sphere of those who regard the mountains with terror as evil and accursed places. It is true that the righteousness of God cannot tolerate sin; that it punishes, and must punish, the unrighteousness of man; and those whose awakened consciences convict them of personal sin cannot but regard the righteousness of God with fear and dread. It is true that as the mountains are associated with dangers and casualties, with storms and floods, so the righteousness of God, coming into conflict with a sinful world, must inflict upon it the due consequences of sin. It is true that there are dark problems in the universe of Him, all whose ways are just and true; but we shall never shed light upon them by casting a shadow upon God's goodness. The very constancy with which He adheres to His own lofty and loving purposes is often the reason why He is misunderstood by men—why so many of His ways seem dark to our ignorance and stern to our selfishness. But the more enlightened we become, the more His grace works in us—the more do we recognise that His righteousness is like the great mountains; not only in their occasional destructive forces, but also in their continuous ministries of beneficence. And as a more profound and enlarged conception of these exceptional destructive forces of the mountains will show them to be productive of greater ultimate good in the scheme of nature, so a deeper study of God's righteousness will discern, even in its most awful outbreaks, purposes of mercy, and acknowledge that judgments are rich blessings in disguise. We see enough of the grand method of mercy in the whole history of man to justify the confident belief that even the darkest dealings of Divine justice are broken portions of a great plan of salvation which we cannot grasp in its completeness. We can see God's righteousness most clearly in the punishment of sin. It is the black background against which it shines most brightly. Righteousness is only a manifestation of love, and love must bear the sword. The good of God's universe requires that evil should be destroyed. It is the highest righteousness that least tolerates sin—that works by every possible method, gracious or severe, to eliminate it out of the universe. In the Cross of Christ we behold the highest exemplification of righteousness—a righteousness which demands that even the blood of the Son of God should be shed, if He appears as the surety and substitute of sinful man. We behold there the goodness and severity of God—severity towards sin, and goodness towards the sinner; mercy and truth meeting together, righteousness and peace embracing each other.

I never see a lofty mountain enveloped with dark mist without a feeling of profound awe. That mist seems a veil behind which, in the inmost sanctuary of nature, God is doing His wonderful work of mediation in nature. Behind that veil the clouds are forming the sources of rivers and streams, and the rocks are crumbling into soil that will enrich and fertilise the plains. Behind that veil the mountains are sustaining the violence of the storm, that other regions may be calm; are dreary and desolate and forsaken, that other regions may be bright and beautiful, and blessed with the most varied and joyful life. They are elevated above the rest of the earth, and endowed with exceptional grandeur, not for their own sakes only, but that they may diffuse the blessings of heaven over the parched places of the earth that need them, sacrificing themselves in so doing. And in all this I am reminded of the awful darkness around Calvary, that hill "of God" above all others. I think of the Incarnate Righteousness that sacrificed Himself there for a lost and perishing world. The Son of God within that veil, in the inmost and holiest sanctuary of the universe, is suffering and dying, in order that the lost innocence of man may be regained, and the lost beauty of the world restored; and I feel indeed that the righteousness of God is like the great mountains, not only in grandeur of nature, and stability of endurance and goodness of operation, but also in that quality which is the most transcendent of all—self-sacrifice: losing, that we might gain; becoming poor, that we might become rich; becoming sin for us, that we might become the righteousness of God in Him. On Calvary we can no longer abstract the righteousness of God from the Living Person Who is the Saviour of the sinner, Who loves him with such infinite tenderness that He laid down His life for him, and Who is spending all His efforts to draw him to Himself. And there, while we feel that we cannot atone for the least transgression of God's Law, we know that Divine justice is satisfied with the sacrifice of infinite love.

In this vale of tears, where everything is changing and passing away, our friends, our possessions, our joys, our memories, our very feelings; where all around us are autumn's fading leaves, and the churchyard's increasing mounds, and the fireside's lessening circle; where we cannot even hold our faith at all times securely, how blessed to lift up our eyes to the everlasting hills from whence cometh our help, to God's unchanging faithfulness and unfailing mercy! Under deep conviction of sin, feeling that our own righteousness is crumbling like a bank of sand beneath our feet, and dreading the just wrath of God, how precious to feel that His righteousness is as the great mountains, and that we are encouraged to take our stand, not at the foot of Sinai, the mount of the Law, but at the foot of the Cross on Calvary, where God's righteousness, justice, holiness, long as much for the restoration of the sinner to righteousness as His mercy and love; where God is not merely merciful or pitiful, but faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness! There the righteousness of Christ will lift us to its own height, as Longfellow says of the mountains—

"But breathe the air of mountains,
And their unapproachable summits
Shall lift thee to the level of themselves."

SOUND-MINDED RELIGION.

AN INTERVIEW WITH THE REV. HUGH SINCLAIR PATERSON, M.D.

BY OUR SPECIAL COMMISSIONER.

LIKE most other friends, I expect you will say I am in a muddle," remarked Dr. Sinclair Paterson, as we entered his "den," as he called his library; "but I know where every book is; i.e.," he added, with a twinkle in his kindly eye, "if no one has been arranging them."

Certainly the appearance of the room might not commend itself to a professed lover of punctilious order and neatness; but might be dear, nevertheless, to the student and the bookman. Books were everywhere. Shelf upon shelf, almost up to the very edge of the cornice-moulding, were crammed with them, heaps were upon the floor, piles upon the table, and overflowing from the room through the folding doors (which in this instance were curtains) into the apartment beyond, where again the same thing seemed repeated.

"When I came here," said Dr. Paterson, a little later on, complacently regarding his books, "When I came here, the man said I had nine tons of them; and I expect I have added three or four tons since!" A glance around shows that their owner is, as he himself said, omnivorous, for almost all departments of literature are represented. For instance, one of Casell's adventure books—"Captain Trafalgar"—represents near erudite works on theology, and a volume of American poetry is not far from books on law and history.

There is method, too, in the arrangement of what might appear to the careless observer to be this chaos of volumes. Thus over the fireplace the books of general literature are ranged. Then scientific works have their place; law and history are grouped next; books dealing with the Bible, metaphysical and philosophical works; and sermons, comprising volumes of discourses by great preachers of every denomination—all these are in Dr. Paterson's library, and have their place, while on the floor are some to which he points as yet "unclassified."

And in the centre of the most book-crowded of the two rooms, just near a green-shaded gas-lamp, a small table with a reading-desk affixed on the one hand, and a larger table, of course book-covered, on the other, Dr. Paterson sits in his arm-chair, and studies and reads sometimes the livelong day. There you may see Dr. Paterson at home; there you may behold him, a hard-working student among his books.

The small brass plate on the back of the arm-chair reveals that it is a presentation. It was given him by the Belgrave Presbyterian Church, after giving up the pastorate. And thereby hangs a tale.

"My predecessor is also my successor," says our host, "and people find that statement hard to understand until they know all the facts. The truth is, I preceded Dr. Adolph Saphir in the pastorate of Belgrave Church, and succeeded him in the pastorate of my present charge, Trinity Presbyterian Church, Notting Hill.

"I often tell people that many of the difficulties of the Bible are like this statement—they are difficult to understand only because all the facts are not known. When they are known, the difficulty at once is solved."

Many people, we fancy, will agree with Dr. Paterson in this remark, even if they forget to apply the principle themselves at times. For it is frequently the case that problems of all kinds are really caused by simple ignorance of the facts; and, these being known, all difficulty vanishes.

And now concerning Dr. Paterson's church. "It was," said he, in answer to queries, "originally a proprietary chapel under the Church of England; but it took fire, and the proprietor, who was also the minister, sold it to the English Presbyterians. They purchased it for Dr. Adolph Saphir, who came there from Greenwich. But his health broke down, and he was obliged to give up. I was minister of the Belgrave Church, and after a time, when Moderator of the Belgrave Session, suggested that Dr. Saphir should preach at that church for three months. The end of it was that he became my successor at Belgrave Chapel." And so comes about the apparent paradox that his predecessor is his successor.

"I have been over seven years at Trinity. We call many of our churches 'Trinity' to distinguish them from the Unitarians. They call themselves Presbyterians sometimes because some of the old Presbyterians of the Puritan times became Unitarians. But I sometimes twit my Congregational friends that these Presbyterians were Independents before Unitarians; otherwise, the Presbytery would have prohibited their preaching.

"My congregation consists largely of persons engaged in Christian work outside my church. In the morning, when many of them are there, I give expository sermons, following a connected course, and I always speak to the children for about ten minutes, having usually a story or an illustration; I think the older people like this as much as the children; in the evening I deliver lectures on a given subject—usually a series—when more strangers are attracted.

"Just now I am dealing with the Bible and Modern Thought. I have taken a position that the Bible is true, is inspired, and we have not to defend it, but to attack the enemy. That is the true principle in warfare and in argument. The best defence is an attack, said some celebrated general." And that is the principle on which Dr. Paterson acts.

"But you would not say that all science is antagonistic to the Bible?"

"No true science is antagonistic to the Bible," was the decided reply. "But I believe anthropological hypotheses, and evolutionary and Darwinian theories, are not science. We have in Scotland a legal verdict 'not proven,' and that is my verdict on evolution—it is not proved. But if it were, I am not afraid of it. I have studied science a good deal, and try to keep abreast of the scientific thought of the day. I am not in the least jealous of science. No one truth can contradict another truth. So let the theologian investigate, and the scientist also, and if they both arrive at truth, they will find it stands on the same basis. Our minds may not see the connection between them, but a larger mind may."

That is the position occupied by Dr. Paterson, and it may help some persons who, not having the time or not caring to investigate such matters for themselves, may perhaps feel now and again disquieted by new scientific theories or some of the suggestions of modern thought.

Theologically, Dr. Paterson is a strict Calvinist—"as strict a Calvinist as you please to make me," said he: "I follow the Puritanism of the seventeenth century." Sound-mindedness is his idea of what religion should induce; and he contends that sound-mindedness is not tame-mindedness, nor dull-, nor feeble-mindedness. Certainly the twinkle in his keen and kindly eye indicates that he can enjoy a good joke as much as most men, and that religion is not to him a dull and gloomy thing, nor intended to cast a dark shadow over life.

Coming to speak of the work of his church, he tells us that some of the young ladies connected with it are engaged among the laundry girls at Kensal Green, and others assist at the Latimer Road Mission and at similar undertakings. "We have just bought," he continues, "an old music-hall near our church, and have converted it into a mission hall capable of accommodating three or four hundred people. We are using it at present as a Sunday-school on Sunday afternoons, and I inaugurated recently the first of a series of temperance meetings to be held there, by lecturing on Temperance and Health. We open it shortly as a lads' institute, for lads between the ages of fifteen and twenty. We shall have a room fitted up with a carpenter's bench, and so on, and we hope to get some gymnastic apparatus for them as well.

"I look upon the getting hold of the lads of that age as one of the problems of the time," and he further expressed the belief that the problem can be solved, if persons would but show the youths that they are really interested in them, and would provide means of social, mental, and above all of spiritual improvement.

To different preachers, different methods and differences of style must of course belong, each one after his own order and according to his own character. Dr. Paterson's sermons are, as has been indicated, chiefly expository. "I like continuous exposition of the Bible," said he. "In the morning I have been going through the Gospel of St. John for a year. I like to have a definite subject before my mind, and endeavour to get the exact sense of the Scripture, and to found on that such lessons as may be most suitable. I have always been accustomed to do this. When in Glasgow, I had many engineers among my people, and that mode of preaching was relished by them."

Dr. Paterson's language is precise and clear; no doubt his scientific studies have conduced to this result. There is no straining after rhetorical effect; he is almost conversational in style, yet can be very emphatic on occasions when he considers emphasis to be necessary. His point is to aim at a clear, instructive talk, as he himself expressed it. He thinks out his sermons and addresses well before he delivers them, but always speaks extempore, though sometimes the very words of a particular sentence will be thought out and chosen beforehand.

From his boyhood, Dr. Paterson has been a hard student. Born at Campbelltown, in Argyllshire, in 1832, he early entered the grammar school in that place, and when only twelve years of age he received the gold medal for classics and mathematics from the Duke of Argyll. Thence he went to college, passed through the usual curriculum for five sessions, and afterwards underwent a theological course of four years at Edinburgh. In addition to this, Dr. Paterson, choosing to become a medical missionary, studied medicine for five years; some of this time running concurrently with his former studies. But suffering from rheumatic fever—which he has had five times in his life—he was obliged to give up the prospect, and, entering the Free Presbyterian Church, was ordained minister of Free St. Mark's, Glasgow, in 1854. He was very successful, especially among the intelligent artisans, and when he left there were about a thousand members on the church roll.

His removal to London was somewhat unexpected. He had come up to speak at the annual meeting of the National Temperance League in Exeter Hall—for he had taken up a strong position on the temperance question—when two deputations waited on some of the leading men connected with Belgrave Church, the pulpit of which was then vacant, and recommended Dr. Paterson. He was invited, and came. This was in 1872, and some eight years afterwards he became pastor of his present church at Notting Hill.

Always fond of physiology and scientific studies, he early in his career—as far back as 1849, in fact—advocated total abstinence on a physiological basis. "I think," said he, "the Bible leaves you free to abstain or use wine—within certain limits, of course—as you like. But I advocate abstinence from a scientific point of view. I believe that many godly people who care but little about these drinks as beverages yet take them because they believe they give strength." Dr. Paterson's point is that alcohol does not give strength, and that abstinence not only does not injure, but confers benefit; also that large accessions to the temperance cause are gained when that principle is explained.

It was in 1873 that Dr. Paterson first delivered his lecture, since published, on "Stimulants and Strength," maintaining with great force the doctrine that alcoholic beverages—stimulants—do not give strength, but only appear to do so at times by using up what force a person possesses more quickly. In this respect Dr. Paterson agrees fully with Dr. Richardson, and thus we have the medical minister and the man of science both enunciating the same doctrine on this question. Dr. Paterson has delivered several lectures and series of lectures on this and similar subjects. Particularly may we mention those at Aldersgate Street to the Young Men's Christian Association, on "Life," on "The Body and its Functions," and "Health Studies." The interest of such lectures will easily be seen, when delivered by a fully competent medical man who has the power of attractive public speech, and unites religious teaching with his physiological instruction.

In personal appearance, Dr. Paterson is of square and sturdy build, perhaps somewhat below the middle height, and his broad brow crowned with a plenitude of thick black hair. He wears the ministerial white tie, which is the only clerical looking thing about him, an ample frock-coat supplying the place of the clerically cut garment. His reading is wide and varied enough. Like other hard workers, he enjoys a good work of fiction, but it should be good, and give experience of life. When a boy he delighted in Lever and Marryat; Scott, Thackeray, and Dickens came later; now, as he neatly expressed it, there is considerable variety. Of William Black's writings he is very fond, and also of R. L. Stevenson's. "Of course," he said, with a hearty laugh, "like all of us, I have read 'She,' and 'King Solomon's Mines.' 'Captain Trafalgar' is also very good. I like books of adventure; you get knowledge at the same time that you are amused." But though he enjoys good fiction, yet he is particular that it should be as a recreation, and not indulged in during hours of work.

But his work with his books is a pleasure. "It is a burden to leave them," said he; and we fancy that sentence expresses his character in the main as tersely as it could be expressed. A hard-working student from his youth up, when a lad he purchased, as he could, the volumes of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," then appearing (probably the sixth edition, he tells us), and read with eagerness certain of the articles which interested him, or which, we may suppose, helped him in his studies. And now, while he is keeping abreast of the latest developments in science, and the newest phases of theology and Biblical criticism, and working out his series of expositions and lectures, and his editing and writing for his weekly paper, his care of his church goes on steadily from week to week, and he rarely preaches in any other pulpit than his own—except Mr. Spurgeon's once now and again.

Thus, a close student and a wide-read scholar, does

THE REV. H. SINCLAIR PATERSON, M.D.

Dr. Sinclair Paterson stand, we might say, four-square against all the winds of doctrine that might blow. Of evolution, he gives his Scotch verdict of "not proven," yet maintains that, if the doctrine were proved, it would not shake the verities of the Christian faith; and of Biblical criticism and the various theological theories and beliefs that seem so often to perturb the world, he is able to give a conscientious opinion; yet he keeps a firm grip on such pre-eminently practical and valuable subjects as scientific temperance, sound-minded religion, and health studies for young men. Such a minister, at once theologian, student, and medical man, occupies no doubt a somewhat unique position in this latter half of the nineteenth century, and Dr. Paterson strives to fill it worthily and well.

THE LEGEND OF SAINT SILVERUS.

THERE runs an old, old legend,
 A tale of Christmas time,
 Low breathed round the fireside
 In distant Northern clime ;
 It tells how once an angel
 Looked down in mercy sweet,
 And bade the people listen
 To hear the Master's Feet:
 " Behold, the Christ-child cometh,
 The King of love is near !
 Oh, bring your gifts of Noël
 Unto the Lord most dear."

With golden grain of plenty
 Fair shone each raptured home ;
 The corn crown'd every dwelling
 Whereto the Christ should come.
 And one, a blue-eyed stripling,
 In longing all unknown,
 With heart aflame had laboured
 For gift that God might own :
 " Behold, the Christ-child cometh !"
 Uprose the music blest,
 And Silverus stood waiting
 With sheaf the richest, best.

A tiny bird, nigh fainting,
 A little, trembling thing,
 Through chilling airs of Christmas
 Drew near on drooping wing ;
 The people raised a clamour,
 They chased it from the corn,

They drove it from the garlands
 That gleamed for Christmas morn :
 " Behold, the Christ-child cometh !"
 His praise they fain would win ;
 How could they bring to Jesus
 An offering marred and thin ?

On drooping, dying pinion
 That vainly sought relief,
 The shivering bird down-lighted
 Where shone the proudest sheaf ;
 And Silverus moved softly,
 Though dews all wistful stirred,
 Close, close within his bosom
 He fed the fainting bird:
 " Behold, the Christ-child neareth !"
 He spake in faltering tone,
 " The golden ears are broken,
 Yet broken for His own."

And while the sheaf of beauty
 Grew marred and spent and bare,
 The sweet bird flew to heaven ;
 The King of love stood there :
 " Oh, tender heart and Christlike,
 Whose yearnings soared on high,
 Yet could not see, uncaring,
 My weakest creature die !
 Lo, I am with thee always,
 My Christmas light is thine ;
 The dearest gift of Noël
 Is pity poured for Mine !"

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

"ASHAMED OF JESUS."

WE read these solemn words in one of the missionary letters—
 "There is one thing in which we might imitate the Hindus: they are never ashamed of their religion." And the writer describes how Moham-medan coachmen will kneel on the tops of their cabs at sundown to pray, and how shopkeepers and boatmen will stop their work to pray at the appointed times, as a matter of course of which they are not at all ashamed. And yet theirs is a religion without the comfort and mercy that is brought to us by our own. The poet tells of a beautiful and wondrous statue that had no arms; but the religion of Christ has arms of loving-kindness, and help, and salvation—arms that are stretched out to wipe away our every tear—and yet some of us are a little ashamed openly and decisively to "show our colours." We may well think with more honest shame of the poor Hindu, prepared and willing to avow his form of belief in the sight of all. We heard a minister relate an incident told him by a Christian officer, who was converted when a captain, and who privately longed to let his soldiers know his change of heart, but was afraid of their remarks. At last, one day, he made up his mind to confess his Lord, and he went into the infirmary, where some of the men were lying. Here he chatted with them for some time, but he felt he could not tell them he had enlisted under the banner of Christ. He left the place, hating himself for his cowardice, and he cast himself down before the mercy-seat—ah! that is the place for us all to find strength and courage—and besought the help of God. He went back to the infirmary, and told out the reason of his first visit, and what a coward he had been, and how God had enabled him now to declare the truth. Years after, a drummer met him, and said, "Sir, I listened to you then, and I shall never shake off the impression your confession of Christ made upon me."

"Ashamed of Jesus! That dear Friend
On Whom my hopes of heaven depend,—
No, when I blush, be this my shame,
That I no more revere His Name."

"THE DAUGHTERS OF THE KING."

Wandering along a quiet Surrey valley, musical with the songs of birds, and clothed at that time of the year with a wealth of foliage, we came across a little cottage, where was a window-box for flowers, and on the front of this box were carved the words, "God is love." There, through every season, amid the changeable scenes of the year, stand out these words in that remote, sequestered vale. Many a passing traveller, many a tired pedestrian or gay pleasure-seeker, has doubtless been comforted and moved by the message of love standing out among the flowers. Is not this the text that should be inscribed upon our every-day lives, so clearly that it can be seen and read of all men, teaching them that our Master's name is one of infinite mercy, pity, and helpfulness? If across our individual careers there runs such a script as looked forth to the everlasting hills around that valley, if those around are learning from us daily more of the love of God, our outward circumstances are of little moment. Whatever our position, if we be near to God ourselves, we can represent some atom of his love to a fellow-creature. In America the band of "Daughters of the King" exists to take up various branches of loving ministrations, some of them quiet and humble, yet all fruitful for blessing. All glorious must be the outcome of these efforts of the "King's Daughters." Little bands are formed, some of which visit the sick, befriend the poor, cheer the lonely, attend to little children, and in many other ways that suggest themselves to "a heart at leisure from itself," these ladies go about doing good, or in their own homes carry on Divine work. "Daughters of the King" is also the title given by a missionary of the Church of England Zenana Society to a volume containing an account of the labours of Christian women in India. Here we read of a devoted band coming to the help of the Lord against the mighty, toiling on in self-sacrificing zeal to loose the fettered minds of the Zenana, to heal the sick, and to lead our Eastern sisters to the Redeemer. The question of woman's sphere has sometimes caused heart-burning at home and abroad. Is not woman at her highest—at the starting-point of life's best possibilities—when, like these devoted ones, she lifts the heavenward cry, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?"

BLIND AND HELP-LESS.

Blindness is in itself a great calamity, but what shall we say when to this is added a growing affection of the spine, which is slowly but surely depriving the afflicted one of the power to earn a living? And yet this is the sad case of an organist and teacher of music in a London suburb, who in the prime of life finds himself unable to provide for his young family with his ever-decreasing earnings. This heartrending case is well known to, and specially recommended by, the Editor of this magazine, who will be glad to receive any assistance towards the purchase of a small annuity, or for immediate relief. This is preeminently a case for the benevolent who like to be sure that their help is not unworthily bestowed. We may add that our poor blind friend, who is in the greatest straits, is not in any way a party to this appeal. He belongs to the order of respectable poverty, which considers starvation preferable to begging.

A GOOD MAN AND TRUE.

That the biographer of the Seventh Earl of Shaftesbury should also tell the life-story of his great contemporary and brother-worker in good causes, Mr. Samuel Morley, is in every way fitting. The materials at Mr. Hodder's command were not so extensive as when he undertook to write the life of "the Good Earl," but the handsome volume now before us is in every way creditable to its author and publishers

"Some visit the sick."

(Hodder and Stoughton). The first point that strikes one in this volume is the enormous amount of time—to say nothing, now, of money and strength—which Mr. Morley gave to others. Amid so many engagements on committees, boards, and deputations, in Parliament and on the platform, a less business-like man would have probably broken down very early in the race. But as we read the narrative we see him rise superior to circumstances again and again. And the delicate, kindly tact that he displayed in his philanthropy won a warm place for him in many a heart. Mr. Hodder tells one story that we cannot refrain from quoting. "A young man in a manufacturing town started in business, and was on the high road to success when, from no fault of his own, his trade was swept away from him. He had to compound with his creditors, among the largest being Mr. Morley's firm. He came up to London with his cheque. Mr. Morley saw him, and had compassion on him—found out that he was a man of considerable ability, and, moreover, that he was a member of a church under the care of a minister he greatly respected. Inquiries were instituted, and on all hands the reports as to the character and conduct of the man were most satisfactory. Immediately, therefore, Mr. Morley not only returned to him the value of his cheque, but assisted to place him in the way to pay his creditors in full, and attain even a higher position than he had occupied before." This is only one instance, among many equally characteristic of Mr. Morley. Would that we had many such men ready to carry on the standard he has laid down!

MUSIC FROM STONES.

Some of our readers may have heard sweet sounds evoked from stones brought from Skiddaw. At a ordinary bowls and basins; and even household pots and jars proved responsive to the musician's skill. Entertaining as was the experiment, it reminded us of deeper and more valuable thoughts. In how many a heart—outwardly hard, unsightly, and unpromising as stone—there is hidden music which responds at last most wondrously to the touch of Christian sympathy. "There is an angel in the stone," said the sculptor, seeing through the shapeless mass the beauty he knew to be possible; yes, and there are angels and angelic music beyond our comprehension in natures that seem dull and almost hopeless, but which will respond at last to loving and prayerful efforts. And the household jars and bowls seemed to us to represent the common, everyday things of life: have they no side of loveliness? can we draw no music thence? Verily the pursuits we call the meanest, even the drudgery we call menial, may seem to yield around us an anthem of glory, a "grand, sweet song," if we are just remembering what the Apostle taught—"Whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus."

"OUR HAVEN ALWAYS NIGH."

Glasgow is a place where many seem coming and going, and where there is a continual tide of seafaring men of various nationalities. The Glasgow Seamen's Friend Society (27, Jamaica Street) has been earnestly at work on behalf of these drifting visitors, and there are now two "Bethels," with reading and recreation-rooms, coffee-room, etc., as well as the portion devoted to Divine service. A prayer-meeting has been held daily, and special services have been arranged for Scandinavians, Germans, Spaniards, Italians, Chinese, and others. We hear of a well-educated young man who had run away from home, and public performance this excited interest and delight, the tones produced being most beautiful and harmonious. We ourselves have heard music—pathetic enough to touch the fount of tears—evoked from sunk to great destitution, but was here lodged, fed and clothed, and treated with Christian kindness. The love of the Saviour reached his heart, and he afterwards wrote from Sebastopol:—"I feel so thankful to God for His goodness; may He give me wisdom, and keep me close in the narrow way! I have had many a happy time, singing sweet hymns in the night-watch. I am hungering and thirsting after a closer walk with God. At Constantinople Rest prayer meeting I testified for Jesus." Only a few days after this letter was written, the ship went down in a gale, and all hands perished. A widowed mother had been mourning over the waywardness of her lost son; but, even in her grief at the tidings of his death, there was comfort untold in the knowledge of his change of heart. Our Scotch friends can well employ any help sent towards their benevolent operations. "So many sailors are annually lost at sea," they say, "ought we not to do all we can to bring them under the influence of the Gospel?" And, on the other hand, there are so many wandering hither and thither over the trackless deep, that we may well strive earnestly to enlist our blue-jackets as witnesses and missionaries for Christ, Who will be to them a "Haven ever nigh"—on the homeless seas, a Home.

STORIES OF THE OLDEN TIME.

The Catacombs of Rome have often been drawn upon for the stores of information that they treasure of the life and worship of the early Christians. Much that has been written on this subject has, however, been inaccessible or unintelligible to the ordinary reader. We have now before us a work entitled "The Catacombs of Rome," by the Rev. W. H. Withrow, recently issued by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, which gathers up in popular form many of the most interesting and valuable gems from this rich mine. Some of the inscriptions that Mr. Withrow has copied are singularly pathetic, and as we read we feel the truth of the author's words:—"These rude inscriptions speak to our hearts with a power and pathos all their own. Their mute eloquence sweeps down the centuries, and touches chords in every soul that thrill with keenest sympathy." There is a lesson, for him who will but learn it, in every page of this most interesting book. Another work that tells of God's dealings with His people of old is "Three Friends of God" (Nisbet), in which Mrs. Bevan tells a few incidents in the lives of John Tauler, Nicholas of Basle, and Henry Suso. This book would be most useful to teachers. In "Brian Fitz-Count" (Rivingtons) we have a powerful story of the days of Stephen and Matilda, by the Rev. A. D. Crane, who does not fail to point out the mistakes and follies of those who then ruled the Church of Christ in our land. The scene of the story is laid principally at Wallingford Castle, and the horrors of the Civil War are most clearly painted.

"THE QUIVER" LIFEBOATS.

The prudent advice has been given ere now, "Praise the sea, but keep on land;" some of us have experienced what it is to look upon the waves when they smile not beneath the summer sunlight, but are seething and frothing, heaving coldly around the bark, and moaning restlessly beneath a darkening sky. The poet asks why the sea is moaning ever, and another sweet singer pictures the wild billows as hungering for the calm they know not yet. We, who have known the meaning of storm, are thankful that our life-work does not lie amid the voices of the giant element; but there are hundreds who cannot keep on land, and who must watch and work upon old Ocean, whatever the season or the state of the atmosphere may be. Speaking of the Yorkshire fishermen lately, a pastor in our hearing described one such as "a splendid fellow, with a chest like a house-wall!" Certainly the battling with the billows results in many a noble form and aspect, and not in these alone, but in heroic hearts and energies that are ready in the wildest night to respond to far-off signals of distress, and to speed the lifeboat on its way. Is there any cause nobler than lifeboat work? Let us remember it in our sympathies and our prayers, now that the wintry winds are here, and many a bark will be needing brotherly aid. We heard of a gentleman who, passing through London, saw an old friend, once the owner of horses and carriages, selling pies in the street. "I am sorry for this trouble," he said: "you have my sincerest sympathy."—"Never mind your sympathy," was the answer; "buy a pie." And, believing that sympathy can be expressed by £. s. d. as well as by kindly and compassionate words, we support our own QUIVER lifeboats by a fund of which in this new year we again remind our readers. The boat stationed at Queenstown has already done noble work in time of peril. May it yet, again and again, go out to the succour of human lives that in the tempest "real to and fro, and are at their wits' end!" Since the foregoing lines were written, the Editor has received from "A Friend of Sailors" a donation of £6 10s. for THE QUIVER boat, which has been handed to the National Lifeboat Institution.

OUR LITTLE WAIFS.

We felt sure of the sympathy of our readers as concerns "THE QUIVER Waifs," whose life-story we gave in our November number; many will be interested to hear of the "In Memoriam" gift of one of our correspondents, a widow, whose only child has died in early girlhood. "When I read of the Waifs," she says, "I felt a strong wish to share the privilege of helping in such a good work; before I finished the article, I determined what I would do." Our correspondent, who earns her living by working for a house of business, goes on to tell us that it was once her delight to give nice birthday and Christmas presents to the child who was the comfort and happiness of her life, but whom God has taken to Himself; she asks us if we will receive these presents now, and dispose of them, if we can, for the orphans' sake, as her first contribution to the work; for which, henceforth, she proposes to lay away a fixed weekly sum. We have gladly agreed to take these offered memorials of a mother's love, and to use the proceeds for the children of our care: it was a sweet and sacred thought thus to bring to the Master, in the person of His little ones, the fair things needed no longer by the life He has sheltered evermore. "Not being able to send money," says this lady, "I thought I would do what I could another way:" and we think of One who sits against the treasury, and we remember her who won His blessing and His praise—

"Cast in your coins, for God delights
When from wide hands they fall;
But there was one who brought two mites,
And yet gave more than all."

ON THE BORDERS OF THE FOREST.

Close to Epping Forest there is a Home provided by Christian sympathy for the young workwomen who toil in the great city. It is only a little cottage; but in five years it has helped six hundred inmates to rest and change. "Clark's Cottage, Tuttlebee Lane, Buckhurst Hill," is kept open all the year round, and no charge whatever is made to the young women, the work depending on the offerings of those who would fain benefit in soul and body some of the 20,000 girls employed in City workrooms. "It would be little rest of mind," say the managers, "if girls earning from six to ten shillings a week had to pay for their holiday, besides keeping on their London lodging while they are resting, and no money is coming in." Last summer as many applications have been received at this little Home as would have filled the beds three times over. Miss Helen Reynolds, Epping New Road, Buckhurst Hill, undertakes the correspondence connected with this practical effort of Christian charity; and we may add that an old wicker Bath chair would be a gift much valued at the Cottage, some girls being able to walk but little. Among those who have been benefited at this Home we may mention a young tailoress, white-faced and weary-looking, almost the sole support of her parents. When she could get work she had to keep at it from five in the morning till eleven or twelve at night, to pay up arrears of rent. She stayed two weeks at the Cottage, and left, with fresh strength and hope, to take her part in the battle of life. Another girl, a boot-finisher, had lost her voice for months through weakness, for which many things had been tried. The fresh country air and nourishing food were the remedies that restored her voice; and she now writes thankfully, from a new and happy home in service, of her five or six weeks' visit to this woodland retreat.

CLARK'S COTTAGE.

"THE SALT OF THE COUNTRY."

"Think how long they have been at work, and how small are the results," say some, openly or covertly, of Christian missionaries; and others talk as though the redemption of benighted races by missionary agencies were a hopeless impossibility. We forget that the harvest is great, and vast, and wide; we forget how much has already been won for Christ, and that with God there is nothing impossible. Here is the witness of a Lieutenant-Governor in Bengal as to Christian missionaries:—"In my judgment, they have done more real and lasting good to India than all other agencies combined; by their pure, unselfish lives, by fearless exposure of wrong, by living with and for the people, they have exercised a power, and produced results that words cannot tell. They have been the salt of the country, the true saviours of the Empire." Grand words these from Sir Rivers Thompson! None will deny there is an immense work yet to be accomplished, but if only every Christian will help, mountains of difficulty will assuredly be removed. Experience has shown us how much easier it is to criticise than to help. If only those who stand afar off with doubting looks will put a hand to some Christian mission, how the work will go forward! "I cannot go abroad, nor have I much money to spare," some may say, forgetting that the Lord's will is that we are to give just as we are able; but the very poorest among us can help to roll away the stone that sometimes seems so heavy, as we think of all the hindrances and obstacles to mission work. One of the greatest preachers in our midst was to address a vast gathering, and was being shown to the committee-room, to meet several of the nobility. "Can you find me a quiet little place where I can be all alone?" he asked his conductor. So he was led instead to a little nook, where he took the rod of prayer and used it mightily in the presence of the Lord of Hosts, and then he came forth to thrill that vast assembly with God-given power. If every child of God would only feel it laid upon him to intercede with the Master on behalf of this missionary work, ordained by Christ Himself, he would realise how much the prayers of a righteous man avail, and how much the arm of the Lord can do.

A TWICE-HEARD SERMON.

We recently heard of a case which shows what energy and activity can do, when, by God's mercy, they are directed into the best channel of all. "Those who are felt most now will be felt by-and-by," Christian friends have said, patiently enduring the excess of spirits of some restless juvenile, and trusting for the time when all the activity will be laid upon the Master's altar. We heard of a man who, years ago, was remarkable as a clever, convivial spirit, and popular with all; he had plenty of brain-power, and willingly went to hear any good preacher, but he never applied the truths personally, and lived a worldly life. One Sunday he was present at an earnest sermon which, as usual, made no impression on his heart; during that week, in another place, the same sermon was preached in his hearing by the same preacher, and this time he could not shake off the hold it laid upon him. He endeavoured to do so, knowing the ridicule and opposition he must face if he "turned religious," but he could not escape from the serious thoughts now stirring in his soul. Days passed by, and he took his usual place as chairman of a convivial society, but told them he occupied it for the last time. He was met with a storm of "No, no!" but when he quietly explained that his future belonged to God, they understood that the former places where he had been prime favourite would know him no more. It needed some courage to show his colours before that throng of old companions; it needed more to meet them constantly, hear joking remarks, and yet hold manfully on his way; but the Master strengthened him, and he plunged actively into Christian work, starting at last a service in a room in an utterly neglected and needy neighbourhood, till that room expanded into busy religious efforts, and a church and a chapel followed in his track.

TO TEACHERS, OLD AND YOUNG.

Our readers will doubtless remember the reports which have from time to time appeared in our pages of the work of the Mission to Deep-Sea Fishermen. Recently the Mission has achieved a great triumph in the successful termination of the struggles for the suppression of the hateful coopers. All this is told, together with the story of the Mission from its foundation, in Mr. E. J. Mather's "Nor'ard of the Dogger" (Nisbet), which those who take an interest in our fishermen—and who does not!—should certainly procure. The same publishers send us a volume of sermons by Dr. Marvin Vincent, on the "Covenant of Peace," containing some very suggestive passages. "Lotta's Life Mistake," and "How the Home was Won Back," are two stories, also issued by Messrs. Nisbet, to which we can only briefly refer, and commend to the attention of teachers and librarians. The latter is by Mrs. G. S. Reaney. A series of lectures to young men, delivered in Edinburgh and Glasgow, has been sent us by Messrs. Macniven and Wallace. Among the lecturers were Dr. A. K. H. Boyd and Dr. Matheson, and the tone of the lectures is exceptionally high. "Noonday Musings" is the title of a miniature textbook published by Messrs. Bagster and Sons. The pages of this little volume are bordered by pretty fern designs, and the work can readily be carried in the waistcoat pocket.

A LABOUR OF LOVE.

There is, or should be, some touch of peace and beauty everywhere on this earth created by the Lord of love. We heard a gentleman who had been visiting a prison tell how his heart was stirred once, in the corridor between the women's cells, by seeing two little innocents run out from the cells, meet in the passage, and throw their arms around each other for the kiss of joyous love. The criminal mothers had been allowed to bring in these little creatures with them, and in that spot of misery, the baby-faces and tender ways were like lovely witnesses that God is a God of goodness and of infinite compassion. Now, we would remind our readers—and especially those who have leisure and artistic gifts—of the beauty they might create on the walls of hospitals and workhouses by offerings of some bright creation of their brush, especially illuminated texts, where the words of faith and comfort will stand out clearly, influencing the mind at a time when earthly attractions seem to fade, and the heart is open to holy impressions. In Tennyson's poem of "The Children's Hospital," a little patient is described as comforting another by advising her to ask Jesus to help her—

"Offering some bright creation of their brush."

"It's all in the print over there—'Little children should come to Me.'"

Day by day, gazing at the text of love, little Annie had received the words into her heart, and thus passed them on to another. It is not always visiting-day at our public institutions, and longing eyes cannot always see a relation's face, but the words of the Lord bear with them eternal cheer and comfort, and the task will be Divinely blessed if some of those who excel in decoration and in beautifying will place such words where walls look blank and bare, as silent messages of human sympathy and heavenly remembrance.

"LOVE YE, THEREFORE, THE STRANGER."

Centuries ago these words were spoken, exhorting the people of God to hospitality not only of the hand, but of the heart; we shall do well in these latter days to bear them in mind, for some in their congregations seem too much inclined to act on "the little garden walled around" system, and the intrusive stranger by no means realises that in this portion of the Father's House he can find a home. We are rejoiced to believe that "stand-offishness" among Christians is swiftly on the decrease, but some of us are so constituted that we nervously shrink from making any step towards cordiality or personal conversation, even while we are wishing someone would take notice of so-and-so. Any effort that we make for our Master's sake will assuredly be owned and blessed by Him; for His sake, let us put shyness aside, and hold out the hand of greeting to the stranger worshipping in our midst. A striking incident brought to our knowledge has deepened our sense of the importance of such notice: a young man came up to London from a Christian home, and, fulfilling his promise to his mother, he went regularly to a place of worship, despite the ridicule and opposition of his Sabbath-breaking companions. Gradually, however, their influence began to tell upon him; he felt so lonely among the congregation, and nobody noticed him. There was one old gentleman, however, who had his eye upon him, only he took charge of the juveniles during service, so was always detained at the close. He had the young countryman so strongly on his mind, that one Sunday, being unable to leave his post, he sent a boy after him, and asked him to wait; the result was a sympathetic and friendly conversation, and the youth was gathered in among the soldiers of the Cross. Strange to say, it was just at this point his courage was ebbing; he seemed to be yielding to his companions' persuasions, and he had almost promised to excursionise with them next Sunday. "Let me go once more," he said, "to worship; if nobody notices me this time, I'll come with you next Sunday." He had held out manfully—his strength was giving way—far be it from us to say he was justified in laying down conditions for his fidelity; but the All-Merciful, knowing the temptation, graciously moved one Christian heart to make room for the stranger, and to gird on his armour anew.

DIANA OR CHRIST?

"How shall I lose self?" asked one, zealous in good works, who yet had felt no change of heart or inward comfort. "Can I lose self by study, or prayer, or good works?"—"I think, was the reply of the clergyman thus addressed, "you will lose self when you find your Saviour." The poet tells us that when love takes up the harp of life, the chord of self passes "in music out of sight." Those who have found Christ, who love Him as the chief among ten thousand, count Him nearer and dearer than self-interest, or gain, or outward prosperity. We lately heard a very impressive sermon from one who had been much struck by the picture, "Diana or Christ?" in the recent exhibition at Manchester. Herein a beautiful maiden is represented as standing on her trial; will she purchase life by offering incense to Diana, or will she be true to the Christ in Whom, amid heathen surroundings, she has learnt to believe? Diana or Christ—the false or the true? it is a choice which young and old have to make, which Christians are called upon to make, and on which eternal issues hang. How many believers are brought face to face with some crucial test from which they shrink bewildered, but to which, at last, in the strength of God, they go forward, nobler and stronger souls for this temptation that they have conquered for Christ's sake.

OUR SUNDAY-SCHOOL LIBRARIES.

Charles Lamb used to say that friends borrowed his money to use it, but books often without any intention of use. Sometimes we wonder with what intentions the juveniles in the Sunday-school carry home their books—we cannot ascertain they have "finished" with them, and all kinds of persuasive strategy have to precede a return. The librarian's is an onerous and most important office, and every teacher should render all possible help, urging the scholars to join, assisting in selection of books, counselling care and cleanliness, and regularity in return. Some good friends are not quite clear as to the desirability of fiction, but the children clamour for story-books, and good stories will develop a growing taste for reading somewhat deeper. It is not our opinion that high-class fiction enervates the intellect as concerns deeper literature; we know children who dearly love a "story," yet who are quite capable of enjoying reading that demands more study and reflection. Our Lord assisted the dawning comprehension of His listeners by parables, and these writers are doing a noble work who produce wholesome, helpful narratives for the little ones, such as they can take home and enjoy sometimes in the midst of an entranced domestic circle. Of course we shall never get the children to join the library that offers to them only the lives of worthies of bygone centuries, or the death-bed scenes of little Mary, Jane, etc., which make them almost feel they are guilty in surviving and feeling so full of spirits. Some friends may feel they would gladly get in a stock of bright, cheery books, but they cannot afford many, and very soon all these would have been read. Some schools have a very good plan of providing library-boxes, by means of which an interesting stock passes on from school to school, so that there is no further cause for the complaint that so often puzzles librarians, "Please, sir, I've had that before."

"LIGHTS ALONG THE SHORE."

IN THE QUIVER for August, 1886, an article appeared concerning the efforts put forth on behalf of the mariner; and therein we referred to the Seamen's Christian Friend Society, 255, Burdett Road, E. The year 1887 witnessed still further development of the Society's work, for we hear of a new Bethel built in the Isle of Man, the gift of a steam-launch for use on the Cornish coast, and of a contemplated Sailors' Institute for the Albert Quay, Fowey. More than a thousand boats, with about five thousand fishermen, are engaged off the coast of Cornwall all the year round; and the new steam-launch that will visit such will assuredly prove a gift of untold blessing, though of course involving about £60 a year increased expense for insurance, fuel, and labour. The work of this Society among those who come and go must be one of faith rather than of sight; nevertheless, there are instances enough of spiritual life and growth to more than repay all that has been done for the sailors' welfare. "I want this sort of thing oftener," said a mate, to whom kind words of encouragement had been spoken; "it serves me as ballast, keeps me on 'even keel,' and makes me think in spite of myself." One, who when in port constantly attends the Seamen's Chapel, was wrecked, and all the crew understood the ship must be lost. Strong men turned pale, but this man was peaceful, feeling the presence of Christ, and those who had persecuted him now asked his pardon, which he willingly gave, and spoke to them in that hour of peril of Him who once stretched forth His saving hand to the life sinking helplessly amid the waves. And a sailor writes thus from New Zealand: "Ever since I left London the Lord has guided and blessed me; some of my shipmates laugh at me for being a Christian, but I tell them that even if threatened with death, I would die rather than deny the Lord Jesus, who has washed away my sins."

"YOUNG MEN AND MAIDENS."

A mother told us once that on concluding a moral rhyme in which the hero, playing with matches, came to an untimely end, she found her little daughter in floods of tears. "Oh, why, why, why," sobbed the thoughtful child, "did his mother go out and leave the matches there?" The little mind had flown at once to the carelessness that was partly responsible for the calamity described by the poem. And it was little use scolding and punishing juvenile vice, and the wildness and frivolity of young men and maidens, when nothing was done to counteract evil influences—when the claims of young lives were treated with carelessness and neglect, save by a few. None can say nowadays that our young men and maidens are forgotten and overlooked. The Y.M.C.A. reports 3,659 societies, and looks after the young men physically as well as spiritually and intellectually. From the Exeter Hall Gymnasium teachers now go forth who instruct more than a thousand children weekly in musical drill, etc., thus strengthening the bodies and brightening the lives of the little ones. The Y.W.C.A., besides its accustomed and tireless arrangements for classes, singing, reading, conversation, etc., sends out a visitor into Hyde Park for rescue and preventive work. This Park visitor is Miss Norris, 16A, Old Cavendish Street, W. She tells of coming across two young girls who had run away from home, and were wet and tired out; both were sheltered—one sent back to her own home, and the other well cared for. A sad-looking girl, sitting alone, proved to be a servant out of place who had spent her last penny, and had been turned out of her lodgings; her friends were in Norfolk, and she was utterly homeless. Fortunately, Christian care sought her out at this hour of extremity, and she is now doing well in a situation. These efforts are a splendid outcome of the Y.W.C.A. "At present," says the Park visitor, "we have not more than two or three subscribers in London, and funds are very low."

"ALL THY WORKS SHALL PRAISE THEE."

In every path and by-bath of science there are lessons to be read by the student of God's workings in the world—lessons at once telling and simple, or perhaps telling from their very simplicity. The book of nature is ever lying open before us, and one and all may read the old lesson, "If He so clothe the grass of the field;" but its pages are only too often unturned. An American naturalist, the Rev. Henry C. McCook, D.D., has lately come before the English public with two valuable works in which parallels are cleverly drawn from natural phenomena. To the first of these books, "Tenants of an Old Farm," Sir John Lubbock contributes an introduction, and the second is prefaced by the President of the Linnæan Society. Either of these works would be an admirable help to a preacher or teacher. Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton are the publishers of Dr. McCook's works, and also of a biography of the Prince Consort, by Mr. G. H. Pike, which gives a bright and interesting résumé of this busy life.

THE GATE OF LIFE.

A FRAGMENT.

BY THE HON. KATHERINE SCOTT, AUTHOR OF "MISS BROWNE'S DISTRICT," ETC.

"Yes, my child, it feels true to me."—p. 324.

T was the time of roses—June roses, blowing and lovely in June sunshine; and the roses that grew in the Major's garden were more fragrant, more luxuriant, more healthy than in all the grandest gardens in the county. Some writer says that to be a successful cultivator of roses one must have a loving heart, and perhaps that was why these particular roses under the Major's special care were different from any others.

The garden was laid out on a sunny bank, at the foot of which a clear stream rippled and laughed over a stony bed. There was a seat half hidden by

Banksia roses at the top of the garden, and a sweet-briar hedge which was tended as carefully as the roses. Then the Major's field, with his cow, and in one corner his little house. The house was remarkable only for its innumerable bookshelves, stuck here, there, and everywhere, and all groaning beneath their weight of books. There was no real library, and the books were like the roses, of every sort and kind. The Major lived alone, and had not even a spare room, but all the same he entertained largely in the rose garden, where tea-parties and strawberry feasts were held, and in the sunny drawing-room which ran the whole length of the little house. When I say entertained, I think it was more that every soul connected with the Major found in him a compendium of knowledge, a reservoir of good common sense, and a friend from whom they were always sure of a welcome.

On the other side of the rippling stream lived his widowed sister, Lady Esther Leigh, who had a household of boys and girls now growing up, and cousins, aunts, uncles, college friends, friends of all sorts coming and going.

The Major never stayed there. "What was the use of filling up a room," he said, "when his own was so near?" but he was always ready to fill up a vacant place at dinner, or to entertain a dull man; and cultivated and pleasant as he was, he was often in demand. Nellie Leigh was the eldest of the nieces, and had been Uncle John's special friend and favourite till two years before, when she had been sent abroad to learn languages, and only this June had returned.

She was leaning against the open window of the Major's room now, in a white gown, and her big straw hat in her hand. Her long, curling eyelashes were resting on soft, rosy cheeks, and there were dimpling smiles playing about her mouth. Uncle John was sitting by his writing-table, and Lady Esther, fanning herself with the newspaper, reclined in the large arm-chair.

"Well, John, we think we might have a real festivity for Nellie's eighteenth birthday on the 20th. A picnic we thought of; and then the week after we must think of London. Don't you think I ought to present Nellie, and let her see a little of the world this year?"

"Yes—I think you are right," replied Uncle John slowly; "but evidently Nellie does not think so."

"Oh! Uncle John, I did so hope you would say just the opposite." And Nellie turned her blue eyes rather reproachfully on the Major.

"But, at any rate," she continued, "let us settle to have the picnic and as much fun for the little ones and everybody as we can. There is Johnnie, and Mr. Vernon," as the brother and his friend appeared, and seating themselves on the window began to discuss the arrangements. Uncle John was looking critically at Nellie; she more than came up to his expectations externally, and there was a bewitching merriment about the face, where too, every now and then, a serious expression came. Mr. Vernon was watching too, and he looked "caught" when the Major's keen eyes met his.

"Uncle John, you'll come, won't you?" said Nellie, when the picnic and all the etceteras had been settled.

"Come! of course I will! Your birthday was always a festivity, and you can count on me."

They all rattled on for a while in the sweet June idleness till Lady Esther rose, and the young men and Nellie started homewards.

"I am anxious to take Nellie up to London, for fear she loses her heart to young Vernon; not that I've any objection to him—for he's a nice fellow and well off—but she ought to see someone else and know her own mind."

"Yes, yes; to be sure," replied the Major; "though I don't know that one could find a better fellow than young Vernon. I know him, and he has the making of a good man; but he's young, and she is only a child.

She's very pretty, Esther; she reminds me of—" the Major broke off as Lady Esther put up her parasol and walked out at the window much occupied with her own concerns.

Uncle John was leaning back in his chair looking at an illuminated sort of scroll over a little book-case in one corner of his room, "Mors Janna Vitæ" (Death the Gate of Life), when he was roused by a soft hand touching his shoulder, and looking round found Nellie's rosy face bending over him.

"You monkey! You must have given a regular monkey's jump from the grass on to my chair, or why did I not hear you?"

"You were in a brown study, Uncle John! No, you weren't," and the grave look came into the long-lashed, laughing eyes. "You were looking at that," and she pointed to the scroll. "Uncle John, you've always had that as long as I can remember. Do you think it is true? I mean, does it feel true to you?"

The Major rose quickly, and Nellie thought there was almost a flush on his clear, rather thin face, as he took her hand in his and said quietly, "Yes, my child; it feels true to me. It seems odd, perhaps, to have it there, but it has been a comfort to me for years and years."

Nellie lifted her face for a kiss, as she had done when she was a little girl. "Uncle John, I came back to ask you if—if you go to your roses early in the morning now—as you used to do—and if I might come to-morrow? I want to come before my birthday; and after to-morrow we shall have a lot of people."

Nellie's face was a little troubled and confused as she spoke, and the Major bent from his tall height and gave her one kiss on her forehead. "Yes, Nellie; you'll find me there from seven to eight; and, my dear, I shall be pleased to have you all to myself once again."

Nellie's only reply was a shy "Thank you, Uncle John," and she was gone. There was a little long-ago secret between her and the Major about the rose garden. She had been devoted to books all her life, and before she went abroad Uncle John had directed her reading, and long talks with him over the different books he lent her had been her great delight. When she was about fourteen she had inquired what was Uncle John's morning study in the rose-garden, and there was the secret! for the rose-garden was the Major's sanctuary, and his Bible his companion there. Nellie was shy of this, but finding that Uncle John did not probe into anybody's heart with hard fingers and harder questions, and that his reading of the Bible opened up history, poetry, beauty of all kinds, and the whole purpose of a noble life, she grew interested, and came daily. At last she suddenly refused to join him at this time any more; and as she was sent abroad soon after, Uncle John heard no more of his special "child." His last words had been, "You will sometimes think of me in the rose-garden, Nellie!" Nellie knew that meant that a daily intercession for her would rise from it.

Truth to tell, the Major felt a little anxious next morning, as he walked slowly amongst his roses, as to whether Nellie would keep her appointment; but as he looked at his watch at half-past seven, and turned to go to the seat, quick footsteps came up the path from the river, and Nellie, fresh as the roses, appeared. With a happy, shy face she followed the Major to the seat where lay the well-worn Bible. After the reading and explanation, which was like no one else's "expounding," came—

"O Almighty God, whom truly to know is everlasting life, grant us perfectly to know Thy Son Jesus

'The King of Love thy Shepherd is.' It is the knowledge at the bottom of our hearts that we have done wrong—the best of us—that our purity is blackness beside His—that makes the fear. But tell Him the fear, tell Him all, Nellie, and take from His hand 'the forgiveness of all your sins.' Trust Him altogether—wholly—and you will find the fear go, and the love grow." They walked up and down in the morning stillness till Nellie found courage to say—

"Another thing, Uncle John, I want to ask you.

"Like no one else's."

Christ to be the Way, the Truth, and the Life. Amen;" and then one grave kiss, after which they wandered amongst the roses, and while Uncle John clipped and gathered, Nellie found courage to say: "Do you remember, when I left off coming to the rose-garden long ago, telling me not to be discouraged because I did not care as you did, but to go on reading my Bible and praying, and that He would show me more about Himself? I wanted—I wanted to tell you that I do not care now, only sometimes I feel a little afraid—afraid of Him, and I would like not to be." Uncle John was quietly picking off the dead roses, and did not look at Nellie, but she had said all she dared.

"Yes, my child, I understand; but don't stop there.

I don't know what has put it into my head, but I've wondered several times lately about dying—dying when one is young. You said you felt 'Mors Janna Vita' was quite true. Do you think one should wish or want to die?"

Uncle John put all his bunch of red, pink, creamy, and white roses into one of Nellie's little hands, and drew the other on to his arm.

"No, my child, I do not think we should wish or want to die; it is not natural. it is not generally the wish of a healthy mind. The one happy purpose for a man or a woman's life here is to do His will and to know Him, and then whether the life is lived here or in heaven, it is all one! But it is true that death itself is an evil, and it is not God's will that it should exist; but yet the King of Love and Life at the beginning kept the Tree of Life from being an immortality of evil to those who would have touched it, and by His own death He has unlocked the gate of heaven for us. If we are doing His will here, Nellie, this life becomes beautiful and happy, and there it must be an infinitely more beautiful, more happy life, because He gives us then the perfection of what we only have in part here. Long ago, Nellie, the 'desire of my eyes' was taken from me 'with a stroke,' and it seemed to me then that, but for 'Mors Janua Vitæ,' I must have gone mad."

Uncle John's quiet face was strangely moved, and Nellie only ventured to press her hand tenderly on his arm, and said nothing till he went on—

"God is love, Nellie, and He took the one I loved most to teach me this: she said it would, and it did. So, Nellie, you see why I keep my scroll." Uncle John was smiling now, and Nellie ventured one tender kiss and fled, thinking now at last she knew the secret of Uncle John's life over which she had often pondered.

* * * * *

The birthday came, and was brighter than any birthday Nellie had ever had. It was all sunshine inside and out; so thought Mr. Vernon, so thought the boys—"the jolliest birthday for years;" so thought the little ones and the neighbours, and even Lady Esther, who remarked to the Major that Nellie made "the whole house different."

Then came the break-up of the party for the London season, and Uncle John only heard once from Nellie, but the little P.S.: "I am remembering the purpose of life," made him happy. She enjoyed everything—and, when the house re-filled in the autumn, was more than ever the light of the place to mother, brothers, sisters, and poor people, and very specially to Uncle John. About Christmas-time he was called from home on business abroad, and when he returned late in the spring Nellie was ill.

"As frost comes down and blights all the flowers in the fall,
A sudden ailment fell on her;
Almost she hearkened the Angels' call."

She was bright and full of fun still, but the doctors looked grave, and very soon it was plain that Nellie was going from them.

She herself spoke to Uncle John first, as the one who would understand best.

She had asked to be carried to the rose-garden, where the roses were now again in their June beauty. When she got there she put her hand into Uncle John's: "'Mors Janua Vitæ,' Uncle John; it's quite true! I know I am going; but all I want is to make my going easy for mamma and the boys and the little ones, and, and—Mr. Vernon—and you. You won't mind, will you, Uncle John? for you have made it all real to me."

"Thank God!" was all Uncle John said.

"It is all so beautiful here, and there is so much to do and to learn; but it will be all the same there—only far, far better! 'The King of Love'—the King of Love: the roses and the river and the birds all seem to sing it." And Nellie lay back, smiling.

"Mother! I want you and Uncle John to promise you won't be very sorry when I go; for of course I know there is no sorrow there; but it would almost—almost make me want to come back if you wanted me very much, and I shouldn't like to think I made anybody sad!"

"I know I shall not forget you there, and you won't forget me. And you'll be sure to let the little ones have fun on my birthday each year; and, mother, you won't let the rose time make you sad because I came with them and went with them, will you?"

That was Nellie's last visit to the rose-garden, and when her birthday came she was with the King of Love!

It is five years now since the Gate of Life was opened for sunny, bright, smiling Nellie; but no one forgets her.

In her short life she sowed seeds of brightness and goodness which are growing and spreading now.

What life does not leave brightness behind it that has taken the King of Love for its Guide? For here, and there—

"We nothing lack if we are His,
And He is ours for ever."

"SO TIRED!"

"LIFT UP YOUR HEARTS"; OR, WORDS OF GOOD CHEER.—II.

BY THE REV. W. MANN STATHAM.

WE are all the subjects of daily inspiration or depression from the influence exercised over us by others. It is indeed a privilege to come into contact with those who carry with them a "Benedicite," unspoken, perhaps, by word of mouth, but uttered in the uplifting influence of their character, countenance, and conversation.

We are all faint and weary at times. True, we do not confess our occasional experience of weariness to each other; but the mother who has had unwonted anxieties and intensified household cares feels just this: "I am so tired!" The young girl-governess knows it when away from the sunny warmth of the old roof-tree of home; with strenuous endeavour she does her brave best to teach, and, what is harder far, to train the children of others. Often when the day is done, and the duty thereof discharged, she is sad and weary. The difficulties have not daunted her, but she says at eventide to herself, "I am so tired!" And MEN feel it too—earnest, busy, enterprising men, who have to meet and to master new antagonisms of competition; thoughtful and inventive men, who are overtaken with the problems of discovery; devout and holy men, who find that the battle with the world and the flesh is harder than they thought, and that the passions are like those ancient classic heroes, who seemed dead, but were only asleep—one and all of them often at heart really say simply this: "I am so tired!"

Of course there are special cases which give emphasis to the words. We feel them as we look at Millais' picture of "The Gambler's Wife"; and it is wonderfully accentuated when there is experience of betrayal, cruelty, and wrong, and eminently so when false witness has taken place in the form of slander, and the poor heart has tried to hunt down the hyenas who eat up reputations and laugh as they enjoy their savage repast. Yes, God only knows; and He, "to whom all hearts are open," understands the deep meaning of the sigh which says, "I am so tired!"

When, then, there is so much room for holy inspirations of cheer and comfort, shall not we be ourselves among the first to excite the emotion of which our motto speaks: "Lift up your hearts"?

At once comes a chorus of voices—"When? Why? How?" It is easy," they say, "to exclaim, 'Lift up your hearts!' tell us, oh! tell us, the secret of success." It is with a modest desire to expound such a secret that this paper is written. It is not restful to men to say, "Lift up your hearts," unless we can give reasons for the counsel. Holy Writ does this again and again. Take the first question, When? And the answer is, Now. Wait not for opportunity; Christ our Saviour is ever nigh unto us, waiting to cheer and comfort us. He loves to be trusted in the time of trial. No depth of depression is too deep for Him to come down to us and succour us. He, "the Man of Sorrows," and "acquainted with grief," was such that He might be the "Brother born for adversity" to help us. As He was tempted that He might succour them that are tempted, so He bore the burden of grief that He might comfort all the cast down and weary ones.

Concerning the next question, Why? we make answer: Lift up your hearts, for it is not good for you to be overcome with the weight of care; it unfits you for duty; it muffles the joy-bells that God Himself has hung in the belfry of the heart, and turns what would be chimes of gladness into funeral bells. Do not bury your hopes; do not sepulchre your purposes as if they were broken off and destroyed, for they are not. God may be giving new direction to your life, but He will take care of that life, and cause it to bring forth fruit unto His praise and glory. Lift up your hearts, also, because not only does your depression hurt your own health, happiness, and energy: it hurts your influence: the world around you, your Church, your home, your friends, your neighbours, need the inspiration of a restful and a joyful soul.

Then comes the third question, How? Not by false stimulants, for in that case the measure of excitement is the measure of after-dulness and dreariness. No. You have been, perhaps, communing with your own heart: commune now a little with Him who made that heart, and who redeemed that heart—

"Commit thou all thy griefs
And ways unto His hand."

Commit: it is a suggestive word. Not only tell your care, but leave your care with your Saviour. "Cast thy burden on the Lord, and He shall sustain thee." Then lay hold on the promises. You want them, and they are all Yea and Amen in Jesus Christ, to the glory of God the Father. And when you have laid hold of the promises, lean on them, lean all your weight on them, and let not the tempter seduce you into any distrust of your Father's care. It is no presumption on your part to believe that they are written for you; and for this reason—there is no exclusion. "Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters." "Come unto Me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

"So tired!" you say. Does our Saviour enter, then, into our weariness as well as our want; our depressions as well as our dangers? I have tried to show that He does; and I certainly should like to feel that after reading these few words your countenance will brighten as upon one on whom God's face has shone. Come, friend and brother, renew your faith, renew your life, renew your joy in God.

But, you say, the writer knows not your experience. That is true: he is no magician. No introspective power is given him into any other heart than his own; but this he does know: that the Bible understands you, and is written for you, and that it reveals a Divine Lord and Saviour, who knows "the secrets of all hearts." And what man cannot do—what those dear earthly ones who love us best cannot do, the Almighty Saviour can do. He can say, "Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee." He can give us the enjoyment of that great legacy: "Peace I leave with you; My peace I give unto you;" and He can so fill us with His Spirit as to make us inheritors of His own joy—a joy which is deep, and real, and permanent, which "no man taketh away from you."

It may be, however, that some who read this have in past times mistaken their way by the exercise of a self-repression and a manner of seriousness, which they have cultivated till habit has stereotyped all their life with something which, if it is not melancholia, is at all events morbidity and gloom. This habit may have been a protest, perhaps, at first against irreverence and frivolity in others. So far the endeavour to be "sober" and to use a corrective was honourable and good. But "poor human nature," as Dr. Horace Bushnell says, "can hold nothing steady;" and so "the liberal become lax, the firm become bigots, and the serious become sad." It may be that such souls need now as a stimulant to take the Apostolic counsel: "Rejoice in the Lord alway; and again I say, Rejoice."

And certainly, apart from its spiritual aspect and influence, the spirit of cheerfulness has much to do with our health and strength, and the very quality, if not the quantity, of our daily work. I love to hear the music of the fields when the horses have bells on them, and when the husbandman sings at his work, and I feel sure that the lifting up of the heart helps also in the lifting up of the hands. Sometimes, in the seasons when we are "so tired," we have to learn the lesson of waiting upon the Lord that He may renew our strength—much as we shrink from hours of withdrawal from active duty and temporary seclusion from the world; yet when the occasion comes, we find that it is a compensative hour; it brings to us something of "the dew of our youth." In spiritual sorrows we are "shut in" with God, and we rest in the Everlasting Arms that are underneath all the children. Sometimes in our youthful life we knew in earlier days what it was to go home again. Away from the college, the office, or the warehouse, when we were broken down and weary, we were suffered to go "home" for a rest. Oh! that happy journey, with a vision at the end of the sweet country, the shady woods, the old gabled house, the warm welcome home! Oh! those familiar farmhouse sounds that echoed through the house, and made us sure, even in the darkness of night, that we were "at home." Oh! that sweet Sabbath morning, those melodious bells, that grey old church, that happy cadence of voices from young men and maidens, old men and children, praising the name of the Lord! Ah! how many readers in some way or another have felt all this, yea, more than all this! It is a parable of a higher home-coming, of the soul's return in weary hours unto the rest in the living God; and after the fatigues and worries of life, so common to us all, there is nothing that "lifts up the heart" so truly as to be able to say, "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in every time of trouble. Yes—they that know Thy name will put their trust in Thee."

Finally, this is a beautiful world, and God meant us to rejoice and be glad in it. We ought to try to make our homes cheerful. It is astonishing what a depressing influence some houses have upon you before you enter them and after you enter them; they look so cold, so cheerless, so colourless and comfortless. It is not want of furniture or want of means, but there is an absence of that cheeriness and cosiness and brightness which says so eloquently, "Welcome to a Home." Our churches, too, ought to unite reverence with brightness and heartiness of worship. We read concerning the Temple of Jerusalem, "Upon the top of the pillars was lily-work." Yes—strength and beauty are to be in God's sanctuary; everything therein should help and not hinder the lifting up of our hearts unto the Lord. I cannot close without remarking that there can be no true lifting up of the heart where any habit of sin is dragging down the spiritual nature. We must be lifted up to God by the Holy Spirit, or there will be no true uplifting of heart at all.

BY THE REV. JOHN TELFORD, B.A.

SKILLED hand has just enriched the literature of the pulpit with a biography of one of the most gifted preachers of this century. The book is full of graphic sketches of the man and his work, some of which may serve as an introduction to a charming volume.

William Morley Punshon was born at Doncaster, on May 29th, 1824. His father was a mercer in Doncaster—a man of sterling principle, and active in all Church work, but not distinguished by any marked ability. His mother belonged to a good Doncaster family. Her brother, Isaac Morley, became a wealthy man, was twice elected mayor, and was knighted in 1841.

The boy's school-life ended with his fourteenth year. He received a sound education, which he perfected by a lifetime of reading. But such a mind as his deserved the highest culture. As it was, he was left too early to follow the bent of his own genius. Poetry and politics were his favourite subjects of study as a boy. His highest ambition was to win a seat in Parliament. Before he was fourteen he entered his uncle's counting-house at Hull. He was not heavily pressed with work, so that there were many leisure hours, even at the office, which he diligently used to complete his acquaintance with the best English literature. This peaceful life was rudely broken in upon by the death of his mother, in June, 1838. The sense of his loneliness almost broke the boy's heart. He wrote to a friend: "We are all buried in profound grief at our house. You can sympathise with me, because you have been in the same circumstances as myself. I feel that I could say with Cain, 'My punishment is greater than I can bear.' This great sorrow awoke him to his need of Christ. In the following October he tells his father that ever since the bereavement he has been under deep and strong conviction of sin, but cannot find peace of mind. A few weeks later, as he was walking along the dock-side at Hull, he met his friend and pastor, the Rev. S. Romilly Hall, who urged him to immediate faith in Christ. Then and there he did venture on his Saviour. He was able at once to rejoice in the peace which passeth understanding.

He was soon busily engaged in Christian work. He became a prayer-leader, a teacher in the Sunday-school, and then its secretary. Nor was mental improvement forgotten. With a few friends of kindred spirit, he formed a Menticultural Society, which did some honest work, and furnished occasion for not a little juvenile eloquence. A Biblical night was a prominent feature of their gatherings. One of the friends took the Greek Testament, young Punshon the Latin, the other friends read Hebrew and German. In this pleasant way they carefully noted variations in the text. Comments on sermons and preachers show in what direction the youth's thoughts were turning. When he was sixteen he went out into the country with his friend Lyth, who had to preach twice at Ellerby. Lyth had only one sermon. This served him well in the afternoon for his audience of twenty-four, but in the evening the beginners were thrown on their beam-ends. They agreed that each should give an address. Then they would have a prayer-meeting. The friends mounted the pulpit. Punshon was to come first with a ten minutes' address. After he had gone through the first part of the service with a long lesson, the boy-preacher gave out his text, "And as Paul reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, Felix trembled." Much to his friend's delight, he spoke between half and three-quarters of an hour, leaving Lyth nothing to do but to finish the service.

Such was the first sermon of one of the most popular preachers of the century. A week or two after this service at Ellerby he left Hull to enter the office of another uncle at Sunderland. Here his second great trouble befell him, in the death of his father, who had disposed of his business at Doncaster early in the year. The orphan boy knew where to find comfort in this great sorrow. After the first fit of anguish, he told his cousin that "the predominant feelings of his heart were gratitude and praise." He engaged eagerly in Christian work, inaugurated a Menticultural Society like that at Hull, and took an active part in Sunday-school and prayer-meetings. Eighteen months thus slipped pleasantly by. At last he felt that he must become a preacher. On April 3, 1842, he delivered his second sermon. His popularity began at once. The chapels were crowded. At Doncaster, where he was invited to preach, seventeen hundred people assembled to hear their young fellow-townsmen. There could be no question as to his vocation. Such popularity and power marked him out as a born preacher. It was arranged that he should spend a year in preparation for the ministry with his uncle, Mr. Clough, who was then stationed at Woolwich.

His first sermon in London was preached in the grim old Wesleyan chapel at Deptford. Soon afterwards he was at Spitalfields, with two thousand five hundred people packed into the building. Such labours blended happily with the course of theological reading which his uncle prescribed. In July, 1844, he was accepted as a candidate for the Wesleyan ministry, and allocated to Richmond College. When he had been in residence four months, however, he discovered that he was designated for missionary work. His friends could not consent to this arrangement, and as there were as many men in training for the home work as the Connexion required, he was sent to supply a vacancy at Marden, in Kent.

Here a chapel was built, and the young preacher drew large congregations. Next September he was sent to Whitehaven, on the Solway Firth, where he spent two years. Nervous depression often brought him very low. But whatever his personal distress, his popularity was unbounded. There were two ministers, with a staff of lay preachers, to supply the pulpit in Whitehaven and a dozen country places around. Mr. Punshon's life-long friend, the Rev. Thomas McCullagh, was then at Workington, about seven miles away. He heard Punshon's first missionary speech at the little port of Harrington, which nestles on the coast between the two circuit towns. "The rush of brilliant thoughts and burning words, the perfect whirlwind of eloquence, almost took away my breath. I do not know that I was more enraptured with his speeches at Exeter Hall in after years, than with that first platform effort during the first few weeks of his ministry. We used to call it his 'excitement speech,' as he dwelt in it upon the excitements of novelty, opposition, and success, by which the missionary enterprise had been supported in turns, until at last it came to rest upon principle. I no longer wondered that such an orator succeeded in filling the large, half-empty chapel at Whitehaven with admiring hearers before his first month in the circuit was over."

A sermon which he preached at Carlisle led to his appointment to that circuit in 1847. The spirit of the old border city breathes in one of his early letters. His study was in sight of the Cathedral; the weather-beaten Castle lay to the right. The view from the ramparts, with the beautiful river Eden meandering through the meadows, and the northern suburb of the city lying in a pleasant knoll beyond, had already caught his fancy. Two happy years were spent here. As the hour of service drew near, the usually peaceful street in which the Methodist chapel stood was crowded by friends from both town and country, hastening to hear the young preacher. Clergymen and Dissenting ministers, Roman Catholics and Quakers, all joined the eager throng. Mr. Punshon took possession of the city. The Methodist chapel became the resort of people who had never entered such a place before. Local traditions of those palmy days still linger among the Cumberland folk. An itinerant merchant who heard him at Whitehaven first told the good Methodists of Wigton that a new light had arisen. "He will make his name in the Connexion," was the man's verdict. Mr. Punshon seems to have been in the habit of singling out one hearer in a congregation to serve as a barometer. One of these sermonometers we used often to hear of in earlier days. In the homes of the people the young minister endeared himself by his sympathy and kindness. When he found a congenial spirit it was always a pleasure to him to discuss the sermons on the stocks.

In 1849 he removed to Newcastle. Here a happy marriage gave him the home comfort and loving sympathy for which the orphaned boy had often pined. Thence he passed with ripened powers for usefulness to Sheffield. The Missionary Committee, always on the look-out for popular advocates, invited him to take part in the May Meetings of 1853. He preached at Spitalfields in the morning, at Old Hyde Street in the evening. Next morning he made his first appearance at Exeter Hall. His twenty minutes' speech produced a profound impression. Robert Newton was there—a veteran in the cause of missions. All who were present felt that the young man from the country had risen up to fill the place of that wonderful orator. After the meeting Jabez Bunting hobbled across the committee-room to express the pleasure it gave him to see and hear Mr. Punshon there. The young man from the country had told his friend McCullagh, a month before, that if he had to speak in Exeter Hall it would be "a terrible affair." But despite his fears he had successfully stepped into the arena where some of his greatest triumphs were to be won.

Before the year was out he was trembling and mourning over his promise to lecture there on behalf of the Young Men's Christian Association. On January 17, 1854, three thousand people assembled to hear his first Exeter Hall lecture. The subject was the prophet of Horeb. When he sat down the whole audience sprang to its feet and "cheered till it could cheer no more." This was a memorable triumph. One of our friends who met him before the lecture at the house where he was staying, was quite incredulous as to his powers. But the success was enormous. The performance was not less wonderful as a feat of memory than as an oratorical triumph. Until he was on the platform he did not decide whether to read or to speak memoriter. Before he rose he passed the manuscript to a friend on the platform, saying, "Follow me, and if I falter give me the book." There was no faltering, however. For two hours the stream of eloquence dashed on. The lecturer did not omit a passage, and scarcely varied a single phrase.

The lecturer's style is carefully analysed in Mr. Macdonald's biography. No syllable was slurred, no intonation that could lend force or beauty to the words was wanting. The sentences had a rhythm which swelled on the ear like music. The emphasis was sometimes an electric shock that condensed the scope of long paragraphs into a single word. These were the chief characteristics of his delivery. His power as a word-painter and limner of character was superb. His glorious climaxes raised enthusiasm step by step till it seemed to touch the clouds. England has perhaps seen no lecturer who for popular effect could vie with Dr. Punshon in his best days of strength.

In 1858 Mr. Punshon was appointed to Bayswater. His wife's health was failing—consumption had set in; so that it was not possible for him to live at Spitalfields, as he had engaged to do. The West of London thus gained what the East had lost. A large new chapel had been erected at Denbigh Road, of which he was the pastor. He preached one sermon every Sunday in his own pulpit; the other half of the day was given to various parts of the Hyde Street circuit. His popularity bore fruit in many financial successes. Spitalfields had suffered greatly by his failure to become its minister. He therefore undertook to raise £1,000 for its burdened trusts by lecturing. In 1862 he pledged himself to find £10,000 in five years by lectures and appeals to his friends. The fund was intended for the erection and enlargement of chapels in watering-places. This herculean task he happily accomplished.

His health broke down at last under the enormous labours of these busy years. Visits to the Continent and a measure of rest at home repaired his flagging energies. The years which he spent in Canada effectually completed his restoration. He sailed from Liverpool in April, 1868, and finally returned to the mother-country on June 3rd, 1873. For five successive years he was President of the Canadian Conference.

His home was in Toronto. Largely by his means, the Metropolitan Church was built there, at a cost of 180,000 dollars. He was practically bishop of an enormous diocese, fifteen hundred miles long, two to three hundred wide. Its population was nearly three millions. Besides this, there were the missionary districts, which needed constant oversight. Victoria University—the Methodist College of Canada—owed to him its theological faculty. He also gave valuable assistance in securing endowments to replace the grants withdrawn by the Legislature. The university recognised these services by conferring on him the degree of LL.D. in 1872. He also prepared the way for the union of the Methodist bodies in the Dominion, which has already borne such good fruit. "He pushed us on half a century," was the eulogium pronounced by Mr. John Macdonald on his work in Canada.

On his return to England in 1873, Dr. Punshon became minister of the church in Warwick Gardens, Kensington. Next year he was appointed President of the Conference. In 1875 he was elected one of the Foreign Missionary Secretaries. He was a business man of the highest order—prompt, rapid, and painstaking. In this congenial sphere the last years of his life were spent. He settled at Tranby Lodge, Brixton Hill. The serious strain of missionary administration was happily relieved by occasional visits to the mission stations on the Continent. Friends gathered round him at Tranby, to whom he delighted to show the autographs of monarchs, statesmen, and men of letters, which it had been his life-long hobby to collect. His study was his sanctum of the house devoted to business and leisure; to occasional contributions to THE QUIVER and other religious works; to devotion, as well as to happy recreation.

The great preacher died at Brixton on Thursday, April 14th, 1881, at the age of fifty-six. The fatal symptoms had seized him whilst he was travelling on the Continent. He only reached home to die. Just before the end he said, with a firm and deeply reverent voice, "Christ is to me a bright reality. Jesus! Jesus!" Then he fell asleep. Brixton Hill Chapel, where he had often ministered during the closing years of his life, presented a scene at his funeral which none who were present can ever forget. Then the mournful procession passed to Norwood Cemetery, where he rests in peace. Many bereavements and sorrows chastened the great preacher, but he was able to thank God for them all. He was rooted in humility. His life, though but brief in years, was crowded with labours which still bear fruit in two continents to the glory of God.

THE UNOPENED LETTER.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A.

LETTERS could only write books, what wonderful stories they would tell us—the letters which were read, and what they did—and the letters which were unread, or if read, unheeded, what they did, too—and the letters which were lost, and what might have happened, or been prevented happening, if only they had arrived safely—the stories which all these could tell would make a library of themselves.

This little paper is concerning a letter which in one sense of the word was not lost, inasmuch as it reached the hands of the person for whom it was intended; but which, in another sense of the word, was lost, inasmuch as it was never opened—at least, not until it could not do any good.

There was a young man, belonging to a very good family, who took up with very bad ways, and rushed into sin of every kind. At last he was driven by sheer shame from home, and, enlisting, was sent to India. For a long time his poor parents did not know what had become of him; but at last they heard through a friend.

As soon as his father knew where a letter would find him, he wrote to him as follows:—

"MY DEAR SON,—You are breaking your mother's heart. Come home at once, and we freely forgive you for all the wrong you have done us. I send out money to a friend in Calcutta to buy you out of the ranks, and also sufficient to bring you home. Come at once. We will give you a hearty welcome home.—Your loving father."

This kind letter the young man got safely enough, but he never opened it. No doubt he knew his father's handwriting well—no doubt his conscience told him what he deserved from that father, and perhaps under the influence of such a thought he never opened the letter at all. It seems wonderful that day after day should pass, and that letter remain in that young man's possession, and that he should never look at it.

Further and further into sin did this poor fellow go; but at last he came to the end of his tether—it is a long lane that has no turning, and the longest lane of sin has its end sooner or later; and this young man found his lane's end on a bed of sickness and death.

Finding himself dying, the poor fellow asked the hospital nurse to give him the unopened letter out of his knapsack. There he found all that had been so long ready for his acceptance—waiting for it—forgiveness, provision, liberty, restoration, welcome, love—everything that a man under his circumstances, and in his condition, could want. But, alas! the time for laying hold of these blessings had passed for him—he was dying; and soon he died.

You say, "Why, the man must have been a fool! How did he know what was in that letter? He might have looked into it, at any rate." Yes; and I add something more—even though he knew that he deserved nothing good from his father—though his conscience told him that—he might have known that there is such a thing as fatherhood. Conscience cannot and will not tell us that, though it will tell us we have sinned shamefully against it; but we know it, nevertheless; but he never let the thoughts of "fatherhood" come into his mind—"fatherhood" with its tenderness and long-suffering and love; and so he neglected opening his letter, and by that neglect missed all.

Now God's letter, good reader, to you, is the Bible, and perhaps you—certainly a great many—are treating God's letter to them in just as foolish a way as this young man treated his father's letter to him. He did not look into it, and read it, and think about it, and act upon it. I dare say if he had read it, he would have acted upon it.

But many will not look into their Bibles at all. They know well enough that they ought to find their condemnation there, and they think that they will find only that. They think they will find some check on the way in which they want to go—they think that they cannot find anything good or comfortable or pleasant for them there. It is the book of the One they have offended against; and they cannot imagine that He should be the very One to write kindly to them, to provide everything for them, to think out everything lovingly for them.

That young man knew that letter was from his father; and that was why he did not open it; he would have opened any other letter; and even so, people know that the Bible is from God, and they don't know that God can be kind to them in the Bible; and so they will open and read anything else—news-paper, novel, advertisement, anything, everything you like but the Bible.

Now see what loss came hereby. In that letter there was forgiveness: "We freely forgive you for all the wrong you have done us." There was invitation: "Come home at once." There was provision, how he was to get there: "I send out money to a friend in Calcutta to buy you out of the ranks, and also sufficient to bring you home." There was every obstacle removed at both ends—his leaving and his arriving. And there was a welcome: "We will give you a hearty welcome home." And all was wound up with a word of loving assurance: "Your loving father."

All this was in the unopened letter, and all that it could give was missed because the letter was left too long unread. And all this is in your Bible; and all for you. The forgiveness through the blood of Jesus—the help of the Holy Spirit to witness to you of the Father's love—heaven, and the way to get there—all—all for you. Read the letter—read it while it can do you good—read it now. And ask the Holy Spirit to make you feel it is all your Father's kind letter to you, saying, "Come home"—"Come home." It is your loving Father who signs the letter saying that all hindrances are removed; you are to come home.

The reason why James I. and his Parliament were not blown up in the Gunpowder Plot was that he read and attended to a letter about the matter, though it was not easy at first to make out what the letter meant. The reason another man lost his life was because he pushed aside a letter telling him of a conspiracy to murder him, and said, "Pleasure to-day, and business to-morrow," but that morrow he never saw.

You have a Bible at home—do not leave it unopened any longer. Just make the experiment to see what it really contains; and if you cannot find in it all that there was in this young man's letter, then I will not ask you to read it any more; but if you can—then "Come home"—"Come home." God has written to you—do not any longer keep by you "Wisdom hath sent forth her maidens."—Prov. ix. 3.

NO bloom the woodland holds,
No leaf the thicket yields,
The snow is on the wolds,
The floods upon the fields.
Where hyacinths have waved the head,
And violets bloomed in leafy bed,
The waters go
In icy flow,
And wintry winds blow loud and dread.

What wanderer seeks the glade
Afar from shepherd's fold?
A lamb moans in the shade,
Anear the waters cold,

But love's compassion, pure and wise,
Is beaming from a maiden's eyes.
O'er wild and waste,
In pitying haste,
She seeks and finds him ere he dies.

Lo! in the cloudy day
The lambs are scattered wide;
Amid the floods they stray,
And perish in the tide.
O Wisdom's messengers of grace,
Bring back the wanderers to His face!
With tender hands,
And love's soft bands,
Enfold them in your warm embrace.

"WANTED, A GOVERNESS."

CHAPTER XIII.

"But the tongue is a fire, as you know, my dear, the tongue is a fire."

"WE used to be such friends at one time, Hilton. Shall we never be friends again?"

These words, spoken in a low, plaintive tone, fall upon my ear, and rouse all my sleepy senses into instant activity. When last my eyes were open to the light, it came faintly and coldly through the window on my left; and the curtains that screened me from the room looked dark, dull, and heavy. Now the window is a wall of darkness, and the curtains are blazing with crimson — that deep, rich crimson that can only be seen by transmitted light.

Early in the afternoon I ensconced myself in this comfortable chair by the drawing-room window, intending to have a long read; but I suppose the chair proved too comfortable, or the book too dull; at any rate, I must have been asleep, for Julia's low-spoken question is my first intimation that anyone has entered the room. How long the gas has been lighted, and how long she and Hilton have been talking by the fire, I do not know. I wish I did, as it might then be easier for me to come out of my hiding-place; for a hiding-place I now feel that it is, although I had not the least intention of making it one. If I had walked boldly out, without giving myself time to think, it would have been all right; but I have waited several seconds, and in that time have thought of many things likely to make my entrance into the room—awkward. Hilton's answer arrests the course of my thoughts and compels me to defer the question until he has ceased speaking.

"My dear girl," he says, "you know I have always had the greatest affection for you."

"But you have seemed so cold lately, Hilton," says Julia plaintively.

I have noticed that he has been very absent-minded and reserved lately, and I suppose this is her protest against it. I dare not move to look at them, but I know exactly how she is gazing up at him with her great expressive eyes. When Julia likes, she is irresistibly fascinating.

"Have I?" he asks, in a tone of gratified vanity. "Well, it was quite unintentional then."

"You can't think how miserable it has made me feel," says Julia.

"Poor old girl!" he says tenderly. "I thought at one time you had left off caring about me."

Julia's answer is given in too low a tone for me to hear. And then there is a long pause—a horribly long pause; during which I fully realise all the horrors of my position, and vividly imagine all the cutting things they will be sure to say on discovering me. It is too late now for me to think of showing myself. Why don't they say something, if only a word, to break this hateful silence? A dreadful idea comes into my mind that they suspect my whereabouts, and are creeping stealthily towards the window to catch me unawares. At the thought I turn hot and trembling, and little pulses set off throbbing at the tip of my nose and under my chin. And I glance guiltily up at the curtains, expecting every instant to see them part, and Julia's scoffing face appear between them. Still there is no sound. The suspense is becoming intolerable; and, unless I satisfy myself that they are still at the other end of the room, I am certain that I shall scream, or do something foolish, and then it will be all over. I peep cautiously through a small opening between the curtains, and then fear is lost in indignation. His arm is about her waist, her head is resting on his shoulder, and he is actually kissing her.

"Dear old girl!" he says softly, "I hope the day will never come when we shall be indifferent to each other."

Again Julia's answer is inaudible; but she partly hides her face against his shoulder, and the little that I can see of it is crimson. His face is turned away from me, so that I cannot see the effect it has upon him; but when he speaks again it is in a more matter-of-fact tone: "Yes, you've always been a good little sister to me, Julia."

She looks up surprised, disengages herself from his hold, and says, in a tone full of significance: "I am not your sister, Hilton; and never can be!"

She stands in the full light of the chandelier, her face all animated and glowing, as I have never seen it before, and looks, in my eyes, like some beautiful spirit of evil luring him to his doom. He must have read the meaning of her words and tone, he must have understood the expression of her great, dark, passionate eyes. Will he fall a victim to their witchery, and say that which cannot be unsaid? Will the memory of my little love be strong enough to hold him?

He hesitates; and in that hesitation Julia, always quick to despair, sees the failure of her hopes. I see her eyes droop, and the light fade out of her face, leaving it rigid and colourless.

"No; I know," he answers uneasily. "But I have always felt as if you were. Don't you wish me to be your brother?"

"Oh, of course!" she says coldly; and her eyes, which are looking straight towards my window, have such an expression in them, that I am frightened, and withdraw hastily behind the curtain.

"I'm sure, Julia," he resumes, half apologetically, "if you were really my sister, I could not care more for you than I do."

"You are very good," she says icily.

There is another pause, during which I can hear Hilton tapping the vases on the mantle-piece. Then Julia asks, in a constrained voice—

"Do you remember your father?"

"Of course I do!" replies Hilton. I fancy he is glad of anything to change the subject.

"Do you remember his junior partner?"

"What! the scamp who robbed him so shamefully, and then fled the country?"

"Yes."

"I don't remember the man himself; but I remember all the incidents connected with the robbery. It was the basest piece of villainy I ever heard of! What made you think of it to-night, Julia?" he goes on, irritably. "I hate to have those old grievances raked up! It only makes me mad, and it cannot do one atom of good! I like to forget such things, if I can. I daresay the scoundrel has met with his just reward before this. And as for my poor old dad—we cannot bring him back to life again."

"What would you do if you saw that man—proud and respected—holding his head high, and living in luxury on the money he had stolen from your father?"

"What would I do? Why, I'd make the country too hot to hold him!"

"I suppose you think that nothing would induce you to make friends with him—and become his son-in-law?" insinuates Julia.

"I don't understand you."

"It doesn't matter."

"But it does matter! You have no right to make a remark like that, unless you are prepared to explain it."

"I don't see that I am bound to explain every remark I may happen to make."

"You are bound to explain that one, though. You must have meant something by what you said; and, as it referred to me, I have a right to know what the meaning was."

"Well, if you will know, I must tell you. I hope you will like the explanation, that's all. The man who ruined your father is no other than the aristocratic Mr. Giffard!"

"I don't believe it!" cries Hilton emphatically.

"You can do as you please about that."

"I don't mean, of course, that you are telling a lie," he says; "I mean that you have been misinformed. The man's name was Carter; and he would be at least ten years younger than Mr. Giffard. Who told you?"

"You will not believe me if I tell you. Ask uncle. He knows all the facts of the case."

"I will. But even if it prove to be true (which I do not in the least expect), it can make no difference to me now. You must see that, after all Mr. Bloomfield has done for me, it would be an abominable piece of ingratitude to say a word to injure his brother-in-law. Besides, he is Margaret's father."

"Ah, I knew how it would be!" exclaims Julia, with intense bitterness. "Well, if you do marry the daughter of a thief, it will not be in ignorance. Not that she seems to care very much about you."

"Look here, Julia, I begin to think that there has been some mischief-maker at work. I am never mistaken in my reading of a person's character; and I do not believe that Margaret would have acted in the way she has if someone had not poisoned her mind against me. I like Maggie very much. She is a thoroughly good-hearted, sensible girl; and I should probably have been engaged to her months ago, if it had not been for all this nonsense. I must go to Cambridge to-morrow, as I promised, but as soon as I come back I will investigate the matter. I could not make out what it meant for a long time, but now I begin to understand it."

"It is a matter of perfect indifference to me," remarks Julia.

"I am glad to hear it," he returns, and goes out of the room, passing so close to my hiding-place that I shrink, and cower, and hold my breath, till he closes the door behind him.

Thank goodness he is gone! I was much more afraid of him than of Julia. I feel convinced that she played the part of eaves-dropper on the day Mr. Giffard first called; and if she does find me now, I will accuse her of it, and try to silence her in that way. She is muttering to herself now, as nervous, excitable people so often do, and I listen with all my powers to hear what she says. I can make out nothing, however, but exclamations of contempt and baffled rage, and something that sounds like, "When he comes back from Cambridge," accompanied by a short, hard laugh.

The door opens, and I hear, with a feeling of intense relief, Mr. Bloomfield's cheery voice exclaim, "Hullo, Julia! all alone? Why, where's Hilton?"

"I don't know," answers Julia.

"I thought he was in here," says Mr. Bloomfield, in surprise.

"He is not, you see."

"Where is Miss Scott, too?"

"I'm sure I don't know. She is down-stairs, most likely, spying about on the servants."

"Now, Julia!" remonstrates Mr. Bloomfield, "I wish you wouldn't talk like that. You don't mean anything, I know, but it sounds as if you did. And I am sure Miss Scott would never do anything so mean."

What would he think if he could see the guilty face behind these curtains? Would he ever believe in me again? Oh, that the floor would open and swallow me up! Oh, that something—natural or supernatural—would remove me from this cosy nook and place me anywhere on the wide earth where I could hide my heated face!

"Of course she is perfect," says Julia sneeringly, as she goes out of the room.

Again I congratulate myself. I do not deserve to escape, but I begin to think that I shall. Mr. Bloomfield is still in the room, however, and seems likely to stay; for I hear him draw an easy-chair up to the fire and open a newspaper.

I wait for a few minutes longer, and then begin to feel terribly cramped and nervous. It is one thing to keep still while you are listening to an interesting conversation, and quite another thing to be forced to do so when there is nothing to engage your attention but the rustling of a newspaper. I begin to expect, too, that either Julia or Hilton will return, and then there will be no chance of escape for me. At last my impatience becomes intolerable; and, hastily deciding on what I am going to say, I muster all my courage and step boldly into the room.

Mr. Bloomfield drops his newspaper and stares, with his eyes—and, it must be confessed, his mouth too—wide open with astonishment.

"Don't be alarmed," I say, with a little sniggling laugh, trying to appear as if I am not ashamed of myself. "I am not a ghost, and I did not come up through the floor. I have only been asleep behind those curtains."

"Asleep?" he repeats slowly, not yet having recovered from his astonishment. "Didn't you hear me talking to Julia just now, then?"

"Well, yes," I answer, feeling very sneaky, and not daring to look at him. "I did not mean to overhear anything, Mr. Bloomfield, but when I woke up she was in the room, and—and you heard what she said just now."

"Yes, but you mustn't think anything of that. She doesn't mean anything, you know. That's only her way, when she is put out about something. So you dare not come out," he says, bursting into a hearty laugh at the absurdity of my having overheard it. "How I wish I had known that!"

"You will not say anything about it, will you?"

"Not I! I never was fond of setting people by the ears."

"Thank you," I answer gratefully, and make good my escape while there is time.

Having safely reached my own room, I sit down and think over the astonishing disclosures which I have overheard.

Is it possible that Hilton is not Mr. Bloomfield's son? Well, I suppose I must believe it, since he admitted it himself, but "I wish people would not tell such abominable falsehoods!" I ejaculate, feeling very much annoyed that they have deceived me about it. Then I find that I cannot tax any particular person with having told this particular lie. "But I must have heard it," I think. "I could not have imagined such a thing. He lives in Mr. Bloomfield's house; he addresses him as 'Pater,' and speaks of him as 'My father'; he bears the same name as Mr. Bloomfield, and everybody speaks of him as his son. Of course I concluded that he was his son." Yes, and perhaps all the rest of their friends have come to the same conclusion in the same way. Well, on the whole, I am rather glad that I did not know the truth. I should only have had a troublesome secret to keep.

Then, again, is it possible that Mr. Giffard is the hardened wretch that Julia has described him? I do not like him, but I cannot believe that he is such a reprobate. It is too preposterous! It must be one of Julia's wild extravagances. And yet, why did he come and go so stealthily at first? and why did Mr. Bloomfield say nothing about his visit? But no—when I remember the man, I cannot believe it of him, without having some very strong proof of his guilt.

I feel rather uneasy at the recollection of that laugh of Julia's, and her muttered exclamation of "When he comes home from Cambridge." But I try to dismiss the subject from my mind; for I am aware that, from watching the progress of this miserable quarrel, I have acquired a habit of exaggerating trifles. And even if she wished to interfere between the lovers, I do not see how she could succeed, now that Hilton has determined to have an explanation with Maggie.

CHAPTER XIV.

"Gone, and a cloud in my heart, and a storm in the air!
Flown to the east or the west, flitted I know not where!"

THE three days of Hilton's absence seem to me to be unusually long. I am impatient to see the end of this wearisome quarrel, and I cannot help feeling an uncomfortable presentiment that something will happen to prevent the promised explanation.

Very soon after his return, I receive a message that Mr. Bloomfield wishes to speak to me in the study, and I go down feeling sure that what he has to say will refer to this particular subject.

When I enter the room Hilton is leaning against the mantle-piece, playing absently with a pen-wiper, and Mr. Bloomfield is poking the fire with most unnecessary vigour. I can see that there is a storm in the air. They exchange glances of inquiry as to who shall commence the interview, then Mr. Bloomfield turns to me, with a strangely hunted, worried look, and says—

"We want to speak to you, Miss Scott, about something very extraordinary that has happened. We thought you might be able to throw some light on the subject. The fact is that Hilton has just been round to Mr. Giffard's, and it seems that he has left the neighbourhood."

"How very sudden!" I exclaim, with a vague feeling that the something I have been expecting has come at last. "Where is he gone?"

"That's just it," returns Mr. Bloomfield. "Hilton has been making inquiries, and can learn nothing of his movements. The servants are all gone, and the house is shut up. They must have left yesterday, for the people at the next house saw him about only the day before. We hoped that Maggie had told you something—in confidence, you know."

"No, not a word! Why, I have not seen her since the last time she came here with her father! I never was more surprised about anything in my life!" I say, looking in bewilderment from one to the other.

"Oh, it is sure to be explained before long," says Hilton. "But it is a very extraordinary proceeding, and my father naturally feels rather anxious about it."

"You see, it's just possible that the man may have gone out of his mind," says Mr. Bloomfield, giving another vicious poke at the fire. "And if such is the case—why, there is no telling what he may do! Of course, it may be all right, as Hilton says; but I hate anything like mystery."

"Have you asked Julia if she knows anything about it?" I ask, in as casual a way as I can. In my own mind I cannot help feeling that she is in some way connected with this disappearance.

"What made you think of Julia?" asks Hilton, turning suddenly round, and looking at me in a keen, scrutinising way.

"I only think it is just possible that she has heard something about it."

"I will ask her at once. As you say, it is possible!" he says, ringing the bell.

The servant is told to ask Miss Julia to come into the study; and in a few minutes we hear her coming leisurely down-stairs.

I suppose Hilton does not care to meet her alone after the way in which they parted on Friday. "Let me speak to her," he says in a low tone to Mr. Bloomfield.

As she enters the room I see the Julia of old times, with compressed lips and defiant eyes. Hilton looks at her steadily. There is a suppressed volcano under that calm exterior of his; she must take care that she does not apply a match to it.

"Mary said you wanted me," she says.

"Yes, we were just speaking about Mr. Giffard. Don't you think it was very imprudent of him to go off in this way?" asks Hilton, looking straight at her with his keen grey eyes.

This mode of attack is evidently a ruse on his part, but if he expects her to be entrapped into making the smallest admission, or showing the least confusion, he is disappointed, for her eyes meet his as unflinchingly and defiantly as ever, and she says, in the same cold, indifferent way, "I don't understand what you mean."

"I suppose you have not heard the news, then? Mr. Giffard has left home suddenly; he has dismissed his servants and shut up his house, and we don't know yet where he is gone. I thought it was just possible that you knew something about the affair."

"Indeed!" she says sneeringly. "I suppose you thought I should be sure to interest myself in his affairs, because I admire and respect him so much?"

Hilton flinches at this. "You don't seem particularly surprised at the news," he says, beginning to lose control over his temper, and speaking with more heat than prudence.

"Surprised!" she exclaims, shrugging her shoulders contemptuously. "I am surprised at nothing! Besides, I am not aware that it is an unusual thing for a man to leave home without giving his address to his friends. Perhaps his wine-merchant or his tailor will be able to enlighten you as to his reasons!"

"Thanks; I shall not apply to them," says Hilton, beginning to play with the pen-wiper again, and affecting to have lost all interest in the conversation. "I thought you could have helped us perhaps; but if that is the only suggestion you can make, I'm afraid it will not be of much use."

"That is all you wanted me for, then?"

"Yes; I am sorry to have troubled you."

"I will go and finish my letter, then," she says; and leaves us without noticing the apology.

"We never thought of that," says Mr. Bloomfield, looking up, with a greatly relieved expression, when she is gone.

"Of what?" asks Hilton.

"Why, what she hinted at just now. He has been living at a great rate, you know. It isn't such an unlikely thing."

"Pshaw! absurd!" cries Hilton. "But we can soon satisfy ourselves about that by calling on some of the tradespeople. At any rate, she knows nothing about the matter! I'll answer for that!"

"Perhaps Maggie will write to us," I suggest.

"I only hope she will," says Mr. Bloomfield. "But I must confess I don't like the look of the thing."

"Oh, we will not wait for them to write. We'll find them without that," says Hilton, who is rapidly recovering his spirits.

"It's all very well to talk, my boy!" retorts Mr. Bloomfield irritably; "but if a man chooses to lose himself in a place like London, how are you going to work to find him? You might as well look for a needle in a hay-stack! Besides, I don't know that we have any right to raise a hue-and-cry after him."

"They must be found," says Hilton, in his decisive way. "And we can do it without raising a hue-and-cry either! Don't you think so, Miss Scott? I shall begin by finding some of the servants; most likely they will be able to give us some clue; servants always know about their masters' business."

This last suggestion seems so remarkably good, that Mr. Bloomfield insists on carrying it out without a minute's loss of time; so he and Hilton set out on their search, and I return to my work up-stairs.

At least, I make an effort to go on with my work, but I find it impossible to fix my thoughts on what I am doing. I keep turning over and over in my mind the different circumstances connected with this sudden disappearance, and trying to persuade myself that it can be easily explained. If I had not heard that unfortunate secret about Mr. Giffard I should find it easier to believe that he had taken a sudden fancy to go to the seaside for a few months—or to Scotland; but with that ugly tale in my mind all kinds of horrors seem possible. Could my reason be completely convinced of the groundlessness of my fears, I believe the feeling that some evil had happened would remain as strong as ever.

In a very short time I put my work away and go and walk about in the garden, like some restless animal. Suspense is bad enough at any time, but how much worse it is when one can take no steps to relieve it!

Mr. Giffard's servants are discovered, but the only information obtained from them is that, up to the morning of their dismissal, everything had gone on in exactly the same way as usual. They have no reason to believe that any large bills were owing to tradespeople, or that Mr. Giffard was in monetary difficulties of any kind. He had given them all a month's wages in advance, and asked them to leave the house before one o'clock, as he had been suddenly called away from town, and did not know when he should return. He had seemed very agitated at the time, and one of them

After a little while we even begin to lose faith in the post—it has disappointed us so often—and by the end of the second week a permanent gloom seems to have settled down upon us, which not even Mr. Bloomfield's persistent effort to look on the bright side of things can relieve.

During all this time Julia appears to take no interest in what is going on. She is in one of her sulky moods (probably because of her late disagreement with Hilton, had afterwards watched him lock the house and drive away in a cab with his daughter. Beyond this we can discover absolutely nothing.

"I go and walk about in the garden."—p. 336.

For the first few days we neither think nor speak of anything else; every fresh plan is greeted with enthusiasm; every fresh failure is a heavy blow. After that, we begin to get used to the state of affairs. When the search is turned in some new direction we hope for success, but we do not expect it, therefore failure does not come upon us with a shock.

All our hopes are centred in the post now, for our only chance is that Maggie or her father will write to us. When the post comes in we seize on our letters eagerly, and look upon them as worthless if they prove to contain no reference to the subject that is uppermost in our thoughts. I even receive one from Charlie, telling me that a considerable increase has been made in his salary, but the news seems so unimportant that I forget to congratulate him about it.

between whom and herself a great coldness seems to exist). She goes out a great deal, and receives all the visitors who call with a too palpably forced gaiety (it is one of the characteristics of Julia's sulks that she is unusually lively when with strangers), but whenever she sits with us, is either writing letters or reading novels.

Altogether we are a very cheerful community.

CHAPTER XV.

"Dear as remembered kisses after death,
And sweet as those by hopeless fancy feigned
On lips that are for others; deep as love,
Deep as first love, and wild with all regret;
O Death in Life, the days that are no more!"

"DEAR UNCLE,—Poor papa is dead, and I am all alone. Will you not come to me?" reads Mr. Bloomfield, from a letter that has just been brought to him.

The post has at last rewarded us for our long-continued faith in it, and brought us news of the absent. But such news!

"Dead!" exclaims Julia, starting violently and turning very pale.

"She says he is dead! Is it possible?" cries Hilton. "And she all alone with him!"

Mr. Bloomfield stares at the letter hopelessly, and reads it again. "'Dear Uncle,—Poor papa is dead.' Yes, dead! there can be no mistake," he says. "Poor child! what a terrible thing for her!"

"Where does she write from?" I ask.

"Hamby; I know the place: it is a village very near F——."

"What is the time?" inquires Hilton, rising.

"It is too late to do anything to-night, my boy," says Mr. Bloomfield. "We must start by the first train in the morning."

"Will you be able to go?" asks Hilton, looking doubtfully at Mr. Bloomfield's foot, which is propped up on a chair. He managed to hurt it a day or two ago, and has not been able to walk on it since. Mr. Bloomfield's answer is a reluctant but decided negative.

"Shall I go?" I ask quickly.

"Yes, the very thing!" he says. "You and Hilton had better start by the first train in the morning. It leaves Liverpool Street—let me see—just find me a time table, will ye, Hilton?"

A piece of paper flutters into my lap. I look up to discover whence it comes, and see Julia going out at the door. It is in her writing, and contains these startling words—

"I am a murderess. Don't speak to me. Don't take any notice of me. Don't tell anyone. I am obliged to tell someone, or I shall go mad. I have told you because I think I can trust you. Tell them presently that I have a headache, and am gone to bed."

"A murderess!" I stare at the long, ugly word in horrified amazement; and then remembering her romantic extravagances, conclude that this is one of them. She has probably hated Mr. Giffard and longed for his death. That is all. I crumple up the little note and throw it into the fire.

"Julia, Julia! let me in," I say, an hour later, as I stand knocking at her bedroom door. There is no response. "Let me in!" I call, knocking louder than before. Still there is no response; and horrible tales begin to flit through my mind—there is no accounting for these romantic girls! I try to open the door, but find it locked; then knock again—and presently it is unlocked and opened, and Julia, her face all white and tear-stained, stands before me.

"What do you want?" she asks.

"To speak to you," I answer.

"You can speak to me here," she says coldly.

I know that, if I show the least weakness, she will be as hard to move as a rock. She always strives, with all her powers, to get her own way; but I know that she respects anyone who forces her to give it up. "You may do as you please about letting me in," I say, looking steadily at her, and speaking in a tone as cold as her own. "But bear in mind that I know more of this matter than you are aware of, and it will be better for us both to understand each other."

"You can come in if you like," she says wearily, moving across the room to a seat at the window, where she has evidently been sitting. The window is wide open, and the night wind is blowing coldly in, and playing sad tricks with the candle I hold in my hand. I set it down out of the draught, and move to the window to close it.

"My child, you will catch your death of cold!" I exclaim, with some compassion.

"Let it alone," she says fretfully, putting out a weak hand to stop me, and beginning to cry: not savagely, as I had seen her before, but in a hopeless, dreary fashion. "Let it alone. I wish I could catch cold! I wish I could die! I know I shan't die," she sobs. "I shall live to be a hundred! It makes me ache to think of all the years I shall have to live!"

"Julia," I say firmly, "you are talking utter nonsense."

"Why do you stay and listen to it, then?" she retorts, moving from the window to the bed.

"Because I want to know exactly what you meant by calling yourself a murderess," I answer boldly. She is completely in my power to-night, and I dare say anything to her. I have come upon her in a weak moment, and her will, always remarkable for stubbornness rather than strength, has given way before mine.

"Do you know who Mr. Giffard is?" she asks, looking at me with a gleam of animation.

"Yes; some years ago he wronged Hilton's father. He was his junior partner."

"Who told you?"

"Never mind who told me; I know it, that is sufficient. The question is—what had you to do with his death?"

"I killed him! I frightened him to death!" she cries passionately. "He was always afraid of being found out, I know, and I wrote and told him that if he did not hide himself from uncle and Hilton, he should be exposed. I did not mean to harm him! Oh, dear! oh, dear! why was I ever born, to be such a misery to myself and everyone else?"

"What induced you to do such a treacherous thing?" I ask, in angry surprise.

"Why did I do it? Why, because there was only one chance of happiness for me in the world; and I could not see it snatched away without making an effort to keep it. Oh, my boy! my boy!" she moans. "She never cared for him as I do. Look at the way she has been behaving all these months, just because I told her a lie about him, and she was fool enough to believe it. I would never have believed it—or, if I had, it wouldn't have made any difference."

"Do you mean to say that you were the cause of all that misunderstanding?" I ask.

"Yes," she replies doggedly. "And I would do the same again if it would bring him back to me."

"How horribly treacherous!" I think, and my indignation rises against her. "I could never have been guilty of such a thing!" and looking back over my past life, I see it stretched out clear of any such dark stain of treachery. Yes, but do I see any great temptation grappled with and overcome? I look back again, and fail to see any such temptation. But a long train of smaller ones, yielded to without resistance—repented of immediately perhaps, but yielded to again and again—duties neglected, little acts of injustice, unkindness, or ingratitude; refined cruelties, thoughtless gossip repeated, and malicious speeches made to hurt the feelings of others. These rise up before my mind's eye like an army of ugly little goblins, and each one says, in its own way, "Judge not."

I am aware that my having given way to a small temptation is no proof that I should give way to a great one; but I feel that until I have overcome a great one, I must not play the part of Pharisee.

"I wish I had never been born!" moans Julia.

It is a wrong wish; but, looking at her lying there upon the bed, worn out with remorse and grief, and remembering her strong passions and weak will, I do not wonder at the cry. A great pity for the poor, weak girl comes into my heart; and I kneel down by the side of the bed, not touching her, as I know from experience that she would be likely to resent that, and say, very earnestly, "Julia, I am a friend of Margaret's, as you know, but I am not unfriendly to you. You said in your note that you thought you could trust me. I am very sorry for you. Won't you let me try to help you in some way?"

"I wish you could," she says, with more softness than I expected; and she takes my hand and holds it against her throbbing temples. "I wish you could help me to think of some way of making my life endurable."

This is an excellent opportunity for giving her a little sermon. I know exactly what should be said under such circumstances; but, fortunately, I understand Julia's character, and I know that nothing would be more likely to harden her against me, and prevent my doing her the least good. I think a minute, and then say—

"I have never had to choose my own path in life, because it has always been so clearly marked out for me; but if I had to decide, as you are doing, I think I should try to find some kind of active employment for myself. I don't say that it is capable of making you altogether happy. But when you go to bed at night and think that you have had a miserable day, it is a great consolation to know you have, at least, accomplished something—that it has not been a wasted one. I believe few things in this world give us more satisfaction than an honest day's work."

"It's no use!" she replies fretfully. "I always hated work. I could work well enough when I wanted to get anything done, but I could never work for the sake of working. I must get away from here somehow, though."

"How long have you lived with Mr. Bloomfield?" I ask.

"Ever since my father died—when I was ten years old."

"And was Hilton living here then?"

"Not here, but Le has lived with uncle ever since he was quite a child. His father was quite ruined by that shameful robbery; so directly uncle heard of his death, he went to see what he could do to make some atonement for the evil his brother-in-law had done. And he brought Hilton home to live with him. Uncle lived in the country then. Ah, those were dear old days! What games we had! I was never a puling girl. I could climb a tree or jump a ditch as well as any of the boys. I was always in disgrace about something, though, for aunt was awfully strict with us—but what did I care?"

"And were you and Hilton fond of each other, then?"

"Yes. We quarrelled, of course. Children who are good for anything always do; but we were companions—his friends were my friends—I used to help him in all his schemes; and he always made me mind him. Then, when I was sent to bed in disgrace—aunt always tried to punish me in that way—he used to come and talk to me through the keyhole. Oh, I can't bear it!" she says, beginning to cry again, and speaking with a kind of ludicrous pathos that would make me laugh if it were not so very real. "We fought and played together all those years—and now to lose him after all!"

"That is the very reason. He thinks of you as a sister. Did not all that make you feel as though he were your brother?" I ask, wishing to bring as much common sense to bear on the subject as possible.

"Till he went to college I did. Never after that. But I never knew, till she came, how much he really was to me. What a fool I am to have told you all this!" she exclaims pettishly. "I keep forgetting that you are her friend, and have been trying all you could to get him away from me."

"Now, do be just!" I say. "Whatever I may have wished, you must acknowledge that I have never done or said anything to injure you. I want to help you if I can."

"Well, you can't," she says, turning over her pillow to find a cooler place. "And I don't want to be helped. I only want to be left alone. I wish you would go."

"I am going," I reply curtly. "But there is one thing I must say, and that is, that as you were the cause of the misunderstanding between Margaret and Hilton, it would be only right and just of you to undeceive Margaret." She makes an impatient movement, but takes no further notice of my speech. "I am sure you would be happier if you did," I continue; "and I'm sure you could trust Margaret not to—"

"How you worry!" she interrupts angrily. "I have done it."

"I beg your pardon!" I say, with a return of my friendly feelings towards her. Who that has sinned can do more than repent and make restitution? I begin to think that I shall never quite understand this strange girl, who is so eager for love and "A great pity for the poor, weak girl comes into my heart."—p. 339.

admiration, yet who exaggerates her faults, carefully conceals her better qualities, and disdains so scornfully to take any pains to win the love of those she cares for most.

"Good-night," I say. "I am glad you have written to Margaret. It was the right thing to do, and I am sure you will never repent of having done it."

"Stop!" she cries, as I am moving towards the door. "You need not think that I did it from any good motive. I knew that as soon as they met there would be an explanation, and then it would all come out. Do you think I want him to despise me?"

"Good-night," I repeat, and leave her, without making any comment on what she has said. This love for Hilton, which seems so deep and strong—what would it do for her if she married him? Would it be strong enough to make her a good wife to him? To induce her keep his house in order, and train his children up in the path of duty? Or would it lead to dissatisfaction at every fancied coldness? Julia will never be contented! She has yet to learn that perfect happiness can never be our lot on earth. She is not happy; she feels that she has a right to be so, and fancies that if she had this or that she would be. Now, the thing desired is Hilton's love, and if she obtained that, the craving for happiness would (in all probability) be still unsatisfied, and—But what need to look further into the subject—children have cried for the moon before now!

ASPIRATIONS.

BY THE REV. M. G. WATKINS, M.A.

IN opening years youth dares like flame,
And beats its wings 'gainst duty's cage;
Nor ever doubts that world-wide fame
Its glorious thirst will soon assuage;
Alas! time's onward-rolling stream
Rudely breaks up the glitt'ring dream.

When twinned hearts stir 'neath love's full tide
We fain would wear the poet's wreath,
Unthinking that ne'er satisfied

With man's applause confront we death—
Poetic souls, too, sometimes miss,
Spite of renown, the highest bliss.

With halting feet at length we learn
Thankful to tread the daily round,
Grown simply wise, and ne'er to yearn
For goods outside the allotted bound
Thus, loving God and man, we find
Well-being in well-doing shrined.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

THE CAPTIVITY AND RESTORATION OF JUDAH.

No. 16. THE RETURN OF THE EXILES.

To read—Ezra i.

THE PROCLAMATION.

(1-4.) Have been reading stories of Jewish exiles in Babylon. The seventy years' captivity now come to an end. Sad time of gloom and banishment and living as slaves in heathen land to be changed for bright days—return home—free citizens once more in their own land—all religious privileges restored. How did all this come about?

(a) God had ordained it. Cyrus foretold by name—called God's Shepherd, to lead His people, and His Messiah, or Anointed One. (See Isa. xlv. 28; xlv. 1-4.)

(b) God now put it into Cyrus's heart, and he followed God's guiding. He issues a proclamation to Jews to return home.

(c) He acknowledges God as Lord of all the earth who has given him his kingdom.

(d) He commands Jews to rebuild the Temple.

(e) He orders all to help them.

What a wonderful day for the Jews!

LESSONS. 1.—God's faithfulness. All came to pass as foretold. God's promises are sure. (2 Cor. i. 20.) All events ordered for us. We may trust Him.

2.—God's guidance. He puts good thoughts into our hearts. His Spirit guides, teaches. (Ps. xliii. 3.) We must follow His guidance.

II. THE RETURN. (5-11; ii. 1, 2.) Can imagine the excitement amongst the Jews in Babylon—preparation for long journey of four months—hasty buying of asses, camels, etc. Notice—

(a) The leader. Sheshbazzar—prince of royal family of Judah, usually called by Jewish name, Zerubbabel. (ii. 2.)

(b) The numbers. The chief of the fathers, i.e., elders of the tribes. Some of these would remember Jerusalem, left in their youth. Priests and Levites naturally most eager to rebuild Temple. All whose spirit God had stirred to return to Jerusalem—in all 42,360 (ii. 64), besides 7,337 servants and 200 singers (ii. 65).

(c) The help. Cyrus gives them the vessels of the Temple. (Remind how Belshazzar had been punished for his impious use of these.)

Their friends in Babylon give them money and precious stones. So all things made ready for their return.

Nothing told of journey. Can picture the long caravan—Priests, Levites, and singers chanting daily Psalms, such as lxxxiv., cxii., cxxxvi., etc.—men leading camels joining in chorus, women and children riding. The encampment at night—the nearing Jerusalem—the holy and beautiful city at last visible. (Ps. xlviii.) The shouts of joy and praise as they enter—the long pilgrimage over.

LESSON. Jerusalem our home. This life's journey a pilgrimage. Sin's bondage left—the ransomed of the Lord come with singing to their Zion. (Isa. xxxv. 10.)

No. 17. THE TEMPLE BEGUN.

To read—Ezra ii. 68-70 and iii.

I. OFFERINGS. (ii. 68-70.) Jerusalem reached—people settled down in cities round about. Then begin to arrange for work of rebuilding Temple. Great meeting held to collect offerings. Notice—

(a) The elders take the lead—set good example.

(b) Offerings made freely—not of constraint.

(c) All gave according to means.

Three good examples for all time.

II. WORSHIP. (iii. 1-6.) Offerings incomplete without worship. Now things getting into order—regular worship re-established.

(a) Right time. Seventh month full of holy days.

First day—a holy convocation. (Num. xxix. 1.)

Tenth day—great fast, or Day of Atonement. (Num. xxix. 7.)

Fifteenth day—Feast of Tabernacles kept for seven days. (Lev. xxiii. 34.)

(b) Right place. People gathered at Jerusalem—place chosen by God for solemn worship. Site of Temple carefully traced out—exact position of altar ascertained. Cannot build whole Temple at once—plans must be drawn—builders chosen—materials collected—so do what they can at once.

(c) Right services. Daily sacrifices begun at once. Feast of Tabernacles, etc., held as appointed. Freewill offerings accepted.

LESSONS. 1. All things done in order, as God appoints, then may expect His blessing.

2. Duty of worship. In our homes—in God's House. All who offer praise and prayer honour God. (Ps. l. 23.)

III. DEDICATION. (7-13.) Preparations for rebuilding begun in earnest. Workmen of all kinds assembled at Jerusalem—cedar trees sent for from mountains of Lebanon—now at last comes the day for laying foundations of Temple. Notice—

(a) Jeshua, a man of Judah—the royal tribe—takes the lead.

(b) Levites—i.e., priestly tribe—take prominent part.

(c) Builders lay the stone well and truly.

(d) Priests in robes of office conduct religious service.

(e) Singers lead service of song, prayer, and praise.

(f) People all join in chorus. (Ps. cxxxvi.)

Now comes a strange scene. People shout with joy and excitement—but old people weep. Why?—

(a) They remember glory of last Temple, so grand and beautiful—this one looks so mean and poor.

(b) They know what is lacking in this one—viz., the Ark with its contents (Heb. ix. 4.)—the glory of the Lord over the Mercy-seat—etc.

Yet this Temple was to have greater glory (Hag. ii. 10), for Christ was to come and teach in it and give peace.

LESSON. Joy in God's House. "I have thought of Thy loving-kindness in the midst of Thy Temple."

NO. 18. THE TEMPLE HINDERED.

To read—Ezra iv., v. (parts).

I. ADVERSARIES. (iv. 1—8.) Building of Temple begun prosperously—now difficulties begin. Adversaries come forward. Who are they?

(a) Their race. Mixed people—sprung from settlers brought into Palestine by Assyrians after ten tribes taken captive. (2 Kings xvii. 24.) Commonly called Samaritans.

(b) Their religion—mixed—partly Jewish, partly heathen.

Desire to help the Jews in rebuilding Temple. Why were they refused?

Because did not worship God truly, therefore could not be allowed to join in building His House. They might beguile Jews into idolatry—the sin for which they had been taken captive to Babylon.

Samaritans not allowed to help—determined to hinder.

What did they do?

Discouraged the people—hindered them in building—hired counsellors against them—wrote accusations against them to the Kings of Persia. What did they say? (12—16.)

(a) Jerusalem always been rebellious city.

(b) Jews will refuse to pay taxes.

(c) The king will suffer great loss.

What did all this opposition show?

(a) Envy at growing success of Jews.

(b) Hatred leading to malice.

(c) Revenge for not being allowed to help.

Result—the work stopped for many years.

LESSON. Patience. Must expect difficulties—in opposition—in doing God's work. Trial of patience—but because it is God's work all will come right at last. (James i. 3, 4.)

II. HELPERS. (v. 1—5.) Sad time in Jerusalem. Building of Temple stopped—probably daily sacrifices also—people grow careless. But always darkest before dawn. Notice—

(a) God's eye upon them all the while (verse 5).

(b) Two prophets sent to encourage them.

Will notice two things in Haggai's prophecy—

(a) Blame for building fine houses while Temple in ruins. (Hag. i. 4.)

(b) Encouragement—glory of this Temple shall be greater than that of former. (Hag. ii. 10.)

Result—princes, prophets, people, all begin the work once more. Tatnai, the governor, inquires into the matter—writes to Darius for information—was such a decree as that of Cyrus really made? The decree is searched for—found (vi. 1—3), and fresh orders are given for carrying on the work. Help of all sorts sent (vi. 9) for sacrifices, etc. All who hinder the work to be destroyed. So all ends well.

LESSON. The wrath of man shall turn to His praise.

NO. 19. THE TEMPLE FINISHED.

To read—Ezra vi. 13—22.

I. TEMPLE DEDICATED. At last all complete—Temple had taken twenty years to build—must now be solemnly dedicated or set apart for service of God. Remind of similar scenes—

(a) Jacob dedicated altar at Bethel. (Gen. xxviii. 18.)

(b) Tabernacle dedicated in wilderness. (Ex. xl. 10, etc.)

(c) David re-dedicated the Ark. (2 Sam. vi. 17.)

(d) Solomon's Temple dedicated. (2 Chron. vii. 5.)

(e) Christ attended Feast of Dedication. (St. John x. 22.)

Can imagine the gathering and service at Jerusalem. Great joy at completed work.

Large offerings for the service of the Temple.

Burnt offerings for past sins (verse 17).

Sin offerings for thanksgiving.

Psalms of praise sung, such as cxvii., cxlvi., cl.

Arrangement made for regular worship—Priests and Levites to take regular turns.

All things set duly in order.

LESSON. I was glad when they said, Let us go into the House of the Lord.

II. PASSOVER KEPT. (19—22.) Remind of the three great yearly feasts—Passover, Pentecost, Tabernacles.

Passover instituted the night Israelites came out of Egypt. (Ex. xii. 3.)

Passover looked back to deliverance from Egypt.

Passover looked forward to Christ's death—the Lamb of God. (1 Pet. i. 18.)

Passover revived by Hezekiah. (2 Chron. xxxi. 2.)

" kept by Christ. (St. Luke ii. 41.)

" only to be kept by Jews. (Ex. xii. 43.)

" observed with rejoicings for seven days.

What were their special grounds for joy?—

(a) God had turned the king's heart towards them.

(b) They were settled at peace in their own land.

(c) The Temple was finished.

Notice how they prepared for the Festival—

(a) The people were solemnly purified. (See 2 Chron. xxx. 15—17.)

(b) They separated themselves from the heathen around. All this taught them many lessons—

1. God is holy—cannot look upon sin.

2. Need for personal holiness.

3. God must be worshipped with holy worship.

THE UNITED KINGDOM ALLIANCE.

THE United Kingdom Alliance is probably the best known of all the organisations which teetotalism has raised and moulded in this land. It embodies, announces, and enforces much of the sentiment not only of the total abstainer, but of others who are interested in the promotion of sobriety. And, without expressing opinion on the merits of the measures it advocates, we may well find in its story and in its leaders, past and present, much to admire and interest. It is more than thirty-four years since the formation of the Alliance, and many of its early friends have passed away. It has known some change in the popular appreciation of its views, and it has had in recent years a reception very different from that it met with in its early days; but constantly and tenaciously it has promulgated its opinions, and has certainly aided greatly in the diffusion of more correct views as to some of the functions, and exercises of the functions, of government.

The United Kingdom Alliance for procuring the legislative suppression of the traffic in intoxicating beverages was formed June 1st, 1853. Its founder and first treasurer was Nathaniel Card, "a guileless Quaker," and amongst his friends were found many of the early members of the Alliance. The first report was presented to the General Council in October, 1853, and since that time the Manchester meeting in that month has been one of the events of each year in Cottonopolis. In the list of the first subscribers, the number of "Friends" is a rather remarkable one. It includes the names of Card, Alexander, Richard Allen, Samuel Bowley, the Clarks of Street, Backhouse, Binns, and other well-known Quaker names. Sir Walter C. Trevelyan headed the list; but he, Mr. J. Silk Buckingham, and most of those we have named, have passed away, and of fifty-five subscribers who are named, the chief survivors are Mr. S. Pope, Mr.

Joseph Cowen, of Newcastle, and Mr. Charles Thompson, then of Manchester. The first president was Sir W. C. Trevelyan; and amongst the seventeen vice-presidents was the well-known temperance name of Mr. James Silk Buckingham; the honorary secretary was Mr. Samuel Pope; and the secretaries, William Gawthorpe and Thomas H. Barker. There were on the General Council 293 names—ninety-seven being those of clergymen and ministers. That Council formulated what would in America be called the "platform" of the Alliance, and an aggregate meeting "in the Corn Exchange, Manchester," endorsed it. The growth was comparatively slow in public appreciation in the early years, but the agitation was conducted on the platform and in the press with unflagging energy and with unwavering courage. There was, in some quarters, indifference; there was some opposition which was fair, and a little which was abusive. Meetings were broken up at Birmingham, at Exeter, Southampton, Dudley, and other places; but these were found to be most effectual advertisements of the cause and of its advocates, and gradually the public ear was won at least to quiet listening.

In the endeavour to win the public ear, the Alliance enlisted the sympathies of the Hon. Neal Dow, who visited this country in 1857 and addressed enormous gatherings—one on Parshaw Crag, at which it was computed that 14,000 persons were present. A conference of ministers had its effect on the views of the clergymen and ministers of many denominations; a newspaper organ for the Alliance was begun, bearing its name; and finally, propositions on which the Permissive Bill was afterwards based were formulated. The Social Science Congress and the British Association formed battle-fields on which the doctrine of prohibition was fought over. In 1860 there were also a series of measures which brought the Alliance into a fame it had not previously known: in that year the Budget provided for lower duties for French wines, and a new system of wine and beer licences. The Alliance raised the alarm, and before the end of February Mr. Gladstone abandoned the project as far as the beer licence was concerned. The second reading of the Licence Bill, so shorn, was moved on March 20th; and then, until May 7th, the famous battle was waged. In the end there were 305 voted and paired for the Bill, and 231 against it—a narrow majority under the circumstances. The debates so ended occupy over 100 pages of Hansard. That fight, moreover, brought to the front, as Parliamentary agent of the United Kingdom Alliance, Mr. James H. Raper, one of the veterans of the movement, and one of its ablest advocates. In the following year the battle between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Alliance was renewed over a proposal to repeal part of the "Tippling Act," and in this instance the supporters of the organisation in the House of Commons, led by Mr. A. S. Ayton, won. In 1863, Mr. Wilfrid Lawson's "resolution" was introduced by him in the House, but he carried only 21 members with him into the lobby; but the year 1864 was made memorable by the introduction of the Intoxicating Liquors Bill—of which "Permissive Bill" 2,549 petitions desired the passing. Supported by Mr. Henry Pease, and with a half-condemnation from Mr. John Bright, the Bill found 37 supporters in the House, and 294 opponents. That defeat was followed by the defeat of Mr. Wilfrid Lawson; but that was a defeat for one Parliament only, and at the general election of 1868 the Parliamentary chief of the Alliance was returned for his old constituency of Carlisle, but under the title of Sir Wilfrid Lawson. His reappearance betokened the introduction again of the Permissive Bill; and the division showed increased support and diminished opposition—the numbers being, with tellers and pairs, 94 for the Bill, and 200 against. In 1870 there were 115 for, and 146 against; and in the following year 136 were for, and 208 against. It is needless to follow further the Parliamentary action, either in the promotion of the Bill or the less definite "local option" resolutions which followed, and which were supported by increasing majorities. The organisation has used its efforts to support many a measure in both branches of the Legislature, and to oppose others, and gradually its force has become one of the powers in Parliament.

Not alone in legislative action has the Alliance been prominent for a score of years. It has provided much literature on temperance questions; it has convened the citizens of many a city to express opinion on such questions; it has for years kept up streams of petitions to Parliament; and by its deputations and members the need for reform in licensing, and the need for prohibition, have been urged on Convocation and Church assembly and association. And its work in constant vigilant watch over legislative action in many lands has not been one of the least of the benefits it has conferred on the public.

The first subscription list had attached to it the names of 55 subscribers of £5 each and upwards, its total income being £900; in less than a score of years its subscription list rose to £10,000; and for its last financial year the receipts were, from subscriptions, £11,838; whilst receipts for literature, etc., brought up the total for the year to £16,339.

Year by year the early friends of the Alliance who survive are fewer; the annual reports over thirty years tell the tale of the loss of men like Silk Buckingham, Nathaniel Card, Robert Charleton, Washington Wilks, Canon Stowell, General Perronet Thompson, Sir Wilfrid Lawson (father of the present baronet), James Teare, Lord Brougham, William Hoyle, and Hugh Mason—men whose varied views in politics and religion, as well as teetotalism, tell well the story of the catholicity of the Alliance.

Though the adherents of the Alliance are in many lands, Manchester is its centre. It is there a power, and almost a personality. It does not now do as it did thirty years ago there—hold its Grand Bazaars for a week, and sell the contributions of adherents in England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and Man, to raise its funds. It calls for a guarantee of subscriptions over a series of years, and its friends promise sums that range from a shilling to £1,000 yearly, and thus its funds are furnished. Manchester helps to fill its purse, and it gives it year by year enthusiastic audiences. When the General Council meets in the Friends' Meeting House in that city, the enthusiasm might arouse any of the staid descendants of George Fox who are near. But the gathering in the noble Free Trade Hall at night is one of the sights of the year in Cottonopolis. There are usually on the platform more members of Parliament of both parties than are to be found at any other non-political meeting; there is a Queen's Counsel who for over thirty years has been honorary secretary; there are canons, and clergymen, and ministers many; doctors of fame are there, and a representative gathering of temperance men and thoughtful citizens come from every quarter. from Land's End to John o' Groat's. And in tier after tier the audience rises to the sight, so vast in numbers, so influential in appearance, and so enthusiastic in approval of the resolutions, that the wonder is why the Bill of the humorous and bearded baronet, of Pope and Lees, of Raper and Barker, and their colleagues, is not an Act, but still in the chrysalis state of a Bill only. If the head-quarters of the Alliance are in Manchester, its branches are widespread, its agents and superintendents are located in many a county, and its literature permeates the land. It has entered on the second stage in its history; its founders have mainly passed away; it has had not to change its policy, but its front, yet it unweariedly pursues the same object, has the same end in view, and none can tell how near or how far off is its goal.

SOME BIBLE PLANTS.

I.—INTRODUCTORY.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM SPIERS, M.A., F.G.S., F.R.M.S.

ABOUT a hundred plants and vegetable products are referred to in the Bible, most of which, but not quite all, have been identified. These allusions, with few exceptions, are confined to Palestine, for the native flora of Egypt is a poor one, its only important plants being the papyrus of the Nile and some of the cereals; while the Arabian desert is exceedingly barren, furnishing hardly anything but an occasional palm, the terebinth, the juniper, the caper or hyssop, and the desert acacia.

It is not to be wondered at that a few of the names of plants in our Authorised Version have turned out to be incorrectly given. It was impossible for the translators of King James' reign to be so accurately acquainted with the flora of the East as to be able to give the exact English equivalent of the Hebrew or Greek name in every case. Hence it is that a few of the plants mentioned in that version—tares, lily of the valley, balm, myrrh, apple-tree, and one or two others—are not the same as those known by these names amongst ourselves.

The fact that there are comparatively so few references to vegetable productions in the Bible is sufficiently accounted for by the consideration that it is only those plants which, from their abundance, or special beauty, or great utility, possessed exceptional importance, that we should expect to be alluded to in a book whose primary purposes were historical and religious. The vine, the fig, the olive, the cereals, so luxuriant and valuable; the palm, cedar, and bay, the fit emblems of constancy and dignity; and the thorn and briar, the vivid images of evil and pain: these are the plants most frequently named.

It must not be supposed, however, that the flora of the Holy Land is meagre. On the contrary, it is strikingly rich and diversified. There are twice as many species of plants native to Palestine as there are in the very much wider area of the British Islands. But it is only on account of their economic utility, or because of their suitability for moral and spiritual illustrations, that they are mentioned by the inspired writers. The geographical conditions of Palestine are so varied, and its climate is so favourable to vegetable growth, that no botanist will feel astonished at the richness of its flora. Of Oriental types there are the splendid acacias, and their brightly coloured parasite, the loranthus; the denizens of the mountain include the oak, the maple, the magnificent cedar, and the pretty oxyria; among the trees are the carob, the terebinth, the olive, and the pistachio, the bay, the myrtle, and the oleander; crowds of orchids and anemones, lilies and pinks, cyclamens and echiums, and many other showy flowers, occur in such profusion as to lead Canon Tristram to compare the scene with the Garden of Eden; while everywhere are seen most of the blossoms that ornament the English wayside and hedgerow—the buttercup and daisy, the campion and corn-poppy, the dog-rose and bryony, the willow-herb and germander speedwell, the herb-robert and stitchwort, the wild mint and selfheal, the groundsel and dandelion, and others familiar to us.

The chief attraction, however, of the Palestinian flora does not lie in its profusion, nor even in its beauty, but in its hallowed associations. We cannot help feeling impressed even by the simple daisy and buttercup of those pastures over which Abraham walked when, by Divine direction, he pitched his tent in the Land of Promise. The beautiful tulips and orchids shine with added charms when we reflect that it was flowers like these, and growing where they now flourish, that David, the ruddy-faced shepherd lad, plucked while guarding his father's flocks. These charming anemones and tinted or spotted lilies that transfigure the plains and ponds of Judæa seem to speak to our very soul as they re-echo the sweet and oft-needed lessons of trust and contentment which the Saviour drew from them.

Plants are arranged by botanists in certain groups for the purposes of study and comparison. The older classification of Linnaeus, useful as it was when little was known of the nature and affinities of plants, or of their mode of development, has been quite superseded by the natural system of Jussieu and De Candolle. In regard to most plants, the blossom and the seed are the essential parts concerned in reproduction, while in the remainder a modified form of seed, called a spore, is developed without the mediation of a flower. This distinction supplies the principle of the first division of the vegetable kingdom into Cryptogams or flowerless plants, and Phenogams or flowering plants. The young plant, which germinates from the seed, puts out either one or two seed-leaves, or nursing-leaves, called cotyledons: hence flowering plants are further divided into monocotyledons, or those having one seed-leaf, and dicotyledons, which have two seed-leaves. Further sub-divisions into what are called natural orders are based upon the characteristics of the plants, and their affinities with one another.

The only approach to classification of plants in the Bible is the arrangement which is met with in the Mosaic account of the Creation. But it need hardly be said that in referring to grass, herb, and tree, Moses merely aimed at giving a brief and general enumeration, such as should appeal at once to the popular mind. In any effort that may be made to study the plants mentioned in the Bible, it is the most convenient, whilst it is also the most instructive method, to follow the system now universally adopted by botanists.

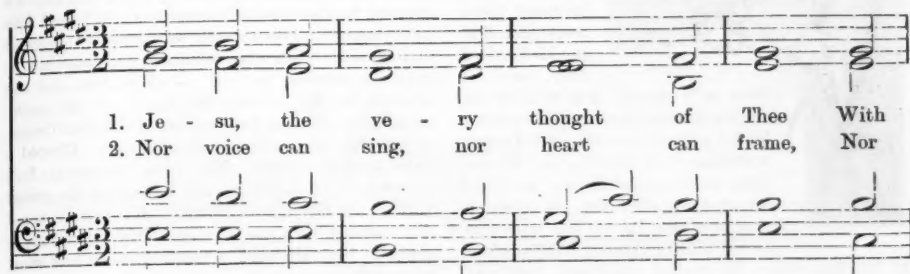

In regard to the Cryptogams, or flowerless plants—in which group are included lichens, fungi, mosses, ferns, etc.—nothing need be stated save that there is no clear reference in Scripture to any member of this group. It has, indeed, been suggested that the manna of the wilderness was a kind of lichen, and that the hyssop, used for sprinkling sacrificial blood, was a moss; but the difficulties which beset these suppositions are such as have led to their rejection by practically all whose judgment is of value in botanical questions. We have to deal, therefore, only with Phenogams, or flowering plants, the largest and by far the more important of the two great groups into which the vegetable kingdom is divided; and we shall in future papers take up the natural orders as they come in the arrangement most generally adopted by English botanists.

MILTON'S HOUSE AT CHALFONT ST. GILES.

IT is a very curious fact that though the poet Milton is known to have occupied more houses than most men during his lifetime, only one of them still stands, and that is the cottage at Chalfont St. Giles, to which he fled with his family when London was ravaged by the Plague. He was born, as everyone knows, in Bread Street, Cheapside, but the house is gone, and even its site can no longer be identified. The St. Paul's School of his day, where he studied the "new learning," was burnt down in the Great Fire of 1696. The lodgings in St. Bride's Churchyard and the house where he took pupils in Aldersgate Street have also disappeared, and those he occupied in Whitehall and near St. James's Park have been swept away, the site of the latter being now occupied by the green lawn of Queen Anne's Mansions; the Old Vicarage at Stowmarket, where he used to visit his friend Dr. Thomas Young, has been improved off the face of the earth; and the three houses in which his brother Christopher lived at Ipswich, and received the poet as his guest, are unknown, though it is possible that one of them was a quaint old house near St. Clement's Church, in which to this day the front door opens into a long passage, which runs down to an octagonal space occupied by the staircase and a gallery, while behind there is quite a lovely old garden.

He also lived in Barbican, Holborn, and Red Lion Square, and at the Restoration he concealed himself in an old edifice in Bartholomew Close, till an Act of Oblivion was passed which secured his person and property. After this, he moved to Jewin Street, and finally took up his abode in Artillery Walk, Bunhill Fields, where he died. All have vanished before the besom of change, but the small cottage to which he retired from Jewin Street still stands at one end of the Chalfont street, and in honour to his memory this has recently been bought for a committee got together for the purpose by Mr. Gurney, for the small sum of £150, though that, considering the present value of houses and land in the neighbourhood, is quite as much as it is worth. An enterprising American offered £900 for it, and proposed carrying away every brick, stone, and rafter, and setting them up again on the other side of the Atlantic. So, at least, the story goes.

Buckinghamshire was by no means fresh ground to John Milton, for his parents had lived at Horton, on the little river Colne, not very far from Stoke

Pogis, where his mother's tomb in St. Michael's parish church is still pointed out; and while at home, after he left Cambridge, he wrote "Comus" and "Arcades" for the grandchildren of the Countess of Derby, who lived at Harefield, in Middlesex, some ten or twelve miles across country from Horton. His interest in that beautiful county of hills and dales and clustering beech-woods was probably quickened considerably when, after blindness fell upon him, he required someone to read aloud to him, and was advised by his friend Dr. Paget, on the recommendation of Isaac Pennington, of Chalfont Grange, to try that gentleman's protégé, Thomas Ellwood, a well-known Quaker, who came originally from Crowell, in Oxfordshire, and had spent the greater part of his life in South Bucks. His own account of his readings with the poet is rather interesting, as given in his "History," a volume that is now somewhat rare:—

"He received me courteously, as well for the sake of Dr. Paget, who introduced me, as of Isaac Pennington, who recommended me, to both of whom he bore a good respect. And having inquired divers things of me, with respect to my former progression in learning, he dismissed me, to provide myself such accommodations as might be most suitable to my future studies. I went, therefore, and took myself a lodging as near to his house—which was then in Jewin Street—as conveniently I could; and from thenceforward went every day in the afternoon, except on the first-days in the week; and sitting by him in his dining-room, read to him in such books in the Latin tongue as he pleased to hear me read. At my first sitting to read to him, observing that I used the English pronunciation, he told me if I would have the benefit of the Latin tongue, not only to read and understand Latin authors, but to converse with foreigners, either abroad or at home, I must learn the foreign pronunciation. To this I consenting, he instructed me how to sound the vowels, so different from the common pronunciation used by the English, who speak Anglice their Latin, that (with some few other variations in sounding some consonants in particular cases, as e before e or i, like ch; ae before i, like sh, etc.) the Latin thus spoken seemed as different from that which was delivered as the English generally speak it, as if it were another language. . . . This change of pronunciation proved a new difficulty to me. It was now harder to me to read than it was before to understand when read. But "Incessant pains

The end obtains," and so did I. Which made my reading the more acceptable to my master. He, on the other hand, perceiving with what earnest desire I pursued learning, gave me not only all the encouragement, but all the help he could. For having a curious ear, he understood by my tone when I understood what I read and when I did not; and accordingly would stop me, examine me, and open the most difficult passages to me.

"Thus went I on for about six weeks' time; reading to him in the afternoons, and exercising myself with my own books in my chamber in the forenoons, I was sensible of an improvement. But, alas! I had fixed my studies in a wrong place. London and I could never agree for health; my lungs, I suppose, were too tender to bear the sulphurous air of that city, so that I soon began to droop; and in less than two months' time I was fain to leave both my studies and the city, summer Milton wrote and desired him to take a house in that neighbourhood, "that he might go out of the city, for the safety of himself and his family, the pestilence then growing hot in London." The cottage and return into the country to preserve life; and much ado I had to get thither."

Ellwood went down to High Wycombe, and stayed there for some time. When he recovered he returned to Milton, and began reading and studying again, but was speedily arrested on pretence of being concerned in one of the many plots of the day, and imprisoned for several weeks. On being released, he walked down to Chalfont, where Isaac Pennington asked him to remain as tutor to his children; and during the ensuing Ellwood took was about a mile from the Grange, and he called it a "pretty box." The end of it is now in the village street; but it seems probable that there was then either a bit more garden ground or a grass plot on that side, with a tiny arch, under which flowed a streamlet tributary to the river Misbourn, which runs up the valley from Missenden. Ellwood hoped to help his blind friend and master in settling into the cottage, but going with Pennington to the funeral of a Quaker at Amersham, there was a fracas with the justices, and they were both confined in Aylesbury gaol for a month. As soon as he was once more free he called to welcome the blind poet to the country, and renew the pleasant intercourse he had so much enjoyed in London.

"After some common discourses had passed between us," says Ellwood, "he called for a manuscript of his; which being brought, he delivered it to me, bidding me take it home and read it at my leisure; and when I had so done, return him, with my judgment thereupon.

"When I came home and had set myself to read it, I found it was that excellent poem which is entitled 'Paradise Lost.' After I had, with the best attention, read it through, I made him another visit, and returned him his book, with due acknowledgment of the favour he had done me in communicating it to me. He asked me how I liked it, and what I thought of it, which I modestly, but freely, told him, and after some further discourse about it, I pleasantly said to him 'Thou hast said much here of "Paradise Lost," but what hast thou to say about "Paradise Found?"' He made me no answer, but sat some time in a muse, then broke off that discourse and fell upon another subject. After the sickness was over, and the city, well cleansed, had become safely habitable again, he returned thither, and when afterwards I went to wait on him there, which I seldom failed doing whenever my occasions drew me to London, he showed me his second poem, called 'Paradise Regained,' and in a pleasant tone said to me, 'This is owing to you, for you put it into my head by the question you put to me at Chalfont, which before I had not thought of.'

It is probable that during Milton's stay in Chalfont his family consisted of his third wife, Elizabeth Minshull, and his daughter Deborah, the one who acted as her father's amanuensis. Whether the other two daughters, Mary and Anne, were there is uncertain; they did not get on well with their stepmother, and left home to learn the art of embroidery in tinsel or gold and silver, so as to be able to earn their own living.

Our illustration shows Milton's cottage precisely as it now stands, and is taken from the garden front. The well is at least as old as the dwelling, and the borders were very gay during the latter part of last summer with sunflowers and asters of every hue. The room on the right of the doorway, low-ceilinged and oak-raftered, and not very brilliantly lighted by the casement window, is supposed to be the one in which the poet wrote "Paradise Regained," and added the finishing touches to "Paradise Lost." It is thought that an open cupboard and the chimney-piece may be the originals, and the committee think of taking out the modern stove, and replacing it by a hearth and dogs of the seventeenth century. They would also like to make it a little museum of Milton portraits and relics, if they had the funds. A curious old "Flora," by John Rea, published in 1665, with Milton's name in it, has been presented, and it is a great pity that they had not the opportunity of securing the Bible used by him and his wife, and annotated by his own hand, which, only a few months since, became one of the treasures of the British Museum.

After Milton's time a porch was built over the cottage door, but it dropped to pieces from sheer old age some years ago. When William Howitt paid a visit to Chalfont the front was covered with a vine, which partially hid the old coat-of-arms of the Fleetwood family, who owned a residence and estate called the Vache, and whose property the cottage may have been in the first instance. The name of John Milton underneath it was probably added by some later hand. What is now a second cottage facing the street was doubtless part of Milton's abode in his day, and behind there is a brick wall, which bears unmistakable signs of age. Both dwellings are now white-washed outside, but that is a modern innovation, as they were originally red brick, with cross timbers.

The church in which Milton may, perhaps, have worshipped, unless he went with the Penningtons over to Jordans, or three miles down the turnpike road to the meeting-house at Amersham, is extremely ancient, dedicated to St. Giles, and has the remains of some curious frescoes on its massive walls. The font is Saxon, and on a closed door are fixed six old pikes, discovered in the ringing-chamber of the tower.

The principal inn in the village is called the "Merlin's Cave." It is said that from time immemorial there was a cave in the orchard behind it, and as John Milton is known to have been particularly conversant with the works of Geoffrey of Monmouth, who is the authority for the little we know about that Celtic prophet and seer, it has been conjectured that he might have applied that name to the cave.

No railway touches Chalfont St. Giles, but it is within an easy drive of Uxbridge, and about the same distance from Rickmansworth. The country round, with its miles of beech-wood, its clumps and avenues of lime-trees, and its general old-world air, is as peaceful as if it were a couple of hundred miles from London. There are many picturesque "bits" within half an hour's walk of the village, and the region is so rich in wild flowers that we can imagine the poet buying eagerly the very latest "Flora" that had issued from the press as soon as he found himself on the eve of spending a few months in it.

BABY'S FIRST SPRING.

WHAT do you think of the spring-flowers that waken,
 Little white snowdrop, late drifted to earth?
 Meadows the bands of the winter have shaken—
 Now shall you pass where the violets have birth.

What will they whisper, 'mid grasses entwining,
 Mother's own blossom, so softly to you?
 Wondrous and strange are the beams that are shining
 Golden and bright from the cloudlets of blue.

All things are fair and a marvel of glory
 Unto my baby, with heaven-sweet face;
 Sunbeams and flowerets are weaving a story
 Full of enchantment and beauty and grace.

Ah! when at last sunny spring shall be fading,
 When, in the gloaming, earth's visions shall cease,
 Then, gentle Jesus! be tenderly aiding—Stretch forth Thine arms—be Thou Sunlight and Peace.

NOT LOST; OR, THE RESURRECTION AND THE BETTER LIFE.

BY THE REV. TRYON EDWARDS, D.D.

YEARS ago, I met with a beautiful German apologue, bearing on the resurrection and the future life, so suggestive, and so full of instruction and interest, that I have often searched for it, but in vain, and finally have thought I would try to reproduce it, in outline at least, though it may be but imperfectly, as it is only from memory.

We have all seen the Dragon Fly, with its long slender body and its silvery gauze-like wings. There are many varieties of them, comprising an extensive and beautiful group of insects, rivalling the butterflies in gracefulness of form and beauty of colouring, while they greatly surpass them in the swiftness of their flight. Various names have been given them in different countries. The French call them "Démouelles"; the Germans, "Gauze Flies," and "Virgins of the Water"; while among the English they are known as "Dragon Flies," "Horse Stingers," and "Devil's Darning Needles," though they neither sting, nor bite, nor poison, and are not only perfectly harmless to man, but devour swarms of mosquitoes, flies, gnats, and other annoying and baneful insects, and also destroy multitudes of the moths and millers whose larvæ are injurious to vegetation, while they themselves never injure any product of the agriculturist.

This beautiful insect may often be noticed flitting over the surface of the pool or the shallow lake, and at last fixing on some one spot, where it will remain for minutes together as if immovable, its wings moving so swiftly as to be utterly invisible, or looking rather like stationary iridescent membranes, giving a beautiful metallic reflection, while its body seems like a permanent fixture in the air itself.

Now this Dragon Fly deposits its eggs on the stems of the reeds and rushes and water-grasses below the surface of the water. And when the larvæ are hatched out, they are for a while only water-insects, living and feeding in the dark waters of their birth, till, in the progress of their growth, they are in due time prompted by instinct to crawl up the water plants to the air, and then their backs open, as is the case with the larvæ of the locust, and the beautiful Dragon Fly comes forth to a new element, and a new and higher life. Tennyson, in his "Two Voices," well describes these changes:—

"To-day I saw the Dragon Fly
Come from the depths where he did lie.
An inner impulse rent the veil
Of his old husk: from head to tail
Came out clear plates of sapphire mail.
He dried his wings: like gauze they grew:
Through crofts and pastures wet with dew
A living flash of light he flew!"

Now, the apologue referred to says that all these imperfect insects, down in their watery habitations, had, floating among themselves, the tradition of a brighter and better world above them; and as one after another of their number, from time to time, crawled up the rushes and disappeared, it was said they had gone to a new and higher life in a brighter and better world. Many of them, however, were doubtful on the subject, and some few denied and even scouted the idea altogether. They said they were entirely satisfied where they were; that all their wants were continually supplied; and that they doubted very much whether there was a better world, and whether their departed companions could have gone to it. One, especially, was loud in his denial, for he said that, to test the matter for himself, he had crawled up the rushes (as he had, before the proper time), and that the moment he got above the water, and came to the air, he had fainted, and fallen back to his native element, and so he was ready to declare, from his own experience, that all these notions as to a brighter and better world were but idle dreams and fables.

Still the old rumour continued, and was generally believed, for one after another of their number was now and then crawling up the rushes and disappearing, and coming back to them no more. So, finally, they all agreed among themselves that the first one, and so all that went up, should, if possible, come back and tell them whether the rumour was true or false, and whether the brighter and better world was a reality, or only a fable and a dream.

And so, says the apologue, the Dragon Flies, as they remember their pledge and promise, are for ever flying over the surface of the water, close to the old haunts they have left, hoping to be able to hold converse with their former companions, and to tell them of the blessed realities which they, in their own experience, have found—to tell them that there is a brighter and better world, and, if possible, to hasten their old associates and friends to come and share it with themselves.

The apologue is one of exquisite beauty, and full of suggestive thought. Does it not prefigure the reality of the resurrection, and of the glorified body of the believer, as taught in God's Word? Does it not vividly suggest the certainty of a brighter and better state beyond the present, on which we may soon enter as we pass from this, if we are but faithful to the end? Does it not whisper that our departed friends may often be near us, and that, if they could, they would gladly tell us of their own blessed experience in the glorious world on which they have entered? And, if possible, would they not speak in audible accents, and urge us to be expecting and preparing for that world, that we may soon join them in its blessedness! How many a cheering thought, how many a valuable lesson, how many a confirmation of revealed truth, may be found in an apologue like this! Too often, says another, "we think of the close of our life here as ending; we should rather think of it as beginning, and that more abundantly. We think of losing; let us rather think of gaining. We think of parting; let us rather think of meeting. We think of going away; let us rather think of arriving." We think of leaving, at death, the attractions of earth; let us rather think of the glories and blessedness of that better world, where all that love and serve Christ shall be gathered to the mansions He has gone to prepare for them in heaven!

NOT ALL IN VAIN.

CHAPTER XV.

HAWTHORNE WHYTE SEEKS A COMPANION SOUL.

"Of all thieves, fools are the worst; they rob you of time and temper."
GOETHE.

THE disappearance of Stephen Wray made very little apparent difference to anyone. His friends and acquaintances commented on it a little at first, languidly wondered where he had gone, and why, and at the end of a month or so forgot what manner of man he was. The very saintliest is not missed for long. Some of us can hardly picture to ourselves how our small world would go on, deprived of the light of our presence! We feel inclined to shudder at the desolation our absence must spread around. And yet, did we go to-day or to-morrow, a year hence if we could return, the place that had known us would know us no more.

The domestic life of the Wray family was much as it had ever been—a constant succession of petty bickerings and dissensions. Annette and her husband had been living in the south of France for some time past, and Miss Wray was left alone to carry on the warfare single-handed. Mrs. Wray mourned, as of old, over a penny too much in the weekly account of baker or of butcher, apparently never sending a thought to the absent son, who, for aught she knew to the contrary, had neither bread nor meat to put in his mouth. Louise continued on her way tranquilly. It would do Stephen a lot of good to rough it a little. When he had run through all his money he would be certain to return. Meanwhile, there was no use in her fretting about him, or wondering where he had hidden himself, since he had not chosen to tell. She planned new costumes for every ecclesiastical season and function, bringing the art of making dress a matter of religion, and vice versa, to very high perfection. When home got unbearable, she escaped to the south of France, and stayed awhile with the Frasers.

Mr. Wray was, if possible, more severely unapproachable than ever since Stephen went away. He rose up early and late took rest in his pursuit of money. It seemed to make no difference to him that he no longer had a son to whom to bequeath his wealth. In his family he was gloomy and taciturn. No one ever mentioned Stephen. He was ignored as completely as though he had never had a visible existence—only the servants, now and again, whispered among themselves, longing for his return, and missing his bright, handsome presence, and courteous, winning ways.

His name never crossed Mary Owens' lips either. Mr. Davenant came out from the East End whenever a letter from Stephen arrived. He had his own private suspicions as to the relations between Mary and Stephen. Like all unmarried people, he liked to see other people marry. But he respected Mary's silence.

Mrs. Clare, too, still continued to weave the plot of her romance. She had now come to the conclusion that the lovers had quarrelled, and that Stephen had gone away in a rage. And when she saw Miss Owens' pale face and heavy eyes after one of Stephen's infrequent letters arrived, she wished he would come back and "make up friends." She sometimes pondered if it would be justifiable in her to recall the recreant youth herself.

Not so much as a postmark was there on Stephen's letters to guide Mary as to his whereabouts. Mr. Davenant, of course, could have told her, but she would not ask. His letters, though kind and affectionate, were short and infrequent. The tone of them proclaimed them the letters of a man disappointed, and for whom life holds little, if any, interest. Naturally he gave no details of his outer daily existence and surroundings, and of himself he never spoke. So the letters, on the whole, were rather flat and uninteresting—scarce worth the postage, he said himself. But she who received them loved and treasured them—every word and line. Dearer to her than pearls of the ocean or gold from the mine were they, as they lay treasured in the cedar-wood casket, to be read and re-read lovingly.

The relations between Mary and the Portman Square people had become very strained. They refused to believe her when she professed ignorance of Stephen's place of refuge, and the young woman had of family matters might thus be rendered impossible, in her house at least.

One evening, somewhere about two years after Stephen's departure into unknown space, one of these

"You hear from him?"—p. 357.

a vein of pride in her character which made it intensely difficult to her to pardon doubt being cast upon her word. Besides, she could not forgive their injustice to Stephen, and their callous indifference about his absence. So the intercourse between them had narrowed to an occasional formal dinner-party on either side, Mary always taking good care to invite other guests to meet the Wrays, so that any discussion lifeless entertainments was taking place, Mary being the hostess on the occasion.

After the long dinner had dragged its slow length along, and the guests had returned to the drawing-room, the Rev. Hawthorne Whyte was announced, much to Mary's joy, she having specially invited him, for the benefit of Miss Wray.

Mary was engaged in conversation with an elderly officer when he appeared; the elderly officer's daughter was at the piano, playing an intricate piece by Chopin; Mrs. Wray was conversing more or less amicably with Mrs. Clare; the hearthrug was occupied by Mr. Wray, in pompous converse with an important-looking personage with a bald head and flashing diamond studs; and Miss Wray was endeavouring to stifle her yawns behind her fan; while a cadaverous youth of nineteen—the elderly officer's son and heir—did his very limited best to please and entertain the young lady.

Mr. Whyte was as faultlessly attired as usual, dressed to within an inch of his existence, with a white flower in his evening coat. He entered the room in his usual deprecating style, as though craving pardon of the company for intruding.

He made his salutations to his hostess; then, as she continued her animated conversation with General Fleming, he looked about him for refuge.

Louise flashed him a look of invitation over the top of her fan, which he affected not to see. He had not come to this house just to be chained to her side for the evening, paying her compliments, and talking vapid nonsense upon "Church" matters they both knew next to nothing about.

He liked very young girls; they were apt to be impressed by his dark eyes, and gentle, melancholy manner. So he steered straight for the piano.

Louise inwardly wondered what he could see in that gawky girl, raw from the school-room, and dressed in the worst possible taste. When the piece was over he rapturously complimented the player, and sat down beside her, to breathe soft nothings in her ear. But it was impossible to get altogether out of range of Miss Wray's inviting smile and telling eyes. He knew he must go and speak to her sooner or later, and when Miss Fleming was asked to play again, he began to make his way across the room to where Miss Wray was sitting.

But there was a slip between the cup and the lip. Half-way to Louise he saw the seat beside Mary Owens for the moment vacant, and, seizing the opportunity, slipped into it, and entered into conversation with his hostess.

Mary was looking very well this evening. She wore a dress golden brown in hue, and silken soft in texture, with rich lace softly massed about her throat and arms.

Mr. Whyte looked at her sentimentally over the top of his stiff collar. He seemed nervous this evening, and his white face, in its setting of black hair, looked whiter than ever.

"I am so unfortunate, Miss Owens," he began, and stopped.

"Are you? I am so sorry," she replied briskly. "In what respect, Mr. Whyte?"

"With regard to seeing you, Miss Owens. You are always out when I call, and I do not care to come on your 'at-home' day."

"That implies you do not care to see me," she said, smiling at him, without a touch of coquetry in voice or manner.

"That is cruel," he said, glancing at her reproachfully. Mary laughed.

"I want so often to speak to you," he went on plaintively; "and I cannot do that when you are surrounded by others."

Miss Owens drew herself up somewhat haughtily. She could look haughty when she liked, and she did now.

"You cannot have anything to say to me," she said—and her voice was icy—"that may not be said in the presence of my friends."

"That only shows how far you are from understanding me," he said.

Mary thought she would not care how much farther she was from understanding him. He continued, in a lachrymose style, bending towards her—

"So few people really understand me, Miss Owens. I often feel, if only I were differently situated, I might be quite otherwise from what I am."

"Don't you think that might be said of most of us?" Mary asked briskly. She was not going to foster sentimentality in this silly young man.

"Perhaps so, but very specially of me. There is no one who really understands me. I feel the world so cold, so forbidding at times. I long for some friend responsive to me, to whom my nature might unfold itself; but such an one I do not find. People who know me, little dream how hollow and empty my heart is."

Mary did not feel called upon to reply, so she remained silent, awaiting further developments of the situation.

"I have sometimes thought," he continued, taking his courage in both hands, and making a bold plunge, "that you possessed the requisite capabilities of making a real friend. There is a height and breadth in your nature, Miss Owens, far removed from the petty trivialities of ordinary feminine nature. You are formed to be the companion and helpmeet of a man, to share in his aspirations, to understand his thoughts, to glean by his side in the domain of learning: in a word, to mount upward with him, not to drag him down to the dead level of narrow womanish ideas, as too many women do the men they associate with."

"You are extremely flattering, Mr. Whyte," Mary replied, in a tone which meant he was extremely insolent. "But do you—"

"Permit me to interrupt you," he said eagerly. "I had not finished what I was about to say."

"Perhaps it would be better to leave it unfinished," Mary said coldly. She had had too many similar experiences in her life not to know pretty well what was coming. It was for Louise Wray's sake, too, she had invited him to her house, so that to have him outpouring nonsense of this description was all the more annoying. "I am not in the very least the kind of person you describe. There is nothing in the least large or lofty about me. Suppose we talk of other things? or shall I introduce you to anyone?"

Mr. Whyte looked rather sulky.

"Please do not dismiss me just yet," he said. "I want to ask you about Stephen Wray. Where is he?"

The red blood rushed to Mary's face at this sudden mention of the man she loved. She opened her eyes wide in surprise as she turned to Mr. Whyte.

"You are acquainted with his father and mother and sister," she replied icily. "Had you not better ask them that question?"

"They do not know."

"And they commissioned you to find out from me?" Miss Owens said quietly, hitting the truth by hazard. It was now Mr. Whyte's turn to look awkward and confused.

"Miss Wray told me you are engaged to her brother," he stammered. "Are you?"

Miss Owens became pale. For a moment she looked at him, her eyes dark with anger. Then scorn of him coming uppermost, she conquered the rising wrath, and replied calmly—

"Miss Wray made a mistake, or you misunderstood her, Mr. Whyte."

"I did not misunderstand her," he replied eagerly.

"The subject was of far too vivid interest to me for it to be in the least likely I should misunderstand her. She told me in so many words that you and Stephen Wray were engaged—and naturally, I thought then that you knew where he is."

"It is kind of you to take an interest so deep in Mr. Stephen Wray," she said.

The young man accepted the amendment.

"I do not take the least interest in Mr. Stephen Wray," he replied. "It is because of my interest in you that I want to know anything of him. You are rather hard on me, Miss Owens. You seem to forget that I may have other than an idle, gossiping interest in Mr. Wray. You are proud and angry with me because I put to you questions which you consider impertinent. You do not choose to remember that I may have something at stake in the matter."

This first cropping-up of manliness and real feeling through the surface crust of conceit and imbecility which overlaid the Rev. Hawthorne Whyte's character, touched Mary a little. Something also in the ring of his voice made her a little regretful of having crushed and snubbed him so remorselessly all the evening.

"I am sorry if I have been rude," she said, more gently. "But you unfortunately chose a subject of conversation that is especially distasteful to me."

"Then I shall leave it. What I really wanted to say to you was not about the Wrays at all. I have been long seriously contemplating a matter of great importance to myself—one on which, if I dare ask it, I should venture to crave your advice, Miss Owens."

Mary graciously signified her willingness to listen, believing he had got the barque of conversation at length off the quicksands.

"The celibacy of the clergy of the Anglican Church"—Mary started visibly: was there going to be a shipwreck after all?—"has been a subject that has long exercised my thoughts. At first I believed thoroughly in its being the correct thing. But of late I find that after all we are but men, like others, and that it is not good for a man to be alone. I need a companion soul, a sympathising friend, as much as any other man. I have human sympathies and longings, even though I wear a black coat. There is a heart beating beneath. I cannot stand aloof from all the rightful joys and pleasures of human life, just because my profession follows loftier lines and ideals than the professions and callings of other men. Now I ask your opinion on this momentous question."

"I think a man should marry if he wants to," Mary replied promptly, a gleam of amusement in her eyes.

"Whether he is in orders or not?" said Mr. Whyte.

"Yes, certainly. I don't see that that makes any difference," she said, laughing. It was impossible to avoid laughing: he looked so important and so lugubrious.

"Then you counsel me to marry?" he said.

"Oh, I did not understand it was personal advice you asked me for," said Mary Owens. "I thought you only wanted my opinion generally on the question of clerical celibacy."

"I fear I only view the question in a personal light," he admitted. "I had certainly made up my mind to celibacy before I met with one who, I felt, might become to me the companion I needed in my lonely life. Shall I now, for a mere abstract tenet, render my life unhappy?"

"I should certainly advise you not to," Mary replied carelessly.

"Then, Miss Owens, you encourage me to speak. In you, then, I have found this other self. Do not proudly turn away from me. I know it is presumptuous in me to lift my eyes to one so wealthy as you; but in the eyes of love, what is gold but dross? A minor consideration—not worthy to be taken into account."

"You are talking the greatest nonsense man ever uttered!" Mary interrupted, impatiently. "Excuse me if I am rude; but I cannot help it."

Mr. Whyte's black eyes flashed an instant, but he lowered them, and resumed his ordinary mild deportment ere he spoke again.

"I never knew that it was nonsense to express love and admiration of another," he said deprecatingly.

"For you to express love and admiration of me is utter nonsense. And I beg you will never do so again," said Mary. She felt too angry to speak with a dignity suited to the occasion of discarding a suitor for her hand.

Mr. Whyte plainly perceived there was no use in pressing the matter. He accepted his quietus in the most decorous manner he could, and shortly afterwards took his leave.

A week later his engagement with Louise Wray was announced. Mary smiled to think he had so quickly found a second companion soul. Louise had not so much "dross" as Miss Owens could have endowed him with, but then perhaps she was of a more sympathetic nature. Mary met him one day

"'Mary,' he said suddenly, 'why is it that you have never married?'"—p. 360.

shortly afterwards at Charing Cross, where she had driven to say farewell to Louise, who was going to join the Frasers abroad, and spend Easter with them in Rome. He looked rather awkward, but Mary shook hands with him, and congratulated him in a frank, pleasant way that set him at ease.

"Don't go over to Rome literally," he remarked playfully to his beloved, as she sat in the corner seat of a first-class carriage, while Miss Owens and he waited on the platform to see her off. Mary thought the warning perhaps not inappropriate, seeing he had been of late almost a sign-post to show the way thither. "Remember, ours is 'the more excellent way.' Don't you agree with me, Miss Owens?"

"I don't know," Mary replied gently. She could not exactly see the connection between his quotation and any special form of Church government. "Sometimes I have felt puzzled over the ways: they are so varied and so different. But I asked Mr. Davenent, and he said that he thinks though men compose many ways to God, God has only the one Way to Himself, and none of us are too ignorant or too wicked to learn to follow that."

Mr. Whyte pricked up his ears at this heresy, and would apparently have liked to rush into a polemical argument, regardless of time and place; but when Mary Owens quoted Mr. Davenent it was final, so he held his peace.

CHAPTER XVI.

WORLDLINESS.

"Never rail at the world—it is just as we make it."—SWAIN.

LOUISE WRAY did not go over to Rome in the sense Mr. Whyte warned her against doing. She spent Easter there, rushing from function to function, and in the interim writing glowing descriptions of the splendour of the outward trappings of gorgeous ceremonials, at which she assisted, to her betrothed in England. Then, in early summer, she returned, and shortly after married the youthful clergyman. Her father shrugged his shoulders when the question was broached to him; said he supposed she was old enough to know her own mind and please herself; said he would just give her the portion that fell to her, and if she liked to throw it and herself away on a penniless parson, that was her affair; said the only one of his children who had not thwarted and disappointed him was Annette, and that he meant to remember her in his will, over and above the fortune already given her on her marriage. Annette had married a broken-down old roué, with one foot in the grave; but he was a wealthy man, while Hawthorne Whyte had nothing. However, Louise Wray was not a young lady to pine away for want of parental approbation and consent. She had long since come to the age—so she confided to her sister—when she must marry anyone that offered. Hawthorne Whyte offered, and she joyfully accepted him.

It was a gorgeous wedding. Most of the society papers devoted at least half a column to a description of its glories, the wedding-dress and trousseau, the guests and high dignitaries of the Church who assisted; the bridegroom, as was most justly fit, apparently being the most insignificant item in the whole affair. The wedding-gown was of white velvet and Brussels lace, with real orange-flowers and costly jewels. There were six bridesmaids in pale pink silk, and two Vandyck pages in royal blue satin to carry the bride's train. None of the papers were cruel enough to hint that the bride was years older than the bridegroom, and looked every hour of her age. The travelling attire was fittingly described, and the destination for the wedding tour indicated; and then followed a long list of the wedding gifts and donors. So Louise was satisfied, at least. Her ambition was crowned. She was married, and had had one of the smartest weddings of the season.

One morning, some weeks after Mr. and Mrs. Hawthorne Whyte had returned to town from their bridal tour, Mary Owens was informed that Mrs. Wray was down-stairs in the drawing-room, and desired particularly to see her. It was very early in the morning—about nine o'clock—and Mary ran down-stairs in her dressing-gown, fearing some ill news of Stephen—though she might have known that in that case his mother would be the last person in the world to trouble herself, or put herself about. Mrs. Wray was seated on the edge of a chair in the middle of the room, with her eyes on the carpet, looking more cheerlessly mortified than usual. She looked up when Mary entered the room, and accorded the heiress a brief greeting.

"I want my son's address," she said curtly, as Mary sat down near her.

"I do not know it, Mrs. Wray," said Mary, with a heightened colour. "I have told you that very often. If you desire to communicate with Stephen, you need not apply to me."

"My husband is ill," said Mrs. Wray, in the same hard, even tone, "and I want my son's address."

"Oh! I am sorry," said Mary, quickly contrite for having spoken harshly to anyone in affliction. "What is the matter with Mr. Wray?"

"He is dying," the wife replied, with a fortitude really admirable under the circumstances. "Like me, poor man, he has been the victim of the basest ingratitude. He got a fit last night, and the doctor says he cannot recover. Unless Stephen will do his duty, and return to the home which he abandoned so heartlessly, I do not know what is to become of the business. The girls have secured their money at their marriages, but my jointure is payable out of the business yearly; and Stephen owes it to the mother who bore him, and toiled for him through many years, to come home at once."

"I think he would come if you asked him," said Mary, trying to veil her disgust.

"I cannot ask him when he hides from me where he is. Such abandoned ingratitude! A thankless son is as the poison of asps to his mother's heart." Mrs. Wray was great at inventing proverbs. "You, a stranger, know more about him than his kith and kin."

"I am afraid his kith and kin have, up to this, taken very little interest in him, Mrs. Wray," said Mary, somewhat unsteadily.

"Doubtless you encourage him in his wicked career of disobedience. The froward man never lacketh evil counsellors. Your influence has always been to separate him from his home and his family—for many years you have come between him and us. It is not much now that I ask you—to tell me where he is, so that I may make one more appeal to him to return to the paths of filial duty."

"I have told you I cannot give you Stephen's address, because I do not know it myself," replied Miss Owens haughtily.

"You hear from him?"

"Yes."

"I knew it! And still you persist in denying all knowledge of where my son has hidden himself."

"I do not know," Mary replied, making a strong effort to control her temper; for, after all, this hard-faced, stony-hearted woman was Stephen's mother. "My letters from him come under cover to Mr. Davenant."

"Mr. Davenant!" cried Mrs. Wray, with a small stage shriek, and throwing up her hands. "This is nice work! A clergyman acting as a go-between!"

"There is no need of a go-between, as you put it," said Miss Owens coldly. "Stephen did not give me his address, simply because he did not choose that I should be annoyed by questions about it."

"How sweetly considerate of your comfort!" Mrs.

Wray retorted bitterly. "A little of this remarkable amiability and thoughtfulness shown in his own home would have been more fitting. I wonder Mr. Davenent would not be ashamed to foster and encourage a young man in his pride of heart and disobedience. I do not know what the world is coming to. Look at my children, how worldly they are! Look at Annette marrying for money, and fawning on her poor father so that she might gain more at his death. Look at Louise—she did not marry money, to be sure, but she drove the hardest bargain she could with my husband, and took her fortune, every penny of it, with her, out of the concern where it was made. Look at Stephen quarrelling with his father about money."

"I do not think Stephen's quarrel with Mr. Wray argues intense worldliness on his part," Mary interposed coldly.

"I don't know what the quarrel was about," said Mrs. Wray. "I never was told by either of them, and I never asked. It appears, as usual, Miss Owens, that you are more intimate with my son's affairs than I am."

"Stephen left his father in anger," Mary replied, speaking very distinctly and calmly, "because Mr. Wray wished to force him into a marriage with a rich woman he did not love."

"You mean yourself," said Mrs. Wray quickly, looking at the girl's quiet, set face with cold, narrowing eyes. "I wonder you are not too proud, after that, to take his part openly, as you do."

"That is a point of view which concerns no one but myself," replied the heiress haughtily. "But I think Stephen's unworldliness has been proved by the part he has acted. I think that if he knew his father was ill, and that you wished his return, he would come back."

"Will you write and ask him?"

"No," Miss Owens said quietly. "His father sent him away. It is for his father to ask him to return."

"His father will never speak a word on earth again. His father does not want him back. He vowed he would never forgive him, and he does not ever go back from his word. I should not think his father wants him back. But I do. I am only a poor old woman, forsaken of those who should have been my earthly prop and stay, and I want him to return, and carry on his father's business."

This was not worldliness at all, of course.

"If his father has disinherited him, I do not see how that will be possible for Stephen to do."

"Who told you his father would disinherit him?"

"Stephen told me."

"He never told me that," said Mrs. Wray, in injured tones. "If that is the case, I do not know what will become of me. Where is my money to come from?"

"I suppose Mr. Wray has made all due provision for you," Mary said coldly. "But do you not think this is very profitless conversation on our part? If you would like to return to your husband's sick-room, I have no objection—if you wish—to drive to the City at once, and procure your son's address from Mr.

Davenent. I should think, under these circumstances, he will not refuse to give it."

"And do you mean to tell me you have never asked Mr. Davenent to tell it to you before now?"

"If Stephen had wished me to know, he would have told it me himself," replied Mary, ringing to order her carriage. Mrs. Wray laughed scornfully.

"When you get the address, will you write for him to come home at once?" she demanded, as she rose to go.

"No," said Mary. "I shall bring the address to you. You or Mrs. Whyte can write to recall him, if his father is unable to do so. I certainly cannot."

When she returned from the East End with Stephen's address—he was in Australia, she discovered, so there was absolutely no probability of his ever seeing his father again—the blinds were drawn in the big house at Portman Square, and crape adorned the knocker. "Vanity of vanities; all is vanity, saith the preacher."

CHAPTER XVII.

WESTMINSTER CLOISTERS.

"Life hath a load
Which must be carried on; let the heart
Be God's alone, and choose the better part."

VAUGHAN.

A LONDON sky is sometimes bright and blue, and London streets are sometimes filled with sunshine. This afternoon in early May the very air was full of fresh vitality and hopefulness. The people in the streets looked happier as they pursued their way, and the sunshine was everywhere, clothing the grey old abbey walls, and lying softly on the smooth green cloister-girt sward. Within the cloister the shade was deep and calm, and along its stillness rolled the organ's hum in rising and ebbing waves of sound; and laughter of schoolboys at play came faintly from the distance now and again. Otherwise, the cloisters were silent with the silence of death. A woman sat alone in one of the stone embrasures, looking upwards to where the abbey outlined itself against the blue summer sky. There was something very solitary about this motionless figure in the silent cloisters; something pathetic in the attitude, and the pose of the hands lightly crossed upon her lap. There is surely no expression upon the human face so sad to see as disappointment, and disappointment was in every line and lineament of this woman's face. If it is only the momentary clouding of some bright child-face at some transient sorrow, one knows that that will pass away; but infinitely sad is it when it is the settled, uncomplaining, accepted expression on a middle-aged face. There is a rush of pity to the heart when one meets one of these disappointed faces: something inexpressibly touching to note in the weariness of the mouth beneath the placid smile, the withering features unlit by hope or happiness, the unexpected eyes, which mutely tell the secret that life's chalice is empty, and no fresh fair spring-time any longer possible. The smile on such a face as this is more pathetic than many tears. God, in His mercy, bring these poor unsatisfied ones to the fulness of His Kingdom!

Such a face had Mary Owens, now past thirty years of age—thirty, that most cruel of all ages, when a woman wakes with a gasp to the realisation that she is old, that her youth is a thing gone for ever. At forty she has grown used to this wofully unpleasant conviction, and has perhaps begun to construct a second era of simulated juvenility for herself; but at thirty she is simply crushed by the awfulness of the thing. Not that Mary Owens cared much what age she was. All hope in her life died the day when Stephen Wray confided to her his love for Hilda Romney. Her heart had suddenly grown old then, with but the one small consolation that no one knew her secret. Her dress was as well-chosen and suitable as it had always been. To-day she wore a dark blue dress of fine cloth, and a neat little hat—not in the least dejected or dowdy—with a white wing in it. She did not wear her heart on her sleeve for all to note how empty it was, neither would she proclaim to the world by a carelessness of attire that at thirty years of age life was a simple weariness to her—a weight which must be borne somehow.

A tall, well-built man turned in from the noisy street to the cloisters, and came briskly towards her. She turned slightly, and watched him coming. He carried himself with a certain dignity and manly grace. His face was deeply sun-browned, and he walked with the easy, elastic step of a man who had led a life of out-of-door freedom.

Mary watched him coming, and more than ever it struck her how manly he had become. The gawkiness of the overgrown boy was gone, and the broad-shouldered man, firm, compact, and strong, was in his place. To be sure, Stephen Wray was eight-and-twenty now, and these past years of colonial life had aged and bronzed him.

He greeted her quietly, holding her gloved hand an instant in his broad palm. Then he seated himself near her, and leaned one elbow on the ledge of the embrasure, he too looking across to where the sunshine lay warm on the abbey walls.

"Well, Mary," he said, after a long silence, "you asked me to meet you here to-day, and now that I am here, what have you to say to me?"

"What should I have to say to you, Stephen?" she asked softly.

"That you will be my wife," he replied, bringing his eyes in from the outer sunshine to rest upon her face. There was neither ecstasy nor elated expectancy in his face or voice. The lines about his mouth were steadily sweet, but in his deep eyes there was nothing expressed but sorrowful regret. The life and fire of them had gone, perhaps for ever.

"I had a reason for asking you to meet me here, Stephen," she began, speaking very soft and low. "It may have been a foolish, sentimental reason, but still it was a real one. Somehow or other, it always seems to me that here in this quiet place, among the silent dead, the things which concern this life, and the life which is to come, take on their true proportions. We so often lose sight of what is right, in the fever and fret of the daily life. We so often think only of what we wish to do, instead of what we ought to do, of what we wish to gain instead of what we should renounce. Last night you came to me and asked me to be your wife. And to-day I asked you to meet me here, that I might answer you."

"And you will say 'Yes?'" he asked.

"I shall say 'No,' Stephen."

They were both silent for a long, long time. Stephen absently watched a thrush hopping about in the green, soft grass, while he seemed pondering something deeply in his mind. And Mary turned a little from him—calm suitor that he was—and her eyes went upwards to the graceful outlines of arch and pillar, and she wondered at herself. The dream, the passionate longing of her youth, given to her now, laid at her feet for her to accept or reject—and she had quietly put it from her! She thought, as she gazed on the abbey walls, of those who had planned and built it; they, too, had had human hearts like ours, had laughed and wept, and loved and prayed, and agonised even as we do now, and what was left of them? Not even a handful of dust, not so much as a name. What they were had gone for ever, only what they had done remaining—a mute lesson to each one coming after along the thorny way of the world, since life is labour, to take good heed to work as "wise master-builders"—honest work, that will remain when the hand that wrought it is dust. A vague sense, deep down in her heart, had, of late, been making itself felt more and more as the days went on, and gathered themselves into weeks and months and years—a feeling that it is not to be happy that we live—that it is not to lounge through life we are set upon earth—that for each one there is an allotted task—and that mayhap there are purer joys and higher happinesses than the sweet sanctity of "a love-lit hearth." Perhaps—for she loved him with all her heart—had Stephen come to her with a little more warmth and eagerness in his voice and manner, she had yielded to his request. But now her heart was divided between him and this other life which she had of late been planning for herself.

"I know I do not offer you much, Mary," Stephen said presently, drawing a little nearer to her as he spoke—"not so much as you deserve. But I did not deceive you in any way. I tell you plainly what you know already: that the best love of my heart was given to another. It was foolish of me to hope that you would marry me: But I did hope it. You have been the one true friend I have ever had. You have stood by me when others forsook me. And some way, during this past winter, since I came home, I have come to know you better, and knowing you better, to love you better than I ever did before. I don't know when the thought came to me; but it was not the sudden inspiration you pooh-poohed it as last night, that prompted me to speak. It was the settled conviction that I love you very dearly and well, and a half-hope that since you, like myself, are among the solitary ones on earth, you would take pity on my loneliness. Selfish, as usual, you see, Mary! But, indeed, I would do my very best to make your life bright and happy too."

"It can never be, Stephen. I am too old now to reconstruct my life on a basis of happiness. I have never been happy, all my life. It is too late to begin now. I should be only a drag and a shadow upon your life. You are young."

"We are pretty much the same age," he said, with a short laugh.

"A woman at my age is old. A man at yours is young," said Mary quietly.

"I feel old enough for anything," Stephen said, a little bitterly. "One great advantage is that we know each other thoroughly, and each other's antecedents. There would be no necessity for disillusionments on either side."

Mary did not reply. The low, deep tones of the organ swelled along the cloisters, and the clear treble voices of the choir came to them fitfully. A service had begun, the sunlight was stealing higher and higher up the abbey walls, and the shade in the cloisters lay deeper.

Stephen had been living at home since his father's sudden death last summer. The great house in Portman Square had been given up, and Stephen had taken a small villa for himself and his mother out beyond Regent's Park. When his father's affairs were looked into, it was found that after all he had not left his money to an "asylum for incapable idiots," as he had threatened Stephen he would. Draft after draft of projected wills were found amongst his papers, each one ignoring Stephen steadfastly, but the old will had never been destroyed, and by it Stephen inherited nearly everything his father died possessed of, his sisters' fortunes and his mother's annuity excepted. So, by the irony of things, this was the will that stood. The rest were so much waste paper, and the furious old man had gone to his rest without wreaking the revenge he had so long threatened upon his son.

"When I went away from home, three years ago," he went on, as Mary made no reply, "I did not care what became of me. But your affection followed me even in my exile. I felt, no matter how desolate I was, that you cared what became of me. You wrote to me; you took an unflinching, a sisterly interest in me. Then I came home again, and I have got to know you better, your worth, your goodness, than I ever did before. And it was deliberately, not impulsively, that last night I went to you, and asked you to think if you could not be my wife—if together we might not start afresh. We are old friends; we know each other well; I love you dearly, and that you have some affection for me you have proved by your kindness to me. Why should we not then join our lives together, Mary? I know it is not exactly a path of roses I offer you. Life with my mother never could be that; but after a time she may perhaps go to Annette or Louise, and we should be together and alone. It is not from mercenary motives I ask you, either. I am not the penniless beggar I was when I ran away to Australia. So do not think that of me."

"I do not think it of you, Stephen," said Mary. Her face had grown very pale, as she sat quietly listening to him, and the bright light of the summer afternoon relentlessly showed up the lines and shadows that time and sorrow had left on it. "I do not think anything of you so unworthy, so unkind. I know you are sincere in what you say to me—that you mean it, every word; and that were I to yield to your request, you would be everything that was most faithful and true and tender to me. But I cannot content myself with embers instead of fire, nor with husks for bread. Better that we should remain apart and friends than wed and be unhappy. I should be unhappy, Stephen, for I have a heart, if you have not."

"Mary," he said suddenly, "why is it that you have never married?"

A great wave of colour surged up in her face, and then ebbed again, leaving her cheeks more thin and wan than before. The tears stood in her eyes as she answered him.

"I loved someone, unhappily. He did not care for me," she replied, with hardly a tremble in the low, even voice.

"Dear Mary! I am sorry!" spoke the young man gently, coming nearer to her, and laying his strong brown hand on her gloved one.

"It is no matter now," she said, with a brave, sweet smile; "I have got over it—and nearly forgotten it."

Stephen stood up abruptly, and began pacing up and down the cloister in front of her—just as he had often paced to and fro in her drawing-room in the old days. He was not in the least in love with Mary Owens, but for all that he felt a little nameless jealousy of this unknown rival, whose existence he had never suspected till this moment. Mentally he reviewed the past, endeavouring to recall Mary's friends and acquaintances. Who could it have been?

Mary sat very still, with her face turned away from him. The water that had stood in her eyes when she made her confession had now resolved itself to tears, which slowly trickled down her cheek. She dared not wipe them away, lest Stephen should perceive she was weeping, so she looked steadfastly out over the grass, with eyes that saw nothing of the objects upon which they rested.

"Both of us with spoiled lives," Stephen said musingly. "It seems hard lines that we two should have made shipwreck. Mary, I knew nothing of your story when I asked you to be my wife; I did not dream that you had ever cared for anyone—you, who always have seemed to me so still, calm, and self-contained. Does it not seem a pity that we should both be lonely? Could you not give to me the same deep, true affection I offer you? Why should both of us go on our solitary, dreary way? We are old enough not to require rhapsodies and love romances. Do, Mary, think of it. Do not dismiss me just like this."

"I cannot give you the same love you offer me," she said. "That is one reason I shall never marry you."

"You care for me a little, surely?" he asked, in rather aggrieved tones.

"Yes, with all sisterly affection; but I will not marry you. I shall never marry anyone. Believe me, Stephen, you yourself would be sorry very soon. I am a faded old woman; you are a young man, in the very prime of your youth. I would not do you the injustice of marrying you. I love you too well."

"That is all nonsense!" he said, stopping short

BABY'S FIRST SPRING.

(See p. 350.)

before her, with folded arms. "I suppose I know what I am doing when I ask you to marry me! I think it most improbable that I should ever be sorry—or ever be anything but most humbly grateful to you if you marry me. I know my own mind surely, now."

"And some day, after you were tied to me, and you met Miss Romney, what then?"

Stephen flushed up hotly, and his eyes gleamed as they had used to do in impetuous youth.

"What then?" he replied. "I hope I am an honourable man, and a gentleman. Is it possible that you do not trust me, Mary?"

"I trust you, Stephen, fully," said Mary, speaking very slowly, but not raising her eyes to his face. "But I know very well how terrible it would be for you to meet her when it was all too late. And it would break my heart."

"Hilda refused me twice," he said, half angry with her for bringing up the subject. "She is nothing to me now; I am nothing to her. I never was. But I loved her, and of that love and its disastrous course you were all along perfectly aware. Now it is all over and done with, I do not think it is exactly generous in you to reopen the old wound. It only shows you neither trust nor believe me now when I ask you to marry me. Hilda Romney is nothing to me. The fact that I once loved her, that I can never again love anyone, not even you, as I loved her, remains a fact. If it is disloyal to you, I can't help that. I have told you frankly just how things are with me, and I think it wrong of you, and foolish of you, to condemn me because I have told you this. I would be true and loyal to you in all the future to come, if only you would forget the past, and let me be."

"I am sitting here now, close to you, within your reach," said Mary Owens thoughtfully, a far-away look in her face, and with hands nervously clasped together on the window-ledge. "And you stand there close and near to me. Someone comes and says to you, 'Stephen, the girl you once loved, Hilda Romney, has just passed along the street, there where the cloister ends;' Stephen, what would you do? Would you stay here with me, or would you hasten after her?"

"Mary—you are cruel! You are unlike yourself today," he stammered. "I do not understand you."

"I am not cruel," she said wearily; "or if I am, it is better to be cruel now than to make an irrevocable mistake, and cause an irretrievable injury to both you and me. Stephen, you must answer me. Would you go, or would you stay?"

Stephen paced up and down again. He looked angry and baffled now, and his mouth had hardened from its usual sweetness.

"I suppose you are talking figuratively, Mary," he said, at length. "I shall answer you with another question. Do you think if I were your husband that any other woman should have power to influence me one way or another?"

"Not your conduct—you are too honourable for that. Not your demeanour to me, perhaps—your nature is too chivalrous for that. But your heart, Stephen! Would that stay with me, or would it follow her!"

"I cannot answer," he said, coming close up to her, and seizing both her hands in his. "I tell you the truth, Mary—I cannot answer. God help me! I believe I have never really ceased to love her."

"And you ask me to be your wife!"

"I do—I am most unworthy of you—but I do. And solemnly I vow to you that a thought which is not all loyal and loving to you shall never cross my mind, Mary, believe me when I tell you this."

"I believe you would try your very best, Stephen, but you could not help what you would feel."

"But it is so unlikely that she and I should ever meet again."

"There is still the chance that it might happen—and that I should have to look on at your agony, knowing that it was impossible for me to set you free. Think, Stephen, what a hopeless pain that would be."

"Then, on the remote chance of my meeting Hilda Romney once again, you refuse to marry me?"

"Yes, I refuse. It is better so. Or, stay, Stephen; I have thought of a way out of the difficulty. Suppose we leave the matter undecided for the present, and that you go down again to Flashford-on-Sea, and see Miss Romney."

"I do not know that she is there," said Stephen, breathing a little fast and hard, while the mere suggestion of going forth to seek his old love again made his blood race through his veins and his heart throb fiercely.

"Can you not go and see?" said Mary, her heart sinking at the eager tremor in his voice. "If she has left, someone can tell you where to find her. People do not vanish like smoke."

"And if I find her, what then?" asked Stephen, in the tone of a man who wants to be convinced against his will, or at least his reason.

"If she still persists in refusing to marry you, then we might see—"

"But why should I ask her again, Mary? Very, very plainly, without reserve, she refused me."

"She had some reason which perhaps no longer exists. Perhaps she did not like to marry, and leave those old people she lived with."

"But I asked her that last day I saw her, when her uncle was dead, and her father lay dying up-stairs,

'Would there be any hope for me if I came back again?' and she said 'No.' Very distinctly she said it. I think she had no other reason than the very simple one that she never cared for me. I never touched her heart. If I go back now, 't will be but to rekindle the old pangs of hopeless love, and to cut myself off from you for ever. I cannot come back to you, and say, 'Since the woman I love will not have me, will you reign in my heart?' I am not quite so base. No, Mary, do not send me from you thus."

"Go and see her, and if she will still reject you, or if you find her married"—Stephen winced—"then come back to me. I shall not call you base; I shall not deem you dishonourable; and then together we may plan out a new life. But until you have seen the woman you loved once more, do not speak to me of marriage."

"It would be better, better far, for me to learn to forget her. It seems like walking into the fire deliberately, to go and see her again. If you knew how I used to love her! How the slightest touch of her little hand had power to thrill me, her lightest word to move me, you would hesitate ere you would send me back to her: now that the years have brought me calm and forgetfulness and peace; now that I can think quietly of her, remembering only that once I loved her, but that I am free of her this day. Mary, dear Mary! do not send me away on a mission so hopeless. Can you not put your hand in mine—you need not be jealous of the shadow of a poor vanished love—and let me spend my life with you?"

"Only on this condition," said Mary firmly: "that you see her once again."

"I suppose, then, I must yield. To-morrow I shall go. You have set me a task hard enough, in all conscience."

"Stephen," said Mary firmly, "you love this girl still. It is all nonsense your pretending to me, or to yourself, that all is over between you and her. You would not be so afraid of meeting her again were you quite sure of yourself."

"Perhaps you are right," he answered quietly. "But I feel as though you are sending me away from you for ever."

"And suppose you find your old love again, and that she has learned to love you—you will thank Heaven on your knees that I did send you away."

"And suppose not? Suppose I come back without having gained her—what then?"

"Then, if you still think me necessary to your happiness, I will be your wife, Stephen."

Years ago, had anyone whispered in her ear that the day should come when those words would cross her lips, "I will be your wife, Stephen," what delirium of happiness would have seized her heart, and made glad melody of her life. Now she speaks them soberly, sadly, inexultantly—almost with pain.

Stephen took her hand reverently, and held it for a few seconds in his own.

"I remember once before saying to you, Mary, that if only you and I had loved each other in the olden time, how happy life might have been for both. We each have buried hopes and sorrowful memories to carry about with us now, but I pray God that we may be happy yet, and that I may serve and love you in all truth and honour, and as you deserve to be."

Mary withdrew her hand from his with a slow, faint smile.

"It is too soon to talk in this way, Stephen," she said softly. "We are not engaged yet."

"When do you wish me to go?" he asked.

"To-morrow. At once—as soon as you can."

"I suppose you are right," he said again, while sore and hard he struggled not to feel glad that he was going. "You generally are right, Mary. Now, is not that a great admission for the noble masculine mind to make to a woman? I hope you feel properly awe-struck at my condescension. When I get back to town I shall come to you at once—"

"With good news, I hope," she said faintly. "You will never be more happy than I wish you to be, Stephen."

"I believe, in your secret soul, Mary," he said, looking keenly at her averted face, "that you are praying to be delivered from me. You are longing that I may come back engaged, so that you may be spared the affliction of having anything to do with me."

She made no answer—only laughed a little, a puny, mirthless laugh.

Stephen looked at his watch.

"How are you going to get home?" he asked her.

"I shall drive. I ordered the carriage to meet me at the Abbey door at five."

"It is just five now. Shall we be going?"

"I want to stay here a little alone," she began, and hesitating, stopped.

"To brood over things, and make yourself unhappy. 'Meditations Among the Tombs' in a second edition. No, Mary, if I am to have the care of you henceforth, I forbid this kind of thing peremptorily. It is not good for you, and I don't like it."

"But you have not the care of me yet," she said, smiling up into his handsome, manly face. "At present I am my own mistress. So good-bye, Stephen. I shall not stay here long after you. I am too much afraid of Bateman to keep his beloved horses standing too long. So good-bye, and go."

Stephen shrugged his shoulders and laughed, then held her hand an instant and went. She sat quite still, and watched the tall, strong figure go striding along the gloomy cloister. At the end he stopped, his figure outlined against the brightness of the street, and raised his hat to her. Then he vanished. Mary sat still in her place, leaning her cheek against the cold stone, which soon was wet with her tears, oblivious of the lordly Bateman and his horses waiting for her at the Abbey door outside. She was one of those who rarely weep, but when they do, whose every tear is an agony.

Stephen had stirred her nature to its very depths. She had almost learned the hard lesson to possess her soul in patience, to live her life quietly, calmly, without thought or wish of an earthly happiness not hers to mar her peace. Now he had come, and, after these long years of faithful, silent love, had asked her to be his wife—the prize she had all her life longed for within her reach at last! She loved him so dearly! To her it would be happiness beyond expression to be with him always, to live within reach of the sound of his pleasant voice, within sight of his handsome face, to serve him, to tend him, to love him. But she feared herself too much. She doubted her own fortitude and strength. Could she go on, year in, year out, loving him as she did, and receiving in exchange affection, honour, reverence, kindness, all that he had to give, except his heart? That was no longer his. Had she courage for this lifelong martyrdom? Could she have felt she was necessary to his happiness, that he wanted her, that his life would be maimed without her, then she could meekly accept her fate, and merge her life in his. But his life was already broken in two and embittered by the loss of the woman he had loved so deeply and well. He would never love again, she knew; and would not any other woman do just as well to help him reconstruct his life?—some other woman who did not love him as Mary did, and who could accept his tepid kindliness without a pang or a heart-cry for bread, not stones.

"But I am not necessary to his happiness," she said to herself, in bitterness of soul. "He just asks me to marry him because I come nearest to his hand. He has not heart left to go out into the world to seek a new love, and so he turns to me, now when it is all too late. Thank God, he does not know I love him, nor just why it is I refuse to be his wife. I said because I could not give him the same love he offers me, and that is true, though not in the way he thinks. How hard it is to do what is right! If I could only plainly see that it would be for his good and his happiness, I would take him, and suffer in silence, as I have done so long. But to be an unloved wife is a trial too bitter, a furnace that would consume my very soul within me. How hard it is to know what to do! People talk as if life were just a choice between two roads: one a flowery path, a straight slide down, the other a ladder in the other direction—as though there are not thousands of intersecting bye-paths, inextricably mixed and tangled, or if not inextricably, at best complex and involved almost beyond our poor power to find a clue. And then that other better life which I have been planning for myself—is it all to go for nothing? Am I not taking my hand from the plough and turning back? Am I not seeking out again the broken cisterns which I have prayed to learn to forsake? One moment I think I have neither strength nor courage to marry Stephen and be his wife—the next, my heart cries out for him, and tells me long, slow martyrdom at his side is better far than life without him. Oh, if only I knew the way!—if only a voice from heaven would speak, and tell me how to go! I think, at last, I shall one day tell all to Mr. Davenent, and he will help me. He is so wise, and calm, and good, and sees things from a standpoint so noble and high. It is well I have at least one true friend upon whom I can rely."

"One true friend," but not for long. William Davenent, the servant of God, has almost run his course; his warfare is accomplished, his rest nearly gained. The shadow of death is upon him even now.

AMONG SOUTH-SEA SAVAGES.

("IN PERILS OFF."—II.)

BY THE REV. PROFESSOR W. G. BLAIRIE, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E., ETC.

THE natives of the South Sea Islands had got such a character for ferocity in general, and for savage treatment of strangers in particular, that it needed no little courage in that first group of missionaries that left England in the Duff in 1796 to offer themselves for a service of which these islands were to be the scene.

Ten of the missionaries were instructed to endeavour to settle on Tongatabu (Sacred Tonga), the principal island of the Friendly group. If the name of the group gave them any encouragement, their reception by the natives must have dismally belied their hopes. The chiefs and their people were anything but friendly; but the missionaries fared far worse at the hands of two British sailors who had been some time on the island, and of seven other men who were left behind soon after by an American vessel. The people did not seem to have the faintest desire for the lessons of religion and civilisation which became so popular at a future time. When a calamity happened, the missionaries were held to have brought it on by their prayers, and were ordered to pray no more. Robbers would sometimes attack their dwellings, and plunder them right and left, robbing them especially of their clothing, leaving them a scanty covering of native cloth, and threatening to murder them if they made the faintest noise.

But far more serious troubles occurred when a civil war broke out in consequence of the assassination of a principal chief by his own brother. The missionaries refused to take part in the strife, and were in consequence deprived of all protection, and exposed to all the indignities, privations, and sufferings that anyone chose to inflict on them. Mostly young men, they all met for prayer on April 29th, 1799, but it was the last meeting they had together. Foreign war broke out, and they were all required to join the army. The barbarities they witnessed were awful. They saw the first prisoner taken, cut up, and devoured on the wayside, while women dipped their hands in his blood, and licked them, as they passed along. The missionaries, unable to endure the army, returned to their settlements to find all dismantled and pillaged. They were obliged to hide among the rocks, or in woods, or in the wilderness; their very Bibles were lost; their only comfort lay in the assurance that God was ever their Friend, and that nothing could ever sever them from the love of Christ.

They had originally scattered themselves in various places, and as the troubles went on, the different groups began to be thinned. A group of three who had settled at Ardeo, having gone out to meet the chief and the tribe returning victorious from battle, were ferociously assaulted and cruelly slain. Their names were Bowell, Harper, and Gaulton, and a seaman who shared their fate was named Burnham. Little is known of their early life, and the only landing at Tonga. The storm had driven his ship to leeward, but a strong current brought it back. The surviving missionaries were carried to Port Jackson, in Australia. The chief Vaaji brought them a present of cocoa-nuts as they were leaving, service they ever rendered to the missionary cause was the bright evidence they gave of the power of Christian love—devoting their lives to a people who treated them as the Jews treated the Saviour, returning the deepest love with the most savage hatred. When the war ended, some of their brethren made a pilgrimage to the place to recover their bodies. They found them bare and naked, after a month's exposure to the elements and to the brutal treatment of merciless savages; they buried them without a rag to cover them, or even a few boards to enclose them. A chief named Vaaji, touched with a better feeling, afterwards had the bodies re-interred, and erected a tomb to mark the spot where they lay. He took some of the surviving missionaries to his house, showed them some of the things that had been taken, and offered them whatever they wished. A Bible and some writing materials, thus recovered, were like treasures from heaven to the impoverished missionaries.

A moment of repose from the fury of man was marked by what appeared to be the tokens of an angry Providence. In the beginning of 1800 the island was several times shaken by earthquakes, while a great tidal wave swept over the north of it, devastating everything, and bringing the miseries of famine.

Three days after the storm, a vessel touched at the island. The captain had had no intention of but notwithstanding this token of friendliness, they did not deem it possible to remain. For many years Tonga remained without a visit from a missionary. It was not till 1823 that the mission at Tahiti sent three native missionaries to Tonga. A Wesleyan missionary arrived some time after. The result has been a memorable triumph of the Gospel in Tonga. Heathenism has long been extinct, and now, with a population of some 25,000, there are 126 chapels, with an average attendance of 19,000, 5,354 Sabbath-school scholars, and 774 teachers. It would be difficult to tell how many labourers Tonga has furnished for the foreign field, or in how many directions the Gospel rays that have spread from it have brought joy and peace to neighbouring isles.

Twenty years after the despatch of the first body of missionaries to the South Seas in the Duff, in 1796, another party was sent to reinforce them. The most conspicuous of this group was John Williams. It had been proposed that his friend and fellow-student Robert Moffat should accompany him, but someone seems to have detected the kingly quality of the two young men, and as two kings would have been too many for the same region, Moffat was sent to South Africa.

Few missionaries have spent twenty such years in mission work as Williams. Undeterred by the experience of his predecessors in Tonga, he went cheerfully to Tahiti, to enjoy there an experience as unlike as light to darkness to what his brethren had passed through in their night of toil. Other missionaries had already done a blessed work in the "Queen of the Pacific." They had had their trials and perils at the beginning, and their perils from false brethren had been worse than their perils from the heathen. But after a long night of weeping a blessed change had set in. And when Williams arrived, and heard the song of praise to God and His Son rising from seven or eight hundred worshippers, who had but a few years ago been bowing to idols, and saw them bending the knee in honour of the true God and him away. He performed the marvellous feat of building a vessel of sixty or seventy tons without tools! In this craft he embarked on a voyage of from seven to eight hundred miles. The risks were serious, but through the fineness of the weather the voyage was effected in safety. Another time, at Rarotonga, a terrific storm swept over the island, and the waves dashed on it as if they would sweep everything away. A house from which Mrs. Williams had but just escaped fell with a fearful crash, and their ship was borne inland several hundred yards, and lay imbedded in a bog. On the whole, however, Mr. Williams might have chronicled all these years of mission life

Saviour, it seemed as if the work was done, and that there was no need of him. But the work had yet to be done at Raiatea, and thither Mr. Williams and Mr. Threlkeld proceeded. Their welcome from the people was enthusiastic. Everything prospered, but the sphere was narrow. A chief of an island, Rurutu, flying from pestilence, had landed at Raiatea, heartily embraced the Gospel, and when about to return, begged that teachers might be sent to instruct his people. In little more than a month word came back that the idols of Rurutu were abolished, and Jesus Christ exalted among the people. A new destiny seemed to open to Mr. Williams. Like Abraham, he seemed to be taken to a hill-top, and told to look east and west, and north and south, and hear God saying, "All this will I give thee." He began to travel from island to island, and from group to group, planting and watering everywhere. His success in the magnificent island of Rarotonga was wonderful. Not that he was altogether without perils. At one time it seemed as if he was imprisoned on the island. He had intended to stay three months, but for a whole twelvemonth no ship called to take him away. He performed the marvellous feat of building a vessel of sixty or seventy tons without tools! In this craft he embarked on a voyage of from seven to eight hundred miles. The risks were serious, but through the fineness of the weather the voyage was effected in safety. Another time, at Rarotonga, a terrific storm swept over the island, and the waves dashed on it as if they would sweep everything away. A house from which Mrs. Williams had but just escaped fell with a fearful crash, and their ship was borne inland several hundred yards, and lay imbedded in a bog. On the whole, however, Mr. Williams might have chronicled all these years of mission life in the words of St. Paul—"Now thanks be to God, Who always causeth us to triumph in every place." It was on Mr. Williams's return, after a visit to England, that the day of terrible peril came. He had come back in a new missionary ship, the Camden, and he had determined that for the future his head-quarters should be in the Samoan group. But there were yet dark regions of heathendom in these seas, and Mr. Williams was bent on trying to dispel their darkness. Before he set out for the New Hebrides, he held a farewell service at Samoa, and under a sort of foreboding of what was coming, he preached from Acts xx. 36-38—St. Paul's farewell at Miletus. As he approached the New Hebrides his anxiety deepened. "How much," he wrote, "depends on the efforts of to-morrow! Will the savages receive us or not? The approaching week is to me the most important of my life." At two of the islands, Fotuna and Tanna, the teachers were well received, and this encouraged the belief that Erromanga would not play a different part. For some reason, Mrs. Williams had a dread of Erromanga, and before parting with her husband had besought him not to land there. Mr.

Williams was agitated too, for on the morning of Wednesday, November 20th, 1839, he told one of his companions that he had passed a sleepless night. But he proceeded without hesitation in his course. Landing with Mr. Harris and Mr. Cunningham in the boat of the Camden, he distributed some presents, and seemed to be gaining the favour of the natives. Then a yell was heard; Mr. Harris rushed from some bushes, and fell in the water under the clubs of the natives. Mr. Cunningham hastened to the boat, and reached it, calling to Mr. Williams to run. But it was too late. A native felled him by the blows of his club; other natives assailed him with clubs and arrows. The boat was close to him, but those in it could neither avert his murder nor secure his body. Mr. Harris was a young man who had dedicated his life to foreign missions, but had not yet broken ground in missionary service. Mr. Williams, too, was young, only forty-three, but with a splendid record behind him, and what appeared an equally glorious experience before him. Both fell victims to rude barbarians, who had neither skill to read in their faces the message of love with which they came, nor faith to believe that any such feeling could dwell in the bosoms of men.

It is inexpressibly painful to think that both the wreck of the early Tonga mission, and the murder of Williams and Harris, with the discomfiture of the great enterprise of mercy on which they went to Erromanga, were due (as seemed most probable) to the conduct of men nominally Christian. If the white men in Tonga had supported the cause of the missionaries, the result might have been altogether different. And now it turned out that a murderous encounter had taken place between the natives and some white men a little time before, just where Mr. Williams landed at Erromanga. The chief, who afterwards confessed that he had killed him, said that his own son had been shot on that occasion by foreigners, and that he did not know that Mr. Williams was a missionary. What would not consistency and forbearance on the part of foreign traders and visitors have effected in these parts? It is not only the blood of natives needlessly attacked and slain that lies on unscrupulous foreigners, but often the defeat of noble plans for the good of the people and the glory of the Saviour.

We have no space to dwell on the subsequent history of Erromanga. It was many years before foreign missionaries settled on the island. A brave Nova Scotian, the Rev. G. N. Gordon, originally a farmer, but after his conversion filled with an irrepressible missionary zeal, along with his English wife settled at Erromanga in 1857. At first it seemed as if their work was going to be greatly blessed, but soon the tide went back. Among other calamities, the island suffered from a very fatal attack of measles. The missionaries were accused of bringing the disease. Mr. and Mrs. Gordon could not realise the danger in which they stood. It was solemnly resolved that they should be slain. And slain they were most brutally on the same day, May 20th, 1861. While walking with a native who asked him to visit a sick man, a blow was levelled at Mr. Gordon which broke his spine. Another savage hastened to the house, and with a couple of blows from a hatchet despatched Mrs. Gordon. The fury of savages gave the two the privilege so seldom enjoyed, to cross the stream together, and receive a united welcome into the joy of their Lord.

A younger brother of Mr. Gordon, James D. Gordon, who in far-away Nova Scotia forthwith dedicated himself to the work at which his brother and sister had fallen, laboured all alone, first at Dillon's Bay, thereafter at Portinia, and was a successful missionary, who succeeded in attaching the natives. But the people were exasperated owing to a recent case of man-stealing by an Australian slaver. The old prejudice, too, lingered, that the missionaries brought disease. Mr. Gordon was translating the Scriptures, and had just done the history of the martyrdom of Stephen. A man called, asking for an empty bottle. A child of his had died, and he blamed Mr. Gordon. As Mr. Gordon handed him the bottle, he struck him a fearful blow with his hatchet between the ear and the eye, which laid him lifeless on the ground. His aged mother was still alive, but did not long survive the tidings that a second of her sons had met the martyr's death. Mr. Gordon was killed on March 7th, 1872.

There were more South-Sea martyrs, but perhaps the most lamented of all was John Coleridge Patteson, Missionary Bishop of Melanesia. Few men have made greater sacrifices in the mission cause, or left brighter prospects in England to labour among savages. Alas! it was the same horrible conduct of English traders, deceiving and kidnapping the natives, that led to the murder of Patteson. The "thievish ships" had been at Nukapu, a small island of the Swallow Group in the Santa Cruz Archipelago. Bishop Patteson wished to obtain an interpreter for Santa Cruz, and observing some canoes near his ship, and believing that trusting himself to them was a good way of securing the confidence of the natives, he entered one of the canoes and was taken ashore, while the boat remained at a distance. Suddenly a murderous attack was made on the boat by natives in neighbouring canoes, wounding several of the men, and it was obliged to draw off. Unable to cross the coral reef, owing to the state of the tide, the boat was detained awhile. By-and-bye a canoe drifted towards it, apparently empty. As it neared, the bishop's shoes were recognised, and in the bottom of the boat was found his dead body, pierced by five wounds—indicating that vengeance had been taken for the lives of five natives recently kidnapped or slain by an English "kill-kill" ship. This tragedy took place on September 20th, 1871. Bishop Patteson had been a kind friend of Mr. and Mrs. G. N. Gordon; it was only a few months after the bishop's murder when Mr. Gordon's brother was borne away in the fiery chariot.

Of all these South-Sea martyrs we believe it may be said that they did not grudge their lives in the cause in which they fell. The grace of God is very wonderful in many of its effects; in none more so, than in the sense it gives of the value of human souls, and in the love it inspires for them, and the intense desire to save even the worst.

THE FRIENDS' COLONY IN THE FAR NORTH.

BY A MEMBER OF THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

STAVANGER.

ONE of the characteristics of the "Pennsylvania Pilgrim" was that he felt through the "common sequence of events" the guiding hand of Providence "reach out of space." And, gazing as spectators at events distant, we see how true it is what Whittier has so said, and what a greater poet has put into other words—a Providence "doth shape our ends," however we may rough-hew them. That the running away of a boy to sea would be the means of the growth of a religious body in the land he went from seemed unlikely, and still more unlikely it seemed that that lad and others, prisoners of war, should introduce Quakerism into Norway. But so it was; and the story of how it came about is worth telling.

Enoch Jacobsen, son of a Stavanger carpenter, was apprenticed to an apothecary, but in 1808, when about eighteen years old, he "ran away to sea," going on board the privateer Harnerven. When only a few days at sea, a British frigate, the Ariadne, took the privateer and carried her crew captive to Leith. Jacobsen was imprisoned about three years in Scotland, and then removed to the Bahama prison-ship at Chatham. In his own simple language, the Almighty was pleased to convince him that "a man must witness repentance and become a new creature in order to witness salvation and eternal peace in Jesus Christ." He obtained a Testament; he saw on board another prison-ship "one of Robert Barclay's books" (believed to have been the "Apology" in Danish), placed there by a Plymouth Friend. He met in the ship one Andersen, of Stavanger, one of the "Hougeians" or "Saints," and the two had religious conversation. They were removed to the Fyen, where were many prisoners, and two others were added whose religious views seemed to develop like theirs. By inquiry they heard that there were people in Rochester whose opinions were like theirs, and to one of these, William Rickman, an aged minister of the Society of Friends, Jacobsen wrote a letter with the aid of a dictionary, asking that "you will send me some of your books." This was in 1812. Rickman visited the little company, and so did Frederick Smith, of Croydon, and other ministers. By permission, they held a little meeting, at which twelve Danish and Norwegian prisoners were present; and they were at times favoured with visits from English Friends and visitors like Stephen Grellet, the Quaker missionary. Their little meeting grew; they held it at last thrice a week, "but there was seldom any instrumental [vocal] ministry amongst us." In 1814 the time of their release came, and they were scattered. Some of the Chatham Friends gave "certificates" to the returning prisoners; the executive of the Society granted a number of books for their use; and so to Norway and Denmark most of them went. They met in some cases with the "Saints"—the followers of Hans Neilson Houge; but gradually—weeded in one part, added to in others—they drifted into little communities, and then they had to meet the persecution which early Quakers have often had to endure in many parts. They had adopted olden peculiarities of the sect—they refused to doff the hat; they objected to pay the school-tax, because the catechisms were so largely read in the schools; they objected to the imprisonment of young people amongst felons for the sole reason that they were not able to say their catechism; and they desired liberty to marry and bury in the method they deemed best. Refusal to take an oath caused the refuser to be deprived of property, or involved imprisonment; and thus for thirty years the little struggling company of Friends in Norway had to meet the difficulties that persecution, poverty, and emigration brought upon them. Stephen Grellet and William Allen visited the country in 1818, and the executive of the Society in England sent an address to the King of Sweden and Norway on the subject of the persecution, but it was years before there was liberty granted to them to "meet under their own vine," or its representative in Norway. Meantime, it may be added that in 1818 the first marriage "after the manner of the Society of Friends" in Norway took place at Stavanger. Thomas Shillitoe, an eminent Quaker minister, visited Christiania in 1821, when Elias Tasted was fined five dollars daily till "he dug up the bodies of children of his whom he had buried in unconsecrated ground"—a sentence which, when reviewed by the king, was not allowed to be enforced. Shillitoe's visit was of value in proving to many of the authorities that it was for conscience' sake the Quakers declined to adopt many forms. In 1830, however, for a time the Norwegian Friends were forbidden to hold their religious meetings. In 1840 Elias Tasted enumerates the members at Stavanger and district as only nine in number, with four or six others attending the meetings. Two of these were "Endre Jacobsen Dahl" and his intended wife. They were married in the Quaker mode, and for this cause were "sentenced to be sent to prison, to be kept ten days on bread and water," with a repetition of the punishment until all expenses were paid. The "marriage, also, was to be annulled." The king, however, finally set aside this sentence on appeal. George Richardson, a minister in Newcastle, appealed to the Norwegian authorities as to this persecution, and a copy of his appeal was sent to the Swedish Ambassador, and it probably reached the King of Sweden. In 1845 an address to the "Representatives of the Norwegian Kingdom in Storthing Assembled" was sent from the executive of the English Society of Friends, which stated their views, and the privileges they have here, and added, "Our brethren in Norway are few in number, and mostly poor as respects this world's goods. They are principally resident in and about Stavanger." The address recited some of the sufferings they had to endure in Norway, and asked that they might have freedom to worship, to marry, to affirm, and that they might be relieved from harassing and oppressive proceedings. And in that year "greater liberty of conscience" was given to "those who profess themselves of the Christian religion" whilst dissenting from the Lutheran Church in Norway. This was gratefully acknowledged by an address from the "Society of Friends in and near Stavanger." From that date the path of the Norwegian Friends has been easier. Some of their number have been imprisoned for refusing to work in men-of-war, and for refusing to be trained for military service; emigration has continually thinned their numbers, but they have had such help as their English brethren could give them; and visits of British and American ministers have been many.

It is two years now since the death of the last-living of these early Friends in Norway—Endre Dahl, of Stavanger. Endre Dahl's ability and integrity had raised him to a position almost of affluence. He was highly esteemed by his fellow-citizens of many religious persuasions, and his interment was attended by a larger number of mourners than at any previous funeral remembered in Stavanger—priest, consul, and people thus honouring one who had been hooted in his native streets for being a Quaker.

The temperance movement in Norway, it may be added, owes much to another Friend—the late A. Kloster. The successors remain in Stavanger (where they maintain a school of their own, with some forty scholars, children of Friends in Norway and their associates), at Bergen, at Christiania, and in other parts. They are still few in number in Scandinavia; some are fishermen and farmers, as were the disciples of old; but the root which had its origin in the prison-ship at Chatham seems still to have vigorous life, though the transplanting of shoots to America appears often to threaten it with extinction in some of the parts where it has thriven. The introduction in so romantic a method of this peculiar form of faith, and its maintenance for seventy years in what could scarcely be called fit soil for its propagation, is not the least notable in the stories of religious growth. There was little instrumental aid in the sowing of the seed; the reading of a Testament led to the gradual development of spiritual life, and the reading of "Barclay's unrefuted page" gave it a tendency towards Quakerism in its ancient type. The fostering care of English Friends led to the gathering of very small communities, and to the gradual recognition of these by the law: and thus, in the land of the Vikings, there linger a few followers of this most peaceful faith—that of Fox and Barclay, Penn and Woolman, Grellet and Allen. And, in the words of one of the latest denominational utterances from Norway, "may these few be faithful and preserved untouched by this world and its many snares."

MAGGIE'S WATCH.

A STORY FOR CHILDREN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "ANYHOW STORIES," ETC.

CHAPTER II.

AUNTIE VEE had gone back to England, and mother and Maggie had taken possession of the flat. It really was the prettiest flat in Montreux, up two flights of snow-white stairs, with balconies to all the windows, and flowers in every one of them. From all the windows you could see the lake, or the mountains with the fir-trees high up and the vineyards lower down, and the nestling villages dotted about. It was very beautiful, Maggie thought, and she should never want to live anywhere else. She was never tired of walking through the rooms, and wondering what Janet would say to them, and whether she would be astonished at all the things that were different from England. How glad she was that at last all was ready, and there was only till the morning to wait, and then Janet would arrive! Very early indeed in the morning mother was going to Lausanne, to meet Janet and nurse, and bring them back. They would arrive at Montreux at eleven o'clock, and at the station there would be Maggie waiting for them, looking very grand in her watch and chain. Yes, watch and chain: for on'y two days after Auntie Vee went home, who should come to Montreux but an old friend of dear papa's, and he gave Maggie a chain; and pockets had been made to her dresses, and in all the canton there was not a grander little girl than Maggie.

It had been a very happy day, but a very long one, for she longed to see Janet so much that she was glad when even the happiest hours without her had gone. She went once more through the rooms, then looked at her watch; it was not yet seven o'clock, but she felt that she could not sit up any longer. Perhaps the morning would come quicker, she thought, if she went to bed to show that she was in a hurry and waiting for it.

"Mother dear," she said, "I think I will go to bed, if you don't mind;" and then she added, with a long sigh, "Won't Janet be glad when the morning comes, mother darling, and she knows she is nearly here!" For Janet was to travel in the train all night on her way to Switzerland.

"Yes, my sweet," the mother answered, understanding all that was in the little longing heart; "and so will you, I think." Then Maggie burst out—

"I want her to come so much, mother, that I feel as if I can't wait till the morning—as if it would never be here."

The watch was wound up and put under her pillow, but she pulled it out once or twice to look at it, and to see if it was any later, and once she gave it a kiss, and said, "You shall see Janet in the morning, you little dear." After that she settled down on her pillow and shut her eyes tightly, but though she tried and tried, she couldn't go to sleep. She tossed and turned, and thought of all manner of things, and yet all the time of one thing. She looked towards the window at the mountains, wondering how they felt with their great heads so near the beautiful sky; but while she wondered and tried to get sleepy, her little heart was aching sorely, as it had done many a time lately. At last, she could not help it—she called out, "Mother!" There was no answer, so she sat up in bed and called a little louder, "Mother!" That time mother heard, and went to her. "Don't be angry, mother dear," she said; "I did so want you!"

"I am not angry," mother answered, wondering at the distress on her little one's face. "What is it, my Dickie-bird!"

"Mother, I do so wish Janet had a watch! I can't bear Janet not to have a watch."

"She will have one some day, dear," mother said, stroking the golden head.

"But I want her to have one now, mammy. I would give her mine if I could," she cried passionately; "but I can't: I love it so; besides, Auntie Vee did give it to me."

"Of course she did, my darling, and it would never do to give it away, even to Janet."

"Mother, you know I have threepence a week for pocket-money. Do you think if I saved it all up till Christmas, and Janet saved hers too, she could have a watch like mine?"

"I am afraid not, dear child, for it is now September, and it takes a great deal of money to buy a watch. But go to sleep, dear. Janet shall have one some day." And gradually the mother soothed her, till at last she closed her eyes and felt soft sleep coming to seal them; but just before she dropped off she opened them drowsily for one moment, and said once more—"I do so wish Janet had a watch!" Then she sailed slowly away into the land of dreams, and stayed there till the morning.

Maggie put on her hat before ten o'clock the next morning, and thought eleven o'clock never would come at all. She felt certain that the world was standing still, that all the clocks were wrong, that something had happened, and that she never, never could wait another hour. She had been up since six.

She had seen mother start for Lausanne, she had watered all the flowers, she had looked a dozen times at the tray with the plate of cakes and glass of milk put ready for Janet; she stopped once on her way in and out of the dining-room and took a tiny sip of the milk, knowing that Janet would not mind. She had done everything that mother had told her to do by nine o'clock, and now a long time afterwards there was still another hour to wait. She wondered if anything was the matter with eleven o'clock, so that it would never come at all. Perhaps it was going to be a day without any eleven o'clock in it, and then what would become of mother and Janet, and the train, and everything! She pulled out her watch a dozen times; she listened to its ticking; it was a good thing that it was really going. She had wound it up as far as possible, thinking vaguely, as she did so, that she might come upon eleven o'clock all in a minute; but she did not. Oh! it seemed as if she could not wait any longer. She went down to the station, and waited inside and outside; she looked at the line along which the train would come with Janet in it, and then at the line along which the train would go when it had left Janet behind at Montreux. She wondered if the engine knew that it was bringing Janet, and that presently it would go on towards the mountains and the Rhone valley without her.

At last all things come to an end; so did the waiting-time for Janet, and Maggie, watching outside, saw the man close the gates over the carriage-road, that the train might pass safely along the rails and into the station. It was a good sign; a smile spread over her face, her heart beat quicker, and for a moment she waited almost patiently. Suddenly, while she waited, dear children, she lifted her sweet eyes, and looked at the lake with the sunshine sparkling on it, at the great mountains round, and at a little fleecy cloud that clung to one of them, looking as though it had journeyed from heaven, and being tired, stayed there to rest. She looked at the old castle of Chillon standing farther off, low down on the water's edge, at the houses scattered here and there high on the hills, at the brightness over everything. And Maggie gave a long sigh in the midst of her happiness, for though she was only just a little girl, she felt, as many older folk have done, that it was all so very beautiful. It made her heart full of thankfulness that she was there, and somehow she longed to feel that she belonged to the beauty of the world about her—to be, somehow, a part of it. She did not know why she felt this; perhaps she did not even know that she felt it at all. In thinking of it afterwards, she only remembered how much she had loved mother and Janet, as she stood there looking at the mountains and the lake. But there was no more time to think of anything, for she heard a rumble in the distance that grew louder and louder, then a whistle, and then the train was in sight. It came slowly and steadily along, between the gates, over the crossing, into the station, and stopped. With a cry of joy Maggie recognised Janet's curly brown head leaning out of window. She gave a little tug to her watch, just to feel if it was all right; she almost danced on the platform, right before the porters and the omnibus men, who could see her quite well; and then Janet was out of the carriage, and Maggie threw her arms round her sister, exclaiming—

"She listened to its ticking."—p. 371.

"Oh, Janet, you little darling! I am so glad you have come—look at my watch and chain!"

Janet was a quaint little thing, and had the greatest love and admiration for Maggie, whom she thought the most wonderful person in the world—dear Maggie, who patronised, and scolded, and petted, and took care of her, just as her humour went, but who she knew always loved her. So with much gravity and delight she looked at the watch, a little overawed at Maggie's having anything so grand for her very own. When she had seen it inside and outside, and the place where it was wound up, and had heard it tick, and had wished it would make haste and run down, so that she might see it wound up, then she gave a long sigh of gratification.

"Oh, Maggie, I am glad you have it! You are grand now!" she said, without one thought of self; for it seemed only right and proper that Maggie should have the best of everything.

"You little darling!" Maggie said, as they went along the upper road towards the flat; "you shall have one too, soon; we'll save up all our money to buy one."

"But I am not nine years old yet, and you are," urged unselfish little Janet, "so you ought to have one first. I am so glad Auntie Vee gave it you, Maggie dear."

(To be concluded.)

WHY DID ST. PETER DENY CHRIST?

THE denial of Our Lord by St. Peter is one of the saddest and strangest events recorded in the Gospels—an event which, had it not been foretold by Christ, would have seemed the most unlikely to occur, and which, having occurred, fills one with amazement—amazement that he who stood so high in the estimation of his Master, one of the first who forsook all and followed Him, who was ever the foremost and the most demonstrative in His service, whom his Lord declared to be blessed because the Father had revealed to him that Christ was the Son of the living God—should thrice deny that Master whose Divine origin he had proclaimed.

It would, no doubt, be sufficient for us to know that he did so because He that was the Truth, and knew all things, declared that he would so act. Yet we may surely (without irreverence) inquire if there be anything to suggest to us a reason for this great and lamentable defection. I think a careful consideration of all the attendant circumstances may guide us in discovering one—may show us, as a matter of causation, that God, who designed a result apparently so unlikely, and designed also the cause, has been pleased to give us some indication of that cause—to reveal to us, as He so often does, not only what He does, but also how He does it.

In our investigation, then, let us consider, first, the character of St. Peter, and next, how he acted on that night of Christ's betrayal.

The character of St. Peter, as we collect it from the narratives of the Evangelists, from little more than occasional traits incidentally recorded, presents a sketch or outline so life-like, so truthful, so natural, that one is forced to accept it as a portrait, real, though incomplete—no fancy sketch, or ideal composition; thus adding one more to the many proofs that the Gospel narratives are no invention, and that the actors mentioned, and the events recorded in it, are no fictions, but sober, unexaggerated realities. The great Apostle is presented to us as a man "consistently inconsistent," impulsive yet unstable, impetuous yet timid, courageous at the outset, yet cowardly and readily overcome by danger, with a "thoroughly human, but most lovable disposition."

Now let us see how this man, with a character so noble yet marred with such blemishes, acted after the betrayal of Christ. We are told by St. Matthew (xxvi. 50, 51) that when they laid hands on Christ, "one of them which were with Jesus stretched out his hand and drew his sword, and struck a servant of the high priest's, and smote off his ear." The same account, substantially, is given by St. Mark and St. Luke, though the latter (characteristically as a physician) adds that Jesus "touched his ear and healed him." St. John (xviii. 10) alone records the name of the striker and the servant stricken. Dean Plumptre, while noting the fact of the reticence on this point of the other Evangelists, adds, "it is not easy to conjecture its motive." With the greatest respect for this eminent divine, I think that it is not difficult to conjecture the motive of this reticence, which will appear when we consider the reason of Peter's denial of Christ. From a collating of the accounts of the four Evangelists, it appears that Peter with another disciple (John, no doubt) followed Jesus; that the other disciple was known to the high priest, and "went in with Jesus into the court of the high priest" (St. John xviii. 15), leaving Peter outside at the door. The other disciple, which was known unto the high priest, went out and spake unto her that kept the door, and brought in Peter. Then the damsel said to him, "Art not thou also?" (as well as John) "one of this man's disciples?" (v. 17.) Peter, fearing that he might be recognised as the man who smote the servant of the high priest, was surprised, in a moment of weakness, into denying the charge, and said, "I am not." Peter then sat, or stood, by the fire in the hall, with the servants and officers who had come in with Jesus, warming himself. And as the light, or blaze, fell upon him, one of the maids of the high priest, looking earnestly upon him, said, "And thou also wast with Jesus of Nazareth?" (St. Mark xiv. 67; St. Luke xxii. 56). "But he denied, saying, I know not, neither understand I what thou sayest." Some time after, others (one of them being a servant of the high priest, and a kinsman of him whose ear Peter had cut off) "confidently affirmed, saying, Of a truth this fellow also was with him, for he is a Galilean;" or, as it is stated by St. John, who may have been present, "Did I not see thee in the garden with Him?" Peter's fears were now naturally increased, and his denial became more emphatic, and was attested by his cursing and swearing: "I know not the man of whom ye speak," thus for the third time denying his Master. This narrative will, I think, leave no doubt upon the mind of anyone who reflects upon it, what the motive was that led to the crime of this great treason; and none but a motive so strong as that—the fear of his being detected of having committed the outrage on the high priest's servant, and of suffering a terrible punishment for it—can adequately account therefor. That those fears were well founded receives further confirmation from the fact that neither of the first three Evangelists, who wrote their Gospels during the lifetime of Peter, disclosed the name of either the wounder or the wounded, though I think it not unlikely that they were aware of both. Peter, according to the early tradition, which there is no reason to doubt, was put to death during the persecution under Nero, A.D. 68. John wrote his Gospel, at the earliest, A.D. 78; probably not before A.D. 80. There was then no need of reticence in this matter, and he accordingly discloses the names of both persons, Peter and Malchus.

And now that we have told of Peter's sin and fall, let us tell of his repentance and his reinstatement. When the cock had crowed the second time, Peter remembered—what terror may have driven from his mind—the words of his Divine Master. Though the shrill cry of the cock smote upon his ear with a sound more awakening than a clap of thunder, something there was that smote his heart with an anguish keener than the voice of reproach or anger could have inflicted—a look from the Lord and Master whom he had denied: “And the Lord turned and looked upon Peter”—looked upon him “in the agony of His humiliation, in the majesty of His silence,” when He heard the Apostle who once boldly confessed Him now denying Him with oaths. What pencil could depict, what pen describe, what tongue of human eloquence could utter in adequate words all which that look must have conveyed! the anguish of Christ's tender heart, of His outraged love at that favoured disciple's denial—pity, grief, love, forgiveness, but no anger, no reproach! That look recalled him to his better self, brought all his baseness and sin more vividly before him, than the crow of the cock brought the fact of his denial. “The flood-gates of penitence were opened”—“he went out and wept bitterly”—wept as he thought

“That One so sweet should e'er have placed Himself
At disadvantage such, as to be used
So vilely by a being so vile as thee.
There is a pleading in His pensive eyes
Will pierce thee to the quick and trouble thee,
And thou wilt hate and loathe thyself . . .

And will desire
To slink away and hide thee from His sight.”*

Two Apostles there were who were unfaithful to their Divine Master: the one a traitor whose sin brought not repentance, but despair—a godless sorrow that worked death, the death of the suicide; the other a renegade whose sin led to a godly sorrow that worked repentance. “Sternly yet tenderly,” says Dr. Farrar, “the spirit of grace led up this broken-hearted penitent before the tribunal of his own conscience. And there his old life, his old shame, his old weakness, his old self, was doomed to that death of godly sorrow which was to issue in a new and nobler birth.” The anguish of that sorrow none can tell, for no one witnessed it. That it obtained the pardon of his Master we cannot doubt. On the resurrection morn the angels desired the devoted women to tell the Apostles, and especially Peter (as if to comfort and reassure him) that the Lord was risen. Peter is the first to enter the tomb, while John ventures but to look in. To Peter, too, of all the Apostles, did Christ first appear. “What passed at that meeting,” says Dean Plumptre, “we can only reverently imagine; we may believe that He met this repentant, eager disciple with full assurance of pardon.” When Jesus stands on the shore of the Galilean Sea, Peter plunges into the water from the boat “to swim across the hundred yards which separated him from Jesus, and cast himself all wet from the waves before His feet.” Then it was that Christ singled out Peter to test his love, and give him that great commission to feed His sheep, and signified to him by what death he should glorify Him whom he had once dishonoured. Thenceforth a marvellous change has come over him. The fallen sinner has risen up a saint. Timidity gives place to courage. He is the first to proclaim the Divinity of his Master, and work a miracle in His name; the first to convert a Gentile; ever ready to declare, as he did on the Day of Pentecost, that God had raised from the dead that Jesus whom the Jews had crucified, and made Him both Lord and Christ.

We need not follow this forgiven penitent through his life of devotion, of labour and of suffering, to his martyr's death, thus showing how earnestly he sought to atone for his faithlessness by his fidelity, for his weakness by his strength, for his denials of Christ by his confessions of Him: as one who loved much because much was forgiven him.

Let us conclude with an observation, strikingly just, of a profound and original thinker and eminent theologian of our own day* :—“It is, I believe, usual to think of the Apostle who denied his Lord as if he were an exception to the others. In truth St. Peter was an exception to all but St. John; but he was so by being, in spite of his denial, more faithful than the rest. Under a very strong temptation he had given way. They had yielded to a much less pressure, and, at the first approach of danger, abandoned their Master altogether.”

THE OLD LADY'S LEADING-STRINGS.

A WORD TO YOUNG MEN.

"He must now assert his manhood."

WE smile at the quaint appearance of our great-grandmothers apparelled in huge bonnets, needing and possessing huge strings; bonnets which made sailing against the wind, or meeting a neighbour in a narrow lane, alike a serious business. We smile also at that capricious fashion which, a few years ago, imposed upon our sisters a bonnet which the wearer might lose without missing, and which any person might find without becoming enriched—a bonnet quite innocent of a string. We smile, but have we not also ostracised strings? Not bonnet-strings, perhaps, but leading-strings.

A young man desecrates upon his upper lip an adumbration, symptomatic of a moustache, and imagines himself somebody. He must now assert his manhood, and repudiate all childish things in general, and leading-strings in particular. The old folk are too jog-a-trot for him. His motto is "Progress," and no tether must restrain his pace, or circumscribe the sphere of his enterprises. Some poor noodles may require looking after, but as for him, he is quite capable of taking care of himself. He is a full-blown MAN, has cut all his wisdom teeth, and so can no longer do with "sop." The old folk forewarn him of young men's dangers, but he ridicules the bare idea of his being caught napping.

"Saying prayers, church-going, and goody-goody talk about angels, are all very well for 'kids,' or old women in their dotage, but not for a young man with a moustache." So he argues, and votes all parental displays of anxiety in a religious direction as mistaken kindnesses, than which a Christmas hamper would be much more acceptable.

You remember the day you left home? It was hard work for the old lady to say "good-bye," wasn't it? Tears trickled down her face as she pressed you to her bosom, gave you a true mother's kiss, and tried to say, "God bless you, my boy!" but couldn't. As the first step outside the old home has often proved the first step to ruin, that night she, with a love second only to the Great Father's, commended you to the care of the Almighty; and each returning night saw her pleading at the Throne of Grace on behalf of her absent boy. How impatiently she awaited the arrival of your first letter! What a thrill of joy she experienced when she heard the postman's knock! How eagerly she tore open the letter and devoured its contents! That was some compensation for your absence; but by-and-by correspondence became intermittent. You wrote in a formal and perfunctory manner, just to keep up appearances, or perhaps ceased writing altogether.

The money sent from home was always welcome:

but the old lady's letters! Tedious, unsophisticated in style, and so full of anxious inquiries and entreaties, that you stuck them in the fire in disgust. Oh, 'tis the same old story!

Why did you not write to the poor soul? Surely your experiences at music-halls, theatres, dancing-saloons, and gin-palaces, in company with your flash companions, would have furnished ample materials for a letter! But you did not write. That silence meant for her torture day and night, brooding over apprehensions, alas! too well grounded. Don't tell me of your polished refinement and gentlemanly deportment in female society. You will not allow your so-called lady friend to carry a light parcel, nor will you knowingly trample on her dress; but you will take good care that your poor mother shall carry a very, very heavy heart, and you will trample on her tenderest feelings without compunction.

I am heartily ashamed of you! Fie on the creature who can wantonly grieve a mother's heart!

He who can play ducks and drakes with a love stronger than life, the most sacred thing under heaven, who can pile up sorrow for a mother's old age—such a wretch is on the high road to rascaldom. If a man can despise the woman who gave him birth, and make his nature proof against all right and tender feeling, there is no brutality of which he will not ultimately become capable. Give him just a little time, and one of these fine mornings the newspapers will announce a successful experiment performed by the common hangman upon an abandoned and leather-hearted villain, who went to his doom after sleeping soundly and eating a hearty breakfast.

"The world abounds with hindrances."—p. 377.

"MOTHER!"

Look at your hands! you pride yourself on their delicate whiteness. By all means keep them white! But, remember, if you break your mother's heart, they will be stained with her blood.

In the natural order of things she can't be here long to be a nuisance to you. Let her end be peace; prize her whilst you have her. Soon she will write her last obnoxious letter, utter her last prayer for her poor boy, speak her last word of love; and then you will be ushered into her room, and you will kiss her poor wrinkled face, to find it cold!

Oh! those priceless leading-strings! I never knew their value when in actual possession. Deprivation has been my tutor. When quite a child I stood beside a dying mother's bed, and, in my simplicity, chuckled with glee at my first ride in a carriage, although it bore me to her funeral. I remember the last kiss she gave me; I see her poor thin face; I hear her last "Good-bye," whispered, alas! how faintly! She was a praying mother, and, although I am a matter-of-fact man of rough exterior, accustomed to the stern realities of every-day life, I here, in justice to her blessed memory, record my testimony that, amid many and varied experiences, I have found my life consciously influenced by that bedside scene, and the little priceless tokens left behind, testifying, as they do most eloquently, of her concern for my highest good. Thank God for a praying mother!

Now, don't despise leading-strings. We can't keep on our legs without them.

Some time since a young spark undertook to demonstrate to the world the possibility of walking alone; and a pretty hash he made of it!

He toddled away from home, sang a kind of "Britons never shall be slaves," but soon became giddy, lost his equilibrium and his cash, and fell. Meeting a farmer, this young hopeful obsequiously touched his hat, and said, "Beg your pardon, sir, but can you give me a job?" after which he took to studying pork, and dieted himself on husks to keep his brain clear. Well, it dearly served him right; he should have known when he was well off. Such upstarts generally furnish rods for their own backs. Happily, he had a grain of common sense left. He was a fool, but he knew it.

For the second time on record an animal preached a sermon.

The grunt of a hog brought him up; and then those blessed leading-strings! He felt drawings homeward. He recalled the tear-bedewed faces of the old folk at parting; and when he came to himself it appeared to him very evident that walking alone did not pay. He bade the swine adieu, turned homewards, and a good thing it was for him that when he reached it the old gentleman did not give him tit for tat and say, "Look here, young scapegrace! you went away for your own pleasure, now you can keep away for mine." But no, nothing of the kind; there was love at home.

My good friend, if in the circle in which you revolve it is considered the correct thing to despise home influences, don't follow such a senseless fashion, but get out of the society which eyes it with favour.

We cannot walk alone yet. Uprightness of character is, by Divine arrangement, contingent upon many auxiliaries; the fabric is supported by buttresses, pillars, and stays, and no stays stronger than parental influence. Don't ostracise that. Perchance you may not make old bones. Disease and death are pretty busy. They will give you a look some day—perhaps sooner than you imagine. You will then whimper for some kind hand to smooth your pillow; to wipe the beaded sweat from off your brow. You will want to hear something about a Better Land. You will be glad of your mother then. Will she turn her back on you? Never!

A man may deliberately take the high road to ruin; he may squander his fortune; he may sell his soul; he may become the veriest loathsome beggar alive; he may be emaciated in body, and so repulsive physically and morally—so foul a rag of humanity—that few would care to pick him from the gutter with a pair of tongs—the whole world shall have turned its back upon him; and then—THEN, when he, a squeezed orange, betakes himself to his wretched bed to die, an outcast, a trophy of the devil, a good angel comes to claim him as her darling—her precious treasure! She mounts guard at his bedside; anticipates his every wish; keeps sleepless vigil through the solemn midnight watches, and, ever and anon, when the dying one shows signs of consciousness, discourses music sweet and soft on Heavenly mercy, and Love beyond a mother's. That angel is his mother. And when all is over, and the poor body, for decency's sake, hides its shame beneath the sod, a sorrowing woman in black will, in all weathers, tend his grave, and strew it with forget-me-nots.

The world abounds with hindrances for that young man who is animated by high aims and noble purposes.

Welcome, then, the helps which come from Home. Earthly voices mystify; to heed them is risky, oftentimes ruinous; but messages from home are winged by love. Letters thence are written in the golden ink of disinterested affection.

Never let it be said that you have dishonoured your parents. Do not play so cowardly a part as to strike a woman, and that woman, forsooth, your mother; not with the clumsy fist, perchance, but with weapons of keen edge, forged illicitly upon the anvil of your heartless neglect and recklessness.

Rather, the while she stays, seize every opportunity to do her homage. Become her valiant and loyal body-guard, to ward off every care-forged dart, and account it privilege indeed. So shall she pass by, her sacred head enshrined within its own aureole, her native glory as Queen of God's creation; her placid face (unmarred by wrinkle of your fixing) betokening both mind and heart at rest.

Thus, undisfigured and undishonoured, let her pass.

Back, then, to the bonnet argument. If your character is worth protecting, take every precaution to secure it. Let those who sneer at leading-strings as antiquated and behind the times pursue their folly. For your part, be wise; leave it to others who can walk alone to be clever.

SAM TWINKLE.

WHO WAS SENECA?

ONE of the most brilliant and gifted men of his time, Seneca could not fail to influence the spirit of the age in which he lived. And yet it must ever be a matter of lasting regret that, having lived at so eventful a period in the world's history, his teaching lacked the purifying light of the Gospel. Born probably about seven years before the birth of Christ, an interest and value have always centred round his life from the very fact of his having been a prominent leader of thought during the years when our Lord sojourned on earth. Hence, as might be imagined, much has been written, at different times, by theologians of all schools, to solve the long-discussed problem as to how far he was biassed in his views by the example and character of Christ. Anyhow, some of the Fathers, charmed and fascinated by his writings, did not hesitate to reckon him among the Christians; although it is generally admitted this was a position to which he is by no means entitled, and one, indeed, to which he would himself have laid no claim. At the same time, there can be no doubt that he was conversant with the sacred writings, as many of his ideas and sentiments are distinctly gathered therefrom—a circumstance which makes it all the more surprising that his feelings were not in complete sympathy and harmony with the grand principles of revealed truth contained in them. In short, it is impossible to over-estimate the religious influence he must have exerted over his fellowcreatures, if, added to his genius, his intellectual powers had been guided by the sanctifying spirit of Christianity.

Turning to his early life and education, it is somewhat astonishing that he should have been the patient and laborious worker he was, when we recollect how from infancy he was of a delicate and languid constitution, and unfitted to combat with and endure the struggles and opposition which inevitably fall to the lot of all great thinkers. But even his ill-health on one occasion served him well; for when his fame and ability excited the jealousy of Caligula, this Emperor was assured that so sickly a subject could not last long. Fortunately, too, his family were wealthy—a piece of good fortune which happily exempted him from those mental worries and bodily deprivations which would have been so prejudicial to his health. In spite of his luxurious surroundings, he was in his mode of life temperate, drinking but little wine, and "whatever may have been the value or splendour of his five hundred cedar and ivory footed tables, they were rarely spread with entertainment more sumptuous than water, vegetables, and fruit." His abstemious mode of life—which was in strong contrast with the profligate and extravagant habits of the period—secured for him a respect from all classes of society that materially enhanced his reputation as a philosopher. Thrown, also, by reason of his intellectual attainments, into the closest relationship with the most distinguished literary men of the day, he not only enjoyed their refined and cultured friendship, but earned an esteem at their hands of which any man, however great his genius, might be justly proud. But it was, alas! when in the prime of life, and in the full zenith of prosperity, that a sudden and terrible check was put to his splendid career; for, through the calumny of his jealous opponents, his conduct was impugned, and he was banished to the island of Corsica for eight years. Few can understand what a crushing and well-nigh overwhelming blow this must have been to a highly sensitive mind, and especially to a man who through life had been physically weak. Cut off from intercourse with those whose tastes and pursuits were completely in harmony with his own, he had to experience the heavy trial of not only living in an uncongenial atmosphere of a rude and primitive people, but on an island famed for its bleak and uninviting rocks. Thus, to quote our sage's own words when speaking of it—

"Barbarous land, which rugged rocks surround,
Whose horrent cliffs with idle wastes are crowned;
No autumn fruit, no tilth the summer yields,
No olive cheers the winter-silvered fields,
No joyous spring her tender foliage lends,
No genial herb the luckless soil befriends,
No bread, nor sacred fire, nor freshing wave;—
Nought here—save exile, and the exile's grave."

This eight years' banishment, however, despite its bitter experience, was, as it has been pointed out in the "Encyclopedia Britannica" (1850, xx. 46), to him an unmixt blessing, and was the period of his life on which we can dwell with the most pleasure. It mollified the virulence of the envious, and excited the compassion of the good: it increased his real reputation, while it diminished his obvious dangers. Above all, it gave him a season of calm and safety for the growth and nurture of his character and genius. In the intoxication of prosperity and power, he never forgot the sobering lessons of humiliation and misfortune; and perhaps while the seas and stars were supplying food for his philosophic contemplation, he was nearer happiness than while he was the prey of anxiety and suspicion in the midst of gardens and villas that an emperor might have envied. At length these weary years came to an end, and once more Seneca was recalled home, and entrusted with the education of the young Nero—an appointment which transformed him from the philosopher into the courtier, henceforth making him a leading figure in public life. Without entering minutely into this epoch of Seneca's eventful life, it is sufficient to say that the duties of his new position exposed him to the fiercest temptations, perilous alike to his rectitude and his peace. He could not, too, escape the just charge of inconsistency, for he lived in the height of splendour and power, at the very time when he did not cease to lay claim to credit for a social contempt for all the extravagances of life; nevertheless, as Dr. Ritter says, "he did not escape the sanguinary cruelty of his Imperial scholar; and having received a command to prepare for death, he contemplated its approach with calmness and fortitude, and sought by his last moments to attest the truth of the doctrines which he had avowed in life."

In reviewing his stormy and eventful history, one can only deduce this conclusion: that the grand mistake of his life was the unhappy and fruitless compromise he endeavoured to make between stoicism and worldliness. By acting, so to speak, a double part, he failed in both; whereas if he had only resolutely adhered to his early resolution to embrace the study of philosophy, and after the precepts of the Stoics to exercise moderation and self-denial in all things, he would undoubtedly have gained for himself a brilliant reputation. One cannot but regret that an intellect of such a high order, and capable of attaining so great an ascendancy over men, should have been tarnished by a want of force of character.

As a teacher he must be regarded as far more a moralist than a philosopher, and it has been asserted that the essence of all his maxims is how to live and how to die. But, however sincere his intentions, they were of the earth, earthy; and, as reviewed in the light of Christianity, were a miserable and worthless substitute for the words of Him who said, "I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life." It is noticeable, however, that Seneca displays a moderation which shows how conscious he was of his own weakness. Thus he declares it to be just, in judging the transgressor, to call to mind one's own faults, thereby encouraging a leniency and forgiving spirit which otherwise one might not be so ready to display. Furthermore, as a warning to men of the difficulty of acquiring innocence of life, he argues that "virtue is difficult, and not to be attained without the aid of education, while vice is learned without a master." Precepts of this kind, taking into consideration the laxity of the age in which he lived, must have produced a startling and convincing proof of the high standard of his ethical conceptions, and inspired his fellow-creatures with a consciousness of the loose condition of society at this period. In promulgating, also, his views, he took special care to offend no sect in particular; refusing, as Dr. Ritter says, "to swear after the words of any master, he will use the good wherever he may find it, either with a Zeno or an Epicurus; he belongs to no one, but is common to all; the earlier teachers had investigated, not exhausted philosophy; he, too, will inquire, and perhaps will be bold enough to confide a little in his own judgment." Hence, as far as possible, he took an independent stand, appealing from time to time to the conduct and example of great and exalted men, whom he considered "as the best proof of the presence of a Divine mind in the world." So convinced, also, was he of the value of true ethics, that he almost disregarded the study of natural science, except so far as it had influence on the improvement of manners. Indeed, as Dr. Ritter observes, "his zeal to establish a science which shall be simple and merely adapted for the practical purpose of purity of morals, carries him so far, that he declares even the liberal sciences and philosophical physics to be useless so far as they are not capable of application to ethics." It will be seen, therefore, that our sage, instead of devoting his intellectual powers to solving those abstruse questions which had occupied the attention of previous philosophers, considered it a loftier ambition to elevate his fellow-men. It is true that many of his opponents have sneered at the inconsistencies of his life, arguing how sadly his moral attainments fell short of his professed views; but then it must be remembered that he had not the elevating principles of the Gospel to raise him above the weaknesses and temptations of human life.

It has been truly remarked that if he had only accepted Christianity, many of the defects of his character would have disappeared, and he would have lived a nobler and a better life, with loftier aims and still more self-denying resolutions. At any rate, in reviewing the leading features of his life it must not be forgotten that even the best of men now-a-days would equally fail to achieve any real good unless constrained by the influence of the Holy Spirit—a guiding and motive power which he unfortunately lacked.

But, as we have already noticed, throughout his teaching we find expressions which prove that he was not altogether ignorant of the spiritual doctrines of Christianity, but made use of religious truths to embellish and illustrate his own writings. From incidental allusions of this kind, some have maintained that our sage had a secret admiration for the Gospel, yet had not the moral courage to confess his convictions. But, whatever conjectures may be raised on this point, we know that he never accepted the Christian faith, and that, as far as his religious belief was concerned, he only inculcated the duty of human conduct being so framed as to coincide with the character of the Deity.

On the other hand, it is curious that there are some who have made Seneca a Christian, and to have been acquainted with St. Paul—an assertion, however, for which there is little or no foundation. It is true that a correspondence between the Apostle and Seneca—and which was known to Jerome—at one time gave a plausibility to this supposition, but this has long been known to be a forgery. Anyhow, the matter has given rise to an interesting historical problem, which has been ably and thoroughly discussed by the present Bishop of Durham in his Commentary on the Epistle to the Philippians. Referring, again, to the similarity of expressions which are of constant occurrence in his writings and those of the sacred pages, no impartial critic can recognise these as mere chance, although some authorities regard them as such. Hence Mr. Long writes: "The resemblance between many passages in Seneca and passages in the New Testament is merely an accidental circumstance." This conclusion might be undoubtedly true if such parallels were only rarely to be met with, but their repetition seems an incontestable proof that Seneca was acquainted with the Divine Word. Thus, among a few of the very many passages in his writings which have a striking similarity to the inspired Word, may be noticed his remark on the duty of kindness: "You must live for another if you wish to live for yourself," reminding us forcibly of St. Paul's familiar words (Rom. xii. 10), "Be kindly affectioned one to another, with brotherly love," a passage wherein the beautiful virtue of unselfishness is set down as a feature of the Christian character. Once more, that all men are conceived and born in sin—a maxim to which the Apostle St. John alludes in those well-known words, "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us"—is thus expressed by our sage in his treatise on "Anger," which he addressed to Novatus: "If we wish to be just judges of all things, let us first persuade ourselves of this—that there is none of us without fault." Without giving further illustrations on this point, it is clearly evident that Seneca, whatever be the estimate formed of his character, gathered gleams of light from the illuminating atmosphere of the Gospel: a circumstance which, it has been remarked, was intended in the Divine wisdom of Providence to be a means of preparing men's hearts for the reception of the grand and sublime truths of the Gospel as taught by our Saviour Himself.

PEARLS OF CHRISTIAN SONG.

BY THE REV. ROBERT SHINDLER, AUTHOR OF "HYMNS WITH A HISTORY," ETC.

II.—ON THE CRUCIFIXION.

THE Cross of Christ is the "Power of God, and the Wisdom of God." The preaching of the Cross is the power of God unto salvation to them that believe; for He died, the Just for the unjust, to bring us to God. 'Christ crucified is therefore the Christian's glory. It is his chief song in the "house of his pilgrimage," and it will be his everlasting song amid the splendours of the eternal state. Some of the grandest compositions which human thought has conceived and human words have framed have the Cross for their theme. All Christians, differ however they may, are at one in this—

"Christ and His Cross is all their theme."

A sonnet is not the best form of poetry for such a theme, but it has been employed to good effect by the late Dr. Ray Palmer, of New York—

"Wonder of wonders! On the cross He dies!
Man of the ages, David's mighty Son,
The Eternal Word, who spake and it was done,
What time, of old, He formed the earth and skies.

"Sank into profound thought."

Abashed be all the wisdom of the wise!
Let the wide earth through all her kingdoms know
The promised Lamb of God, whose blood should flow,
For human guilt the grand sole sacrifice:
No more need altar smoke, nor victim bleed;
'Tis finished! the great mystery of love;
Ye sin-condemned, by this blood 'tis decreed
Ye stand absolved; behold the curse remove!
O Christ! Thy deadly wounds, Thy mortal strife, Crush death and hell, and give immortal life!"

The hymn by which the name of Ray Palmer has become known the world over, and will be remembered till time shall end, is not strictly a hymn on the Crucifixion, but it illustrates the power of the Cross. A merchant residing in the State of New York was accustomed to visit the city of New York on business. A troublesome swelling occasioned him anxiety. On one of his visits he submitted the case to an eminent surgeon. He frankly told him it would prove a malignant tumour, and would probably end his life in six months. The blow almost stunned him. He had a belief in the historical facts of Christianity, but no personal faith in Christ, and consequently no hope. Before leaving the city, he called on a Christian lady, and told her what the surgeon had said. On parting, she placed in his hand a printed leaflet, which he put in his pocket. Seated in a car on his way home, he sank into profound thought on his condition. He recalled his past life, so filled with Divine goodness; his neglect to love and obey God, and to receive the Saviour into his heart, weighed down his spirit. Some hours passed in this way, and his heart became filled with tender feelings, when he remembered the leaflet, and took it from his pocket. At once his eye caught the words—

"My faith looks up to Thee,
Thou Lamb of Calvary, Saviour Divine!"

He read the hymn through slowly, and many times over. He felt he could adopt the language. A new-born faith found full and delightful expression in it, and from that time he found peace in believing, and a tranquil rest in God. The prediction of the surgeon proved correct. In a few months he died—joyfully, having the hymn on "The Lamb of Calvary" sung to him to the very last.

One of the brightest hymn-pearls on the Crucifixion is the hymn of Paul Gerhardt: that is, the hymn in its complete form. What is given in the different hymn-books consists of portions only. The hymn, indeed, has been ascribed to Bernard of Clairvaux, but Gerhardt's hymn is not so much a translation as an imitation,

"Ah! wounded Head, that bearest
Such bitter shame and scorn."

This is the version in the "Chorale Book," extending to nine verses. A Romanist from Bohemia was led to read the Bible, and to inquire into Evangelical truth. The first time he entered a Protestant Church he heard this hymn sung, and he was overpowered with sorrow and joy. He saw more clearly than before his own sin and the Saviour's grace, and was enabled to receive the great truth of justification by faith. Henceforth he followed Christ, walking in newness of life.

General Dyhorn was mortally wounded in a battle near Bergen, and was conveyed to Frankfort-on-the-Main. Dr. Fresenius visited him. Up to that time the general had been an infidel, but in his last days he turned to Christ for salvation. Dr. Fresenius, in one of his visits, repeated a portion of this hymn. The dying general was so affected that he asked several times to have the verses repeated to him, saying that they expressed his strong hold of faith, and that "Jesus, whose divinity he had so long denied, had now become his all."

The missionary Swartz, who laboured in Southern India from 1750 to 1798, greatly prized this hymn, which had been translated into Tamil by the missionaries from Halle. In his last moments his native assistants sang the concluding verse to him—

"Appear, then, my Defender, my Comfort, ere I die;
This life I can surrender if but I see Thee nigh;
My dim eyes shall behold Thee, before Thy Cross shall dwell,
My heart by faith enfold Thee; who dieth thus dies well!"

The good pastor Kiesling, in Nuremberg, died on the 27th of February, 1825, while a number of children, who had come to see their old friend, were singing the last two verses. Many others, too, have had it as their dying hymn.

The number of very good hymns on the Crucifixion is large. Joseph Hart has perhaps written more than any other. His, however, demand a separate paper. Isaac Watts holds a conspicuous place.

"When I survey the wondrous cross" has never been excelled. It contains almost everything a hymn on the subject should contain. He has a number of others that will long hold their place, as—

"Alas! and did my Saviour bleed?"
"He dies, the Friend of sinners dies;"
"I sing my Saviour's wondrous death;"
"Nature with open volume stands;"
"Not all the blood of beasts," etc.

Miss Steele's hymn—

"And did the Holy and the Just?"

is full of tender, elevating thought. The third verse will ever be a favourite—

"He took the dying traitor's place,
And suffered in his stead;
For man, O miracle of grace!
For man the Saviour bled."

"He wrote above the door of his room."—p. 382.

Cowper's well-known and ever popular hymn—

"There is a Fountain," is a precious pearl, though some have tried to reset it in their own brass and tin, by interposing some doggerel lines as a chorus. It will outlive all such mangle-mangle.

A very choice pearl is the hymn by F. W. Faber—

"O come and mourn with me awhile."

The sweet ending of each verse—

"Jesus, our Love, is crucified," is very much after the manner of John Scheffler, or Angelus, in his hymns, soft, sweet, and beautiful. His hymn beginning—

"O Love, who formedst me to wear
The image of Thy Godhead here, is a pearl indeed, each verse ending—

O Love, I give myself to Thee, Thine ever, only Thine to be."

Schulze, one of the first German missionaries in Madras, was so impressed by the singing of this hymn, that he sat down one evening to translate it for his Tamil pupils. He finished the translation by two o'clock the next morning. It gave such joy to the converts, that he made a hymn-book in Tamil, which is still in use. A man in a Prussian village, hearing this hymn sung for the first time, was so impressed that it led him to repentance and to a new life. He died while, at his request, its beautiful words were being read to him.

"Him on yonder cross I love"

is another hymn in the same strain, by John Ernest Greding, a Lutheran pastor. It was suggested by the beautiful words of Ignatius, "I have great desire to die for Christ Jesus; my love is crucified, and there is no other love in me besides His." Greding chose for his funeral text, "I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ and Him crucified." On Good Friday, April 11th, 1748, he had preached on "Him on yonder cross," and on the evening of the following Sabbath he went Home.

A Prussian officer while staying at a country inn tried in vain to speak to the landlord on spiritual things. Resolved, however, to leave some testimony for God, he wrote over the door of his room—

"Him on yonder cross I love."

As soon as he was gone, the man noticed the words, and called his wife. She began to weep, and to say to her husband, "Oh, we are not as we ought to be: we do not love Him who was crucified for us!" This led to a thorough change in them both, and when, a year after, the officer called at the inn, they received him with the greatest joy and gratitude, and they all rejoiced together in a crucified Saviour. The one hymn of good John Blakewell, a Wesleyan local preacher, is a worthy contribution to songs on the Crucifixion. It is a triumphant outburst of praise to "the once despised Jesus"—

"Hail! Thou agonising Saviour, Bearer of our sin and shame!"

He was converted by the reading of an almost forgotten book—Thomas Boston on the "Fourfold State."

The manly, earnest, and devoted Dr. Monsell has left a fine hymn on "Good Friday." Deep, yet sublime, it deals with the mystery rather than with the history of the Crucifixion, a "day of loss and day of gain."

"Hell, whose deadly hate and pride
Heaven its very self defied, Bows before the Crucified." (Verse 8.)

"O Lamb of God, most stainless!"

is a choice pearl, by Von Hofe, otherwise Nicholas Decius, a friend and contemporary of Luther. So, also, is that by Homburg—

"Christ, the Life of all the living."

Out of many, we can name only one more, the ancient hymn on the "Seven Words"—

"When on the cross the Saviour hung."

Its closing words may well be our prayer—

"Lord Jesus Christ, who diedst for us,
This one thing grant us evermore,
To ponder o'er Thy passion thus,
Till truer, deeper than before,
We learn to love Thee and adore."

BEGINNING WITH NOTHING.

A STORY IN THREE CHAPTERS.

BY CHRISTIAN REDFORD.

CHAPTER I.

SUSIE was coming! Strange to say, the thought filled George Taylor with consternation.

There sat his young wife, with her baby in her arms, and the silent tears running down her pale face; and there lay the letter on the floor of the one bare, miserable room which they called home; and that letter said that Susie was coming to Oakbridge to be housemaid to Mrs. Waller at the Lodge, as her sister had been a year and a half ago, before George Taylor had married her.

But what innocent news! And Susie Grey was a pretty, innocent girl; yet her simple letter to his wife had struck and awakened George as perhaps nothing else in the world could have done.

He had only just come indoors; but he took his old battered hat from the rickety table on to which he had thrown it, and thrust it savagely on his head again, and pulled it down over his eyes.

"Ah, Annie, my girl," he muttered, as he went out, slamming the door after him, without thinking of his poor little sleeping child, "it was a bad day for you when you agreed to be my wife."

Where was he going? He did not know himself—except that he felt like walking away from everybody, himself included.

It was a May morning; but there was no sunshine. A good deal of rain had fallen in the night, and trees and flowers looked fresh, and the ground was soft; but the sky was still of a dull uniform grey, and a light veil of fog hung over the distant landscape.

With bent head, George trudged slowly on along the middle of the muddy road, instead of walking on the clean and almost dry side-path. His clothes were ragged, his old boots bemired, and his heart was as heavy as lead. Nature could not charm him this morning. The trees were in their May dress, and, in spite of the fog, the birds were fluttering playfully from bough to bough, and singing as though they would burst their little throats. Delicious little trills and snatches of song broke out from among the old elms, the lovely pale-green limes, and the great horse-chestnuts, with their bloomy spires just ready to burst into flower. Everything seemed to say that the sun would appear presently; but George did not heed,

He walked a mile or two, and then sat down on a broken bench by the lonely roadside, and gazed vacantly at a tall poplar standing up straight and still against the grey sky.

Should he, like a coward, pursue his way again, walking on and on, without a thought of returning, caring little what became of him, and leaving his wife and baby son to do without him as they could? Or should he, like a man, return at once, bravely face all the difficulties he had brought upon himself, and, by the help of Heaven, conquer them?

CHAPTER II.

THERE was a pony-carriage on its way towards him, but George neither saw nor heard it. And in the pony-carriage sat an old lady—a very old lady, judging from her bent shoulders and wrinkled face. She wore a big black bonnet, and she was ably driving her pony herself, while a servant in livery sat by her side.

Suddenly the pony was reined-in, with a sharp ejaculation, as of angry surprise. And George Taylor brought his eyes quickly down from the unconscious consideration of that tall, still poplar, and then, in an instant, the hot colour of shame and confusion mounted to his very brow, and he rose from the broken bench, and moved towards the pony-carriage, mechanically touching his shabby hat, and then standing still, with his eyes on the ground.

For the old lady was none other than Mrs. Waller, of the Lodge; and George had worked at her house many and many a time in the days gone by, and she knew him well. She had been absent from Oak-bridge, however, for nearly a year now, staying with one and another of her numerous family of children and grandchildren. She was returning to the Lodge this morning quite unexpectedly, and had come upon George as she was driving from the station.

"Well, George Taylor!" she exclaimed, in harsh, guttural tones; and then, with emphasis:—"But are you George Taylor, young man? Or are you a common tramp?"

But George stood as though bereft of the power of speech. And the old lady irascibly continued, "Oh, yes! You're yourself, I can see! More shame for you! And what have you done with Annie and the baby, I should like to know? A pretty sort of husband you must have proved yourself, truly, judging from the look of you!"—Here she turned suddenly upon the servant.—"John Matthews, you can get out, and walk to the house. It won't hurt you. And what I have to say to this good-for-nothing young man cannot have the slightest interest for you. And tell cook"—as the man was obeying her—"that she is to have my soup ready in five minutes from the time you get into the house. And don't you forget it, mind. I want to call and see Mr. Norris as I pass, and so I do not suppose that I shall overtake you."

John stood respectfully waiting till his mistress had finished speaking, then, with a furtive glance at George, of whom he knew very little, but with otherwise imperturbable face, he touched his hat, and walked quickly away.

And now the old lady lectured George soundly and long. And there he stood, hanging his head, with eyes still fixed upon the ground at his feet, and a hurt and shamed look on his face. And not a single word did he venture in reply to all the taunts and reproaches that the irate old lady heaped upon him. His whole bearing said, "I deserve it all." And presently the womanly heart within her began to repent of the harshness she had used. But she would not show it yet.

"I suppose you know that Susan Grey is coming to me in about a fortnight?" she continued, to all outward appearance as remorselessly as ever. "A nice thing for her, poor girl, to have to own you as her brother-in-law! And a very lucky thing for her that she has not to own you as a husband!"

George looked up at this, and there was mute reproach in his moist eyes.

"You have no work, as a matter of course?"

"No, ma'am. Mr. Norris turned me off last Saturday week." And George brought out the words with difficulty.

"You don't blame him for that, I hope?" And the old lady spoke as sharply as ever.

"No, ma'am," with a heavy sigh.

"Well, I am glad to find you have a little sense!" Then, shaking her head crossly, "But I thought you were going to the bad! Folks that find their best friends in public-houses almost always do, whether they begin by drinking too much themselves or not. I always told Annie so, a young simpleton! But she wouldn't listen to me. Of course she knew better—it stood to reason—than an old woman who was sixty years old when she was born! But what have you done with her, I asked you just now? Can't you open your mouth, man?"

In a low, pained tone, George explained to her where and how they were now living; upon which the old lady screamed out harshly—

"Friar's Court! one room! Well, I hope you are as ashamed of yourself as you look, George Taylor! and such a pretty cottage as you had, too! But you are like all the rest. You would rather spend your time and your money upon your own miserable, selfish pleasures than upon your wife and child. I suppose the truth is that you could not pay your rent? That is to say, that what with your betting or your gambling, or whatever it is you do with your money, you had none to pay? And I suppose that your furniture and everything else went the way of the rent?"

And then, in reply to still closer questioning, George at length confessed how much rent he actually owed. And the old lady held up her hands, reins, whip, and all, in angry dismay.

"Dearie me! dearie me!" she exclaimed, "what is the world coming to? And now I daresay you haven't a penny in the world, you foolish fellow!"

And in a low voice George owned that he had not.

Mrs. Waller gave her head a toss that seemed to say, "Oh, well, it is no concern of mine!" Next she flicked a fly from her pony's right ear; and finally she sat still, looking straight before her. Then, all at once, turning sharply upon George, she rejoined—

"Very well. Begin afresh with nothing, then! Better men than you have done it. In the first place, go to your master, and make a clean breast of your faults. Tell him that you are altogether ashamed of yourself, and that you wish to turn over a new leaf. Tell him that you don't like the idea of your old sweetheart coming to see her sister in such a plight, with scarcely a gown to wear, I'll be bound, or a crust to eat; and only a year and a half married!"

Here the old lady interrupted herself with some angry ejaculation under her breath, which George did not catch; then went on in her harshest tone—

"But it isn't for me to tell you what you are to tell your master. If what you say doesn't come from your heart, it won't be worth much. However, I've wasted time enough talking to you. I must be getting on. You help yourself, George Taylor! And when I see you doing that, I may help you, but not before!"

The pony-carriage had started as abruptly as it had stopped, and its occupant had not given George so much as a single word or glance of farewell. And there he stood, motionless, in the middle of the road, looking vacantly after the pretty little vehicle for at least five minutes after it had got out of sight.

CHAPTER III.

At last he returned home. His resolution was taken.

He found his wife where he had left her, sitting in deep despondency, with the baby in her arms, and the letter on the floor still. And, with eyes red and swollen with weeping, Annie rose as her husband entered, laid the little one on a miserable bed that had its place in a corner of the room, and then sat down again.

And George sat down beside her, and, taking her hand, said quietly—

"Cheer up, Annie. I am going to turn over a new leaf, Heaven helping me. And when Susie comes, she shan't find us like this! You'll forgive me, dear, I know, for all that's gone by? And we'll begin again, and work our way up to prosperity together."

Before Annie could reply, and while her eyes were still lifted to her husband's face in glad surprise, a step was heard on the stairs.

"It is Fred Miles," said George; and there was something in the very tone of his voice that encouraged Annie still further: a ring of firmness and decision that she doubted whether her husband's voice had ever taken before.

The young man who entered now did so without the ceremony of knocking. He was a good-looking young fellow, and not quite so shabby in his attire as his friend George; but there was something disreputable and ill-doing about him in his very air and manner, Annie thought, and there was no welcome for him in her face.

But he did not appear to notice this.

"Are you coming with us, old boy?" he asked of George. "Just for an hour or two," persuasively, "if you've nothing better to do?"

But George raised his hand.

"I have something better to do!" said he, and he was about to bring his clenched fist down upon the poor rickety table, with an emphatic and unqualified refusal of his friend's invitation: in which he would, without a doubt, have broken the table, and at least startled the baby. But he bethought himself in time, unclenched his hand, and allowed it to fall harmlessly by his side, and rising, said more quietly, "I'll walk down-stairs with you."

And now Annie showed herself a wise woman. She did not, as many young wives would have done in like circumstances, begin at once to beseech her husband, with tears, not to accompany the friend with whom, to his own hurt, he had so often gone before. Remembering what George had just said to her, she glanced at him with a smile (even though it was a faint one) of renewed trust and hope. And her husband returned her glance with one of affectionate reassurance. And then he accompanied Fred Miles down-stairs, and, without leaving the house, in a few words explained his intentions, the younger man listening in quiet and, at first, almost amused surprise.

George even told of Susie's expected arrival at the Lodge as housemaid, as well as of the lecture which the lady of the Lodge herself had given him less than an hour before.

And Fred Miles went away, but he appeared again in the evening, and then learned that George had been to see his former master, Mr. Norris, and that he was to go to work again on the following morning.

And Fred Miles perseveringly came again the next evening. He did not intend to lose his former friend and companion so summarily (or at all, indeed) if he could help it.

But George was out; Mrs. Waller had sent for him, to tell him that she had found employment for his evenings. The old lady had a cottage which had been standing empty for some time, and was a good deal out of repair; the garden, too, needed attention, and George gladly agreed to do his best to put all in apple-pie order.

And the next piece of news that especially concerned George and his wife was that the cook at the Lodge wished to go to her far-off northern home, to attend the wedding of her only sister; and, possibly, after that she might be required to remain for some time with her widowed mother. Her return was therefore a matter of uncertainty; and Mrs. Waller, who knew that Annie was by no means ignorant of cooking, sent for her at once, and met her with the request that she would, on the day of the cook's departure, come, husband, baby, and all, and take up her abode at the Lodge for the present. This would give George Taylor "time," as the old lady expressed it, "to turn himself round a little."

And having once given up that one miserable room in Friar's Court, George had not the slightest intention of returning to it. He was one evening thinking the matter over, as, after his tea, he was leaving the Lodge for his now accustomed work at the cottage, when Mrs. Waller met him just outside her own gates, and leaning on her silver-knobbed stick, informed him in her usual brusque way that she "wanted a tenant for the cottage," and that "he might take it, if he liked."

Finally came the evening of Susie's arrival. Little she knew the changes that her short and simply expressed letter had been the means of bringing about.

At which Susie blushed brightly. And as Fred Miles' rather anxious eyes rested upon her pretty, gentle face, he thought sorrowfully—

"Ah, she's too good for me!"

But all this was only the beginning of the end.

Seven years passed away, and Fred Miles was once again leaning over the cottage gate in the sweet June twilight. But he did not look disconsolate this evening.

"The young man who entered now did so without the ceremony of knocking."—p. 384.

Instead of finding her sister tearful and ashamed, in her wretched lodging in Friar's Court, Susie caught sight of her on the platform, as soon as the train ran into Oakbridge station—respectably and nicely dressed, and carrying her little crowing baby in her arms. And, a little later, Susie heard all the news, as she sat at tea with her sister and brother-in-law in the comfortable kitchen at the Lodge. And after tea the three went to look over the pretty cottage which was to be George and Annie's home as soon as the latter's services at the Lodge could be dispensed with. And in the early mornings, before even the birds were astir, George had already begun making more furniture.

As they were leaving the cottage, they saw a disconsolate figure leaning over the little gate.

"It is Fred Miles," said George, amusedly. "He wanted to see Susie."

"I don't see them, Susie," he was saying, with a smile.

For Susie was mistress of the cottage now, and she had been Mrs. Miles for just two years; and it was not her sister Annie's baby, but her own, that she held in her arms.

"I can hear them, though!" she answered; upon which her husband stepped back into the lane again, and looked along it.

Yes, there they were—all in the pretty little pony-carriage together, George and Annie, and their three little ones. And Susie went down to the gate to welcome them. And presently Fred got into the pony-carriage, and drove away with George, on a business errand into the next town; and Annie and Susie were left to spend an hour or two together.

The two sisters found plenty to talk about. Annie had never told Susie before, but, for some reason or other, she felt inclined to tell her this evening of the effect of her letter of a little more than seven years ago.

But though Susie listened attentively, she did not appear surprised, only pleased. And then it came out that Fred had told her long since that it had been the effect of that very letter upon George which had inclined him to consider the propriety of "turning over a new leaf" along with his friend.

Success wonderfully covers past failures. There were few persons more respected in Oakbridge now than George Taylor. He had paid all his debts long ago, and was at this time a prosperous master-builder; and Fred was his foreman and right-hand man. George had striven in a new-born faith and constant prayer to conquer himself first, and that important conquest had been the key to his success.

Years before old Mrs. Waller's death, he had stood high in her favour—principally, and in the first place, perhaps, because he had taken her severe lecture in what the old lady called "such a proper spirit." And on her will being read (only a few weeks previously), it was found that she had left him a handsome legacy, and also the little pony-carriage which she had used so constantly.

"It seems to me," rejoined Susie sententiously, as she dangled her little one in her arms, "that it is sometimes better to 'begin with nothing!'"

THE LORD WAITING TO BE GRACIOUS.—I.

BY THE REV. DANIEL MOORE, M.A., CHAPLAIN IN ORDINARY TO THE QUEEN, AND PREBENDARY OF ST. PAUL'S.

"And therefore will the Lord wait, that He may be gracious unto you."—ISAIAH XXX. 18.

THE dealings of God with the Jewish nation represent, as it were in a parable, His dealings with the individual man. Passage after passage might be quoted from this book of Isaiah, which, though having a primary and surface reference to the local and political circumstances of the Jews, fit in so exactly with the accidents and experiences of our personal life, that we could almost fancy we were listening to counsels coming directly to us from St. Peter or St. Paul.

Take the case of the Jews, in this chapter. Sore judgments had been pronounced against them. They were expecting them daily; and that in such terrible severity, as to leave them, like a warning beacon upon the top of a mountain, an ensign to rebellious peoples standing on a hill. But there is a mysterious arrest upon the course of these threatened judgments. "The High and Mighty One" is still. There is a pause. He is waiting for something. What is it? Why, He is waiting for an opportunity to recall His threatenings; waiting for such signs of a penitential spirit in the people, as may justify Him in recalling them; waiting for the fitting time when He may reveal His purposes of mercy from behind the cloud. "Therefore will the Lord wait, that He may be gracious unto you, and therefore will He be exalted, that He may have mercy upon you: for the Lord is a God of judgment: blessed are all they that wait for Him."

Limiting our attention to the first clause of this verse, we take as our general subject, THE LORD WAITING TO BE GRACIOUS; considering some of those pauses or silences in the Divine procedure, whether in the way of judgment or of mercy, by means of which He accomplishes His Fatherly designs towards us. The goodness of God is always "leading us to repentance." His rest is the activity of love; and His waiting the accelerated speed of a benefit sure to be accomplished.

I.—CONSIDER WHAT IS MEANT BY THE LORD WAITING.

THE words of the prophet bring before us a noteworthy feature of the Divine government, namely, that, in the ordering of His procedure, God sometimes waits, suspends all outward action; to our human seeming is absolutely quiescent and still. "Therefore will the Lord wait, that He may be gracious unto you." We have a like expression in the book of Zephaniah, where we read, "He will rest in His love," or, as it is there given in the margin, "He will be silent in His love." In both cases the sense is the same, namely, that there is a pause or lull in the carrying out of a fixed order of events; the vision tarries, the blessing lingers, the Lord is slack concerning His promise, at least "as some men count slackness."

Instances of this occur frequently in sacred story. Abraham receives a promise that he shall be the father of many nations. Yet old age has come upon him, and upon Sarah, and they are still childless. Simeon has a promise that he shall see the Lord's Christ; yet he has come to a full age, and is about to die "as a shock of corn cometh in his season," before his anticipations come to pass. And it is often so with us. We have been praying for lawful things, for promised things, for things which we cannot but feel would conduce to our spiritual happiness and proficiency; and, as we verily believe, to God's glory too. But, for a long time, they do not come. God is waiting for something. What is it? Enough for us should it be to know that He is waiting for His season. All promises of good to us are made in the terms of that vision to the prophet Habakkuk, "the vision is for an appointed time;" and, therefore, however long it may tarry, we may be sure it would only do us harm if it were to come before. In the kingdom of grace, as in the kingdom of nature, "God has made everything beautiful in its season," and as snow in harvest, or as a thick covering on a sultry day, might the most desired of our good things prove, if the time for their coming were left to us to choose. No: as our times are in God's hands, so God's times should have the first place in our wishes and thoughts. We must not seek to displace the Divine arrangements—a result which could only be to our hurt. If our God waits, we are sure there is some sufficient reason for His waiting; and one such reason there will always be—that He will exercise our faith in the promise, "therefore will the Lord wait, that He may be gracious unto you."

II.—THE BENEFIT OF THIS WAITING TO OURSELVES.

THIS is seen chiefly in the strengthening of our faith. This, we may not doubt, is one purpose for which God often waits and is still. He requires faith in the unchangeableness of His purpose and goodwill towards us, in spite of the most adverse appearances.

Never did things look more dark and discouraging than when Jeremiah wrote that letter to the captives in Babylon, beset, as they were, by false prophets and diviners, who had cast scorn on the assurance of Jeremiah, that they should be released at the end of seventy years. Will the good Lord hurry His purposes to put an end to all their fears and doubtings? No: He will have them exercise faith in those most precious words—how many a perplexed and troubled heart have they soothed and comforted!—"I know the thoughts that I think toward you, thoughts of peace, and not of evil, to give you an expected end." Hardly could we cite a passage in Scripture which explains the whole philosophy of God's "waiting" better than this. It reveals the Almighty heart resting in its love; silent in the certain issues of its own slowly evolving plans, "waiting to be gracious," when the fitting time shall come, and knowing that when "the expected end" is come, the graciousness will be more conspicuous for the delay. See an illustration of this in a memorable New Testament example—the raising of Lazarus. The Lord Jesus is walking in Peræa. A messenger meets Him with an announcement from the two sisters at Bethany, "Lord, behold, he whom Thou lovest is sick." Yet, when we look that He should bend His course instantly to that house of sorrow, to bind up the hearts that are broken, and to snatch from death his prey, all we are told is, that "when He had heard that Lazarus was sick, He abode two days 'in the same place where He was.'" Oh! to what end was this delay? Wherefore, when a word from those Divine lips would have sufficed, must the lamp of life go out, and loving sisters mourn, and the grave be opened for its victim, and friends, from far and near, come to share in the lone one's sorrow? Surely this was the Lord, according to His promise, "giving the expected end"—making known the thoughts that, amidst all His silences and delays, He is ever thinking towards us—in a word, God waiting His fitting time to be gracious.

And this is to be the form of comfort we should take to ourselves, under all the Divine silences; under delayed answers to prayer, delayed succours in difficulty, delayed interferences in our behalf, even when the sore cross, the secret bitterness, the daily stumbling-block, the bewailed infirmity, the harassing thorn in the flesh, all remain untaken away—hindering, as we think, God's work in the world, and in our own hearts too. But God is waiting, and He will have us wait too. Mercies waited for are mercies twice blessed. God's resting time is man's working time; the time when the sufferer is to gather in his harvest-fruit of faith, and patience, and trust, and resistance to hard thoughts, and victory over the suggestions of carnal expediency, until his spirit, rising like a thing majestic, above earthly discouragements, is bold to exclaim, with the patriarch of old, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him." We should remember that the compassions of God are never more profound and tender than when He answers us "not a word;" when with gracious thoughts of heart He is waiting in silence. He may be silent to Job, weeping, in sackcloth and ashes, over the ruin of every earthly hope; silent to Daniel, mourning for three full weeks over the calamities of his country; silent to the Canaanitish mother, pursuing Him on the high road with her piercing and unresting cries; silent to Paul, humbled and afflicted under the continuance of the sharp and bitter thorn; but in all these cases, it is but the reticence and reserve of the Divine heart, yearning, struggling, debating with itself as to when it shall interfere to show mercy. Relief that comes too soon is no relief. "Therefore will the Lord wait, that He may be gracious unto you."

III.—THE WAITING OF GOD—A LONG-SUFFERING WAITING.

THIS brings out another aspect of the waiting spoken of by the prophet, namely, that it is the waiting of a merciful forbearance—a gracious God staying His hand from a deserved condemnation, in order that He may bring us to a better mind.

"Therefore will the Lord wait, that He may be gracious unto you, and therefore will He be exalted, that He may have mercy upon you: for the Lord is a God of judgment." A God of judgment, but still a waiting God; ay, to our limited powers of vision, almost a hesitating God. "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? How shall I deliver thee, Israel?" Anyhow, before the judgment takes effect, there is a waiting, a merciful postponement of an intended purpose: "For my name's sake will I defer mine anger, and for my praise will I refrain for thee, that I cut thee not off." And examples abound in Scripture of the manner in which God suspends or keeps back a deserved correction, in the hope that love may do the work instead. "Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be overthrown," it had been said. The forty days expire, and Nineveh lives on: mercy rejoicing against judgment, and the touching spectacle of a whole population on its knees before God seeming to disarm the wrath of Heaven. After the numbering of the people, in the time of David, the angel of the pestilence is proceeding to flap his dark wings over Jerusalem to destroy it. But there is an arrest. A voice from the throne proclaims, "It is enough: stay now thine hand." Judgment waits; waits, that God may show mercy.

And the same thing takes place, though it be not ours to know it, in regard to deferred sentences and judgments against ourselves. We none of us know how many of us are, at this moment, living upon reprieves, upon respites, obtained for us through the all-prevailing intercessions of the Lord Jesus. "Lord, let it alone this year also," was the prayer which, as this year began, went up for many an unfruitful tree in the Lord's vineyard; many whom neither light, nor love, nor grace vouchsafed, nor abounding privileges, had availed to stir up to serious thoughts about their souls. But still the Lord waits, defers the cutting down. Better the experiment be tried, with this barren professor, of giving him more light, more grace, more strivings of the Spirit, more warnings to flee from the wrath to come, and see what the fruit of this extended forbearance will be. The Lord, who is "not slack concerning His promises," is slow concerning His judgments; and, on observing in us the smallest desire to humble ourselves, will put them off again and again. "Therefore doth the Lord wait, that He may be gracious unto you."

IV.—GOD'S LOVE THE SOURCE OF THIS WAITING.

THIS is a view of these comfortable words of the prophet which we shall be glad not to overlook. We have seen what it is God waits FOR; let us never forget what it is He waits IN—that is, on what He relies, in order that His working may be effectual. This is on nothing in us—we are sure of that. He waits in the conscious strength of His own attracting love. God is working while He is waiting. "He will rest in His love," it is said in that passage in Zephaniah; and again in the prophet Hosea we read, "I drew them with cords of a man, with bands of love." True it is, as we know, God could draw us to Himself in many ways. He could awe us into submission, or coerce us into obedience, or crush and bow us down by chastisements, until we had not spirit to oppose Him left. But He will not employ these means. He will work by love. He will rely on the effects of that wonder-working power. He knows what is in man, and that it must be a sight of God, if anything, that will draw men unto Him. He may use other arguments with us also—may urge the honour of His law, the holiness of His nature, the unalterable requirements of a pure and perfect administration: but that in which He rests, for effectually turning the hearts of the sons of men, is a display of "the exceeding riches of His grace in His kindness towards us through Jesus Christ."

At sight of these, applied by the power of the enlightening and converting Spirit, the sinner, even the most far gone, weeps, wonders, bows down, adores. His soul is melted, not by the thought of "hell from beneath being moved" for him, nor of the dead "stirred up to meet him," but by the amazing fact that God should so love the world, and especially should so love him. The awakened and grateful soul begins to see from what it has escaped. And the spared life, and the lengthened opportunity, and the revived hope, and the sight of heaven open, and of a gracious God waiting—all these affect the heart more powerfully than any displays of the Divine anger could do. For we ask ourselves,

Why have I been spared until now? Why was I left, for so many years, without ever feeling my need of a Saviour, and then, it may be, for so many more before I felt that Christ was the Saviour for my need? But I see it now. I owe it all to the Divine patience; the heart of God holding itself still in its own kind thoughts. My sins had cried aloud for judgment.

But rod, scourge, furnace, vials, all had it in charge to tarry the Lord's leisure. For a time, and times, and half a time, the chastisements of God lingered. Whence this pause, and wherefore all this merciful delay? It was that that Scripture might be fulfilled: "Therefore will the Lord wait, that He may be gracious unto you."

THE RISE OF SPECIAL MISSIONS IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

AN INTERVIEW WITH THE REV. W. HAY M. H. AITKEN.

BY OUR SPECIAL COMMISSIONER.

MR. AITKEN'S STUDY.

LOOKING over the pleasant houses and gardens of a newly built suburb on to the levels and low-lying hills round the thriving town of Bedford, stands a tall, broad-shouldered gentleman, whose face must be familiar to many thousands of Britons as that of the Rev. W. Hay M. H. Aitken, the well-known mission preacher.

On his right hand, as he stands at his wide study window, is a large writing-table with numbers of pigeon-holes and drawers; behind him a sweet-toned American organ; near by, a couch; and on his left hand a book-case, one ledge of which is denominated the "heresy shelf." Yet more books—metaphysical, philosophical, religious, etc.—are ranged opposite the window; while portraits of old and well-loved friends, such as the late Rev. W. Pennefather and Mrs. Pennefather, of Mildmay, the late Lord Cairns and Lady Cairns, among other pictures, look down from the walls or from photograph stands.

Here is Mr. Aitken at home. Yet we are not sure that he does not accomplish quite as much of his thought-work when he is pacing his large garden and tennis-ground behind the house, or when in his "Hermitage"—a little "box" built in the garden, and very quiet and comfortable. It is here, we suspect, even more than indoors, that he has thought out or written most of his stirring sermons and addresses since 1880, before which time he resided at a charming spot in Derbyshire. For if the truth must be told, the study in the house is below the nursery, and though "the patter of little feet" and the sound of childish voices are very sweet in a father's ears, yet quiet is at times essential for the man who has constantly to address large numbers of his fellows on the momentous subjects of true religion.

Furthermore, this work in the open air is, we take it, characteristic of Mr. Aitken. He rejoices in it, and possibly it colours his addresses, which are for mission work, usually earnest practical appeals both to head and heart, rather than critical or theological essays savouring of the lamp. Moreover, in the summer he loves to take a turn at tennis with his elder sons, one of whom, by-the-bye, has in this year of 1888 just completed his first term at Oxford.

Now if we are permitted to enter the dining-room we may notice a large portrait there which gives some indication, and possibly some explanation also, of Mr. Aitken's position. The portrait reveals the figure of a preacher; a strange light striking out of the gloom above and falling on his upturned face. It represents Mr. Aitken's father, the late Rev. Robert Aitken, preaching to drovers in Liverpool in the early morning. And to him, with one or two others, belongs the credit of starting or establishing the movement for holding "Special Missions" in the Church of England.

On the other wall, facing the French windows opening on to the garden, is a fine painting of Mr. Hay Aitken himself—upon whom, indeed, his father's mantle may be said to have fallen—presented to his wife a few years since from many persons who had derived benefit from his preaching.

His father, he tells us, was a Church of England clergyman at Pendeen, in Cornwall. When at one period of his life in the Isle of Man, he derived much spiritual benefit from the preaching of some Methodists, and naturally he liked to work with them and make use of some of their methods. So it came about that when at Pendeen he was at times in the habit of sallying forth from his retired Cornish home, and holding special services in different places. In fact, he was called by some persons a High Church Methodist.

To use Mr. Aitken's own words, "Mission services held with after-meetings distinctly designed to induce immediate decision for Christ, were introduced to the Church of England by the Rev. Robert Aitken, who took the idea to a great extent from his work among the Wesleyans. I have hardly gone to any large town in England without seeing results of his work."

"Mark Guy Pearse said to me yesterday, 'In Wesley's "Questions and Answers for a Sensible Man" he asks the question, What is a reason for Wesleyan Methodism? and the answer is, To provoke to emulation the clergy of the Church of England!'"

When a youth of seventeen Mr. Hay Aitken went on a visit to his maternal uncle, Hay Macdowall Grant, of Arndilly, a most excellent and godly man, who was at that time just about to start on a mission to the North of Scotland. Brownlow North was to accompany him, but at the last moment was unable to do so. Mr. Aitken went and took some part in the work.

The mission proved very successful, and long afterwards a man came up to him at the close of a meeting and spoke of the benefit he had received from the preaching of Mr. Aitken when a youth, on that occasion, at Thurso. Such instances are among the happy rewards of such a life.

Returning from that mission, however, he soon went to Oxford, entering Wadham College. But while there he engaged much in evangelistic work in a little mission-room placed at his disposal by a lady; and at the close of his college course he had offers of no fewer than eighteen curacies, and also an application to sit for a fellowship!

"That was a time of some perplexity, but," said Mr. Aitken, "after much prayer the way seemed open." Now among those who had heard of his evangelistic gifts was the Rev. W. Pennefather, of St. Jude's, Mildmay, and he went to the Rev. Robert Aitken in Cornwall before offering his curacy. The ultimate result was acceptance of the post. "My father said to me," Mr. Aitken tells us, "I think if I were you I should go. Your views may not quite coincide, but he is a holy man, and you will have full spiritual sympathy with him."

So Mr. Aitken entered on his ministerial career as Mr. Pennefather's curate, and his evangelistic gifts had there full scope. He was placed in charge of a large iron hall, where evangelistic meetings and after-meetings were constantly held. The service on the Sunday morning was liturgical, and ultimately it was so in the evening, but not at first. But Mr. Aitken had here a large class of working men, and there can be little doubt that the constant communication he had with them has helped to give him the aptitude he has in dealing with men.

He went to Mildmay in 1865, and four years after, while he was still with Mr. Pennefather, the celebrated Twelve Days' London Mission of 1869—the first of the kind in the metropolis—took place. Its story may be briefly told. It forms another step in the history of that mission movement in the Church of England with which the Revs. Robert and Hay Aitken have been so closely identified. The work of the first-mentioned had excited much attention in more than one section of the Church. Some men had obtained benefit, and, says Mr. Aitken, they began to see the necessity of this sort of work in order to infuse vitality into their Church principles. Men like Bishop Wilkinson, of Truro—then vicar of St. Peter's, Windmill Street—and Bishop MacLagan, of Lichfield, took it up warmly. That was before Messrs. Moody and Sankey's work, and no doubt it helped to pave the way and prepare the minds of many people for their visit.

Well, Mr. Aitken took a great part in that first London Mission. Afterwards he found his services as a mission preacher more and more called for. The first mission he conducted entirely was at Stroud, in Gloucestershire. Then, towards the close of the year 1869, came a very remarkable mission at Swansea, when business was almost suspended, the interest was so great; and his father, brother, and himself were the three principal missionaries. That mission seemed to decide his career, and since then he has had no lack of invitations to conduct special missions, though it was not until some years afterwards that he gave up a stated pastorate in order to devote himself entirely to the work.

Meanwhile, however, Mr. Aitken had left St. Jude's. In January, 1871, he accepted the incumbency of Christ Church, Everton, Liverpool, offered him by the Messrs. Horsfall Brothers, and he remained there four and a half years.

This experience at Liverpool was of much the same kind as at Mildmay. The district was densely populated. There, 13,000 people were packed into thirty-six acres of ground, and his work was all mission work. Well supported by some of the wealthy men of the city, among them the late Mr. Alexander Balfour, he raised a large new mission hall at a cost of about £5,000, from which has since sprung a new church.

All this time the applications to conduct missions had been frequent, and the thought at length came to be seriously considered whether he should give up the work of a stated pastorate and devote himself entirely to the work of conducting special missions.

Mr. Moody suggested that he should enter upon such a course. But it was the state of Mrs. Aitken's health which finally decided him. She became ill, and physicians said she could not hope to regain strength at Liverpool. This, together with other considerations, seemed to decide the matter, and in the autumn of 1875 he resigned the incumbency of Christ Church, and went to reside at Homeside, Hazelwood, in Derbyshire, which had been placed at his disposal. Since then he has devoted himself to mission work in connection with the Church of England.

The views of such a clergyman—one with such long and varied experience—must be of great value on this subject; and concerning the influence of mission work upon conduct, he said—

"I always insist upon the necessity of repentance, especially during the opening sermons of a mission. During the first few days I devote myself to this point, endeavouring to speak about sin in its specific form, and impressing the necessity of a definite decision to forsake sin as the primary condition of the acceptance of any spiritual benefit. Of course it is to the power of God in Christ Jesus that I look for the power to overcome sin, but this can only be obtained by those who are willing to be delivered from it."

"I remember," he said again, "an incident which will illustrate this. On one occasion I was conducting a mission in a northern town, and, as I heard afterwards, a man was much affected. He had been leading an immoral life—there was scarcely a racecourse in the North on which he had not betted and gambled." He had, "drifted" into this church "somehow," or—may we not say?—Providence had led him there, and as he sat and heard Mr. Aitken his past life seemed to rise before him. He was broken down, yet he tried to leave the church. Someone, however, seeing his red eyes, said—

"Friend, you ought not to leave yet;" and led him to a seat and talked and prayed with him. He became converted, and led quite a changed life; now he is the superintendent of a Sunday-school in that town.

As to the best means of conducting missions: "I attach," said Mr. Aitken, "great importance to the after-meeting. My theory is, 'Strike the iron while it is hot.' My dear father used to say, 'In the parable of the sower the devil cometh immediately, and we must endeavour to anticipate him.' The impression made by a powerful sermon runs a risk of being neutralised before the man impressed reaches his home, by half a dozen chance circumstances; but if it is no sooner made than an opportunity is made for acting upon it, the impression may deepen into a true conversion."

"The satisfactoriness of a mission will largely depend upon the preparation before, and the following-up of the work afterwards. At least two months before, the preparations should begin, and should take the form of special meetings for prayer, special allusions from the pulpit, and special house-to-house visitation, accompanied with the distribution of suitable papers. The great point is to get the communicants to feel it is their mission, and to get them to throw themselves into it. It often happens that a mission is half over before they take an interest in it."

"Are the results of missions permanent?" we asked.

"A great deal must depend upon the character of the local ministry. Much good may be done that is not apparent in connection with it. The work is quite as permanent as ordinary parochial work when of an evangelistic character. The local clergy should, however, take means to retain those who may be influenced. Now, I remember on one occasion, when some clergymen were discussing the question of having a mission, one rose and said—

"My dear brethren, I should advise you not to have a mission. I had one not very long ago, and seventeen professed to have been converted. What was the result? At the end of a few months they all left me!"

"Now," said Mr. Aitken, "that was because he had not done anything to retain them, and they went to other churches." Mr. Aitken is strongly of opinion that after a mission it is very important to obtain the names and addresses of those influenced by the mission, and form them into a communicants' union, having meetings once a month and a definite roll-call, so that the clergyman may know how they are keeping together. Bible-readings should also be arranged, that persons of different education, etc., should be classified together. In one of the most effective missions, he said, no less than twenty-eight different Bible-classes were formed as the result. And when the vicar resigned, a few years later, he was able to say that he did not think one person had fallen away. But when the clergyman does not follow up the mission, or is unsympathetic and takes no means of attracting or keeping to the church those who have been benefited, we cannot be surprised if the result seems to be unsatisfactory.

"What is the necessity for a mission?"

"In all human work," he answered, "there is a tendency to get into a rut. There is danger of losing our lives for lack of a crisis. Everything in a mission is done to arouse attention and fix the decision."

Speaking further of the results of mission work, and also of the true and the false emotionalism in such work, he said:—"My experience leads me to the conclusion that the permanent results of a mission will usually be in an inverse ratio to the amount of what I should call the physical excitement induced. I draw a distinction between physical excitement and the legitimate and natural stirring of human emotions by the presentation of great truths. Some evangelists seem to me to depend too much upon the sentimental and emotional elements. The strength of our work must always lie in the reaching of the conscience, in the enlightening of the understanding, and thus in the exposing of the will to the full force of the influence of God the Holy Ghost.

"My own sermons are usually addressed to the head, to begin with. I generally endeavour to support by a process of reasoning any truth which I wish to impress upon the minds of the hearers; and then, when I think I have their minds on my side, I use all the power that God gives me to move their hearts.

"Nothing can be more absurd, to my thinking, than the parrot-cry against emotionalism. All true religion must be emotional.

"The thing to aim at is to see that emotions are caused by the acceptance of truth, not merely created by histrionic influence. It is possible by a touching story to bring tears into the eyes of the audience, and people may mistake such feelings for religious impressions. The unskilful evangelist will be content with such results. People are moved, and there is an end of it. Real wisdom is shown in taking advantage of any such passing feeling in order to press home the truth illustrated. The wax needs to be melted in order to receive the impress of the seal, but we melt it, not for the sake of melting it, but in order to prepare it for the stamp."

During the many years that Mr. Aitken has been engaged in this work, he has, of course, conducted missions in numerous towns, particularly in the old parish churches of our country, and in the cathedrals also. He is, we believe, the only mission-preacher who has conducted services in Canterbury Cathedral, in York Minster, and in the cathedrals of Manchester and Bristol. In the summer of 1886, too, he went on a long evangelistic tour in America.

He also enjoys the distinction of being the only clergyman who has preached in the Guildhall of London. He did so on two occasions, on the 18th and 22nd of October, 1878. He was at that time giving addresses for five consecutive weeks at Exeter Hall in the evening, and preaching to business men in the mornings at St. Margaret's, Lothbury. Some friends waited on the Lord Mayor, Sir Thomas Scambler Owden, and asked if he could have the Guildhall!

The Lord Mayor replied that he had no reason against it; the Hall was for meetings—among others, to promote the morality of the people; and he supposed Mr. Aitken could do that! But if the meeting was held, he should be obliged to be present; and come he did, in his robes of state. Mr. Aitken preached there, however, and in his note-book he penned the following entry: "A very solemn feeling aroused, and a great impression seemed made; crowded with people, mostly men."

Mr. Aitken has often been permitted to see or hear of many happy fruits of his labour, some of which, indeed, might be said to belong to the romance of special-mission work. When preaching one evening, he told us, in a large manufacturing town in Yorkshire, a young lady seemed much broken down; one of the lady-workers spoke to her, and after a time she admitted that she wished to decide for Christ, but she was warmly attached to a young man, who, she feared, would not marry her if she became pious. But at length she determined to conquer even this temptation, and she then left the church.

In another part of the building a young man was also much affected, and after one of the workers had been speaking to him he admitted that he would become converted, but he was much attached to a young lady, who, he feared, would throw him over if he became religious. At length he too decided for Christ, no matter what it cost! Then he too left the church.

These two met outside. They had each, unknown to the other, been to the mission the same evening, and had been through a similar experience. "They are to-day," said Mr. Aitken, "happily married, and both devoted Christians. Such a story is enough to make the angels sing!" And we doubt not he himself has often sung in his heart for very joy over those he has been enabled to win over to truth and righteousness of life.

NOTES OF CHRISTIAN LIFE AND WORK IN ALL FIELDS.

THE SMUGGLER'S CARGO.

HE Rev. Mark Guy Pearse told in a sermon of a boatman with whom he went fishing, and who joined him in greeting the daylight with the Morning Hymn. "Ah," said the man, "I could not have done that in the past; I did not feel like singing hymns when the day was breaking." And he told how in the past he had belonged to a smuggling crew, and how one day they saw the Government boat giving chase, and their one hope was in throwing all the cargo overboard, lest that which would convict them should be discovered; they preferred to surrender the cargo rather than run the risk of imprisonment. At last, just as they were thinking that nothing that could lead to trouble would now be found on board, the hopeless cry was raised, "It's floating—it won't sink!" And there, in the wake of their vessel, and in sight of the Government officials, floated the incriminating cargo that the waves would not engulf! But it is not so with the evil that the heart abandons as it looks up to Christ. The tempter sometimes whispers to us that our sins are unpardonable, and such as must drive us to despair—we have known cases in which, in an hour of physical weakness, those who love the Master have been assailed with the conviction that He will not forgive them, and they are lost. But, whatever the tempter or our own depressed natures may suggest, let us understand that there is nothing between the seeking soul and the Redeemer—let us believe the words of Scripture—"Their sins and iniquities will I remember no more." "He will subdue our iniquities; and Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea."

CHRISTIAN WORK ALONG THE LINE.

It is well known that railway men have peculiar temptations to intemperance. So many are willing to "stand treat," and think to warm and strengthen them for a coming journey by alcoholic liquor. This mistaken kindness is dangerous alike to the passengers and the men themselves, who, as a rule, would much prefer that the "treating" took some other form. Why, we heard the other day of a young sailor who, sensibly deciding he could not possibly stand the "glasses" circulating among friends when on shore, made a practice of sipping cold water, those around being satisfied he was able to take spirits like the rest. It is a pity the boy was not brave enough to own what was in his glass, and it is a pity that all our railway employees cannot say "No" when the offer of "treating" is made by some thoughtless passenger. We remember a stalwart, fine-looking guard, for many years in the service of a company, who gradually sank in the esteem of his employers solely owing to strong drink, and who was heart-broken at last at having to give up the place he had held so long. But how could an intemperate guard be trusted? The Railway Mission has now become a great movement, and we are thankful to note that it works on evangelistic and temperance lines, circulating pure literature, establishing libraries, coffee-rooms, etc. Railway servants are often prevented from attending ordinary places of worship; hence the need of spiritual and moral effort to be put forth specially on their behalf. The various mission branches are nurseries to the churches, and are working hard to counteract atheism and other harmful influences. Scotch and Irish lines report good progress, and India and Africa now ask help for their railway men likewise.

"Have you got a bunch left?"—p. 396.

CHURCH HISTORY.

Mr. Tozer's "Church and the Eastern Empire" (Longmans) fitly follows Mr. Carr's able work on the "Church and the Roman Empire." The story of the "Great Schism" between the Eastern and Western Churches is related by Mr. Tozer in clear and concise language. He explains the question with sufficient fulness, and yet without overburdening the mind of the ordinary reader with non-essential details or side-issues. Mr. Wakeman's "Church and the Puritans," in the same excellent series, although marred by a few passing expressions of private opinion with which many of our readers will hardly agree, is nevertheless a very valuable and interesting manual, and deserves to be widely read.

A CHILD'S QUESTION.

A pastor related of a little child that, pondering in her heart concerning the Lord to whom she prayed, she came to her mother with the question, "Is Jesus like anybody I know?" And, in all reverence, we, who move amid Christian surroundings, should be able to answer "Yes" to a question like this from little lips. Are there not those helping and praying for the children who in some degree picture Him whose arms were stretched out to bless and comfort them? A more vital question is this—Am I myself mirroring Jesus, if only to some little child? or is His light in me obscured, so that the fact that I name His name hinders, rather than promotes, His glory? We know the tale of the little one who objected to entering heaven because mamma said that grandpapa, who was always so irritable, would, of course, go there. Would that everyone who stands out upon the Lord's side would carry His spirit into the home circle, the little things of daily life, the lesser domestic worries, in which the eyes of children and servants, and perchance many others, are upon us—influenced by our example, and helped or hindered by our bearing. A child should see God mirrored in its mother's face; our Sunday-schools should get some glimpse of the Eternal Love from the teacher's heart and looks. This can come only as we tarry at the mercy-seat, as we keep our own gaze Christward.

A BIBLE FLOWER MISSION.

In connection with Miss MacPherson's Home of Industry, Commercial Street, Spitalfields, there is a flower and text mission, of which Miss C. R. Stock is hon. secretary. Many hospitals, unions, etc., are regularly visited, and City Missionaries and Bible-women are supplied with these sweet messages for distribution among the courts and lodging-houses of the East End. The visitors tell of many interesting cases where the flowers and Scripture comfort have brought help and hope. We hear of an invalid widow, left with a young family, in whose lap was placed a bunch of snowdrops, for her hands were too weak to hold them; she is most grateful for the gift and word of sympathy, and loves to hear of Jesus. A lovely rose is given to a paralytic, who drinks in the messages of God's Word; a little bouquet of sweet carnations is borne to another sufferer, who, listening to the texts of comfort repeated by her side, cries out, "What a God-send! what a God-send! These sweet flowers make me think of my little garden at home. Will you pray for me?" The visitor did so, and left her calmed and quieted. This suffering wife and mother afterwards made a good recovery. A visitor relates that as she left the infirmary, wearied out, one hot day a man came up in the corridor, asking, "Have you got a bunch left?"—"Yes, here are sweet peas and mignonette for you."—"Don't you remember me?" he said. "I used to be in the front ward, and you gave me a Testament." With a bright smile, he told how he had found the Saviour, and the glad news chased away all the visitor's fatigue. Country friends with flower-gardens can greatly help this ministry of love, and Christian ladies in town can assist by tying up nosegays, etc. Patterns of text-cards and further information will be gladly furnished by the Secretary of the Mission.

AT HOME AND AT SCHOOL.

Although "Grace Abounding" was written some twelve or fourteen years before "The Pilgrim's Progress," its fame has been eclipsed by it and its companion work, "The Holy War." But it is a useful book, and we are glad to welcome a new edition (Hodder and Stoughton) of it, edited by Dr. John Brown, of Bedford—Bunyan's own town. Of the unillustrated editions of Bunyan's works, that of which this is the third volume is undoubtedly the best we have seen. A much cheaper and less ambitious edition of "Grace Abounding" is issued in "Cassell's National Library," among whose latest volumes we are glad to see Mrs. Piozzi's "Anecdotes of Dr. Johnson," and the wittily-wise "Table Talk" to be popular with the little ones, and deservedly so, for the children she pictures for us are always genuine children, in thought and word and deed. The same publishers send us two other stories by writers whose work needs no recommendation to readers of THE QUIVER—"Daddy's Boy," by L. T. Meade, and "Rider's Leap," by the Rev. Frederick Langbridge. These are both admirable stories. Longfellow's "Prose Works" have never been so popular as his verse, but, now that Messrs. Cassell have given them a place in the "Red Library," we trust many of our readers will learn their true value and interest. The Books of Joshua and Judges are full of valuable and suggestive lessons, and we are glad to see that the Rev. J. Gurney Hoare has collected a series of very useful lesson-notes on these two books for Messrs. Nisbet. His work is invaluable to teachers. Mr. Elliot Stock is the publisher of a thoughtful study of the poet Wordsworth's life and work, from the pen of Mr. J. M. Sutherland. Mr. Sutherland is evidently a warm admirer of the poet; and we heartily commend his work to those who are entering on this fruitful field of literary study.

"FRESH SPRING AIR!"

We would fain join our protest to the appeal that of late has risen afresh against the careless ventilation of schools, places of worship, etc. Often the gas is lighted early to impart warmth, and, while the devotional meeting is in progress, a sense of depression steals over our senses, and our energies become enfeebled and stupefied. "Please give me air!" cried of John Selden. Of children's books there are few more charming writers than Mrs. Molesworth. Her latest story, "The Palace in the Garden," which appeared originally in Little Folks, is now issued in a pretty volume by Messrs. Ha'chards, and is sure a preacher once in our hearing, finding his position in the pulpit unbearably tropical; eager friends rushed to do his bidding, and windows on both sides were flung open, thus placing everybody in a most effective draught at once. Because we are spiritually minded, there is no need for us to be ignorant or negligent as to the matters of heating, ventilation, etc. We do not want to improve people morally at the expense of their health, and they cannot get much good from discourses to which they listen in a sleepy, languid condition. Anybody coming in fresh from the pure air feels acutely the condition of a thronged, ill-

"In whose lap was placed a bunch of snowdrops."—p. 395.

Christlike summons this from such as have parks, and farms, and fields, and pleasant gardens! Some were tired out with toil, and could only sleep, but all wondered at the gentleness of the ladies who waited upon them, contrasting their quiet ways with their own scolding tones. Some of them had never seen a lady before, but had struggled up anyhow from baby- ventilated hall, where poison is being gradually inhaled; and because those present have become used to the atmosphere, it is not really less harmful to them. We all love and appreciate the blessing of fresh air. Some of the children in our schools get little of it at home; let us introduce them to its benefits when under our charge. Of course a draught must be avoided, but there are many simple plans of providing both for inlet and outlet of air, and it is our duty, as stewards of the health God has given us, to see that our mission-halls, etc., provide for the supply of the oxygen continuously needed.

A WORK-GIRL'S PLEASURE.

"Oh! gift of God, oh! perfect day, Wherein shall no man work, but play!"

So sings the poet, and all of us have felt at times, beneath a blue canopy of smiling sky, with nature awaking to music and sunshine, that we must put by the "daily round, the common task," and go out amid the meadows and the woods. A holiday snatched like this is very sweet, only we feel, looking round on sunlit hedges, that we want all London—the London of factory and work-room and garret—to share the fresh air with us, and to realise what spring and summer mean. The Y.W.C.A. (16, Old Cavendish Street, W.) tells of a party of girls from city factories invited to spend a day in the country—a hood. "It was like heaven," they said next day; "we never expected to have been so happy in our lives." Well may the Y.W.C.A. workers ask, Is not such pleasure worth giving and enjoying! for surely those London girls gained an upward step in the pure country air. It has often been said, "Such girls are a difficult class to deal with. Many of them are haughty, conceited, vain, impatient of control, and inclined to titter at words of advice." But one who thoroughly understands the class said once to a novice in such work, "Get to love them first, and then let the girls see you do love them; this is the magic key to their hearts." And the words proved true of those factory-girls referred to above. Afterwards they were heard to say, "The love of those ladies made us think that Jesus cares for us."

"PREVENTION IS BETTER THAN CURE."

A mission-hall movement in the neighbourhood of Finsbury Park has resulted now in an institute for working-lads, comprising class-rooms, library, club-room, etc., and accommodating about a hundred and twenty boys. There is wide need of the multiplication of such buildings, for, as Mr. Hill (of the Whitechapel Institute) remarked, "It is better to have boys Christianised as youngsters than to allow years of sin to intervene before the good work." Great is the rejoicing in heaven when a hardened sinner sees the error of his ways; but what must that rejoicing be when young lives are won for God and good in the blossom of their days, and with all the promise of energetic service before them? In no sense does it pay to leave young lives alone. We read once of a gentleman who objected to the idea of "prejudicing the young towards religion;" he would fain that they grew up naturally, and chose or rejected religious ideas for themselves in years of ripe experience. A friend once brought this gentleman into his garden, which was disfigured by weeds, and was in a wild, neglected state. "Why have you done nothing to this plot of ground?" asked the visitor, in surprise.—"Oh, I left it to nature: why should I prejudice my garden towards flowers? I just left it alone—these weeds are the result." Our friends at Finsbury Park do not mean to leave the boys alone, but to care for their leisure alike as regards their bodies and their minds. Mr. Hill said he had been told that Sunday-schools met the want of such institutes, and his own place at Whitechapel had been confounded with Dr. Barnardo's work: now he thought the institute was something between Dr. Barnardo and the Y.M.C.A., and represented a great want of the age. It is a pity that some of our fine Sunday-school buildings are not used more largely on week-evenings; the week-day association of teachers and taught in recreative and instructive communion here would do much to retain elder scholars, and to deepen attachment to the school. It is the custom with certain people, who object to boys, to speak as though boyhood were the incarnation of mischief and evil. We have personally dealt with boys for many a long year, and we vouch for it that they are not hopeless or fruitless, if only we have managed to reach their hearts.

ON THE STUDY TABLE.

A series of addresses on "Elijah, and the Secret of his Power," recently delivered by the Rev. F. B. Meyer, B.A., at Leicester, has been re-published in a handy volume by Messrs. Morgan and Scott. Eloquent and earnest, as is all Mr. Meyer's work, this volume of addresses will be found useful by all teachers, whether of old or young. "The Knowledge of the Holy" is the title of an admirable work by the Rev. Frederick Whitfield, containing many suggestive chapters—perhaps none more so than that on "Spiritual Expansion." Messrs. Nisbet are the publishers of Mr. Whitfield's volume, and also of "The Songs of the Apocalypse," a pretty series of thoughtful meditations on the seven songs. Mr. Elliot Stock sends us a poetical version of "The Story of the Cross," by Mr. Charles Nash. We do not think there is any overwhelming demand for such a version, but, in any case, we regret that Mr. Nash was not better advised than to go to the expense of paper and print for such very ordinary verse. "Christ the Key of the Psalter" (Elliot Stock) is a striking work, dealing largely with a neglected portion of Scripture study—the titles of the Psalms. There is food for much meditation in this useful book, which we regret we cannot refer to at greater length. An ingenious idea is at the root of Dr. Pierson's little work on "The Key-Words of the Bible" (Hodder and Stoughton), in which key-words are pointed out for each of the books of the Bible. These key-words strike most effectually the notes of the various books, and should be very valuable and rich in suggestion to teachers.

SEEMING FAILURE.

It is not given to all of us to behold at once the expected fruits of Christian service. We do right to pray, and wait, and look for such; but we must remember that our all-wise Father sometimes "moves in a mysterious way," and performs His miracles of grace in a manner and at a time different from our own expectations. Our human ideas too often write failure where God sees fruit. Praying parents, perhaps, are taken hence while their children seem still estranged from the Saviour; and, in later years, those children cry out in their hearts, "Oh, could my mother have only known!" as they return like wanderers to the fold. Surely the believing father and mother do know and understand, amid cloudless ways, that no cry has ever yet gone heavenward in vain. Even the prayers that seem utterly lost are treasured in the presence of the King; for do we not read that in the Heavenly City there are "golden vials full of odours, which are the prayers of saints"? Sometimes, where we should imagine it most unlikely, good is wrought in unexpected quarters. A young student preached a grandiloquent sermon—depressing to the listeners—on "The Lord Jesus Christ in relation to the metaphysics of the soul;" and these words he repeated with emphasis. That effort must have seemed a failure to most; but one poor old woman went home quite rejoiced and comforted, for the preacher had reminded her, she said, that Jesus is meat and physic to the soul. And so He is—and even the poor young preacher's mistaken pomposity did not preach His name without fruit. The case is on record of a lad, aged fifteen, who heard a solemn and impressive address, and who was spared to a very advanced age. At the age of a hundred he was still hale enough to work on his farm in America: and, musing there, one day, of the past, the preacher's earnest manner and the truth he uttered flashed back upon him, and proved the means of guiding the old man's feet into the ways of peace. Let us not be discouraged if we seem to fail where others succeed; let us rejoice in their joy, doing faithfully, trustfully, lovingly, the little we can do for our Master, and leaving the rest to Him. Results are under His control: still do we seem to hear His voice above our impatient questionings: "What is that to thee? Follow thou, Me."

"What though we seem to stumble?

He will not let us fall:

And learning to be humble

Is not lost time at all."

WHAT THEY DO AT GIFFORD HALL.

In the densely populated neighbourhood of the Caledonian Road, Islington, there is a mission at work that is ceaselessly striving to brighten and uplift the lives of those around. Money and workers alike are needed here. One of the most active spirits in connection with the operations of Gifford Hall is

Mr. Benjamin Clarke, well known as the friend of children, and foremost in the interests of Sunday-school work. Of late he has been laid by through illness: but may he soon be strengthened to return to the post he has held so long—that of superintendent of the Gifford Hall school. This mission has many and varied ways of imparting blessing to the neighbourhood; besides the religious services, there are temperance societies, a penny bank, sick club, gymnasium, infants' play-room, soup kitchen, swimming association, etc.—in fact, a sort of "People's Palace," on the highest foundation of all, would appear to us to have been flourishing here long before the East-End structure was an accomplished fact. Free breakfasts of bread-and-milk have been given four mornings a week to about one hundred of the poorest children in a neighbouring Board-school, and penny dinners were started here first of all, and have been made to pay. Many thousands of dinners have also been supplied gratis in cases where the magic penny could not possibly be produced.

STORM-WHISPERS.

When "no small tempest" lay around the Apostle Paul and his companions, an angel of God stood by him in the night and said, "Fear not;" when another ship was covered with the stormy waves, the Master's voice was heard above the winds, and there was a great calm. How often in the darkness, when the floods seem ready to overwhelm, and the light of human wisdom seems unavailing, there reaches us a voice that seems to say, "This is the way, walk ye in it. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid." If, in the midst of the storm, God be there, it can only break in blessing, however threatening it may appear. Mr. Spurgeon remarks, "We probably make the greatest progress through what we suffer; soft gales may be pleasant for haven-bound vessels, but rough winds are better." It is not only that we learn courage, endurance, patience, sympathy, by means of the trials our Father sends us, but, failing life's sorrows, how should we know Him as He is? Which of us, who has learnt how God can comfort, would have lacked the trouble that led us to the depths of His love?

"THE QUIVER" WAIFS.

We have received the following intelligence from Dr. Barnardo, which we think will interest our readers: "Little Willie' Rush, the protégé of your readers, is, according to the last accounts I heard, quite well. He is one of the cases we have boarded out in the village of Denmead, Hants. You probably have his address; it is 'Care of Mr. David Tilbury, Anthill, Denmead, Cosham, Hants.' A visitor who saw him on the 22nd of December says of him—'The child appears to have a very good, happy home; he is in Standard I. at the school, and attends both church and Sunday-school regularly.'" The latest list of subscriptions to THE QUIVER Waifs Fund will be found on page 393, and we would remind our friends that the list is still open.

"EYES TO THE BLIND."

The prophet foretold of our Lord that He should "open the blind eyes," and bring those that sit in darkness out of prison. Still is this word fulfilled, for His followers have taken up the gracious work of caring for the sightless, providing guides and helpers, and visiting their own homes to read to them and cause them to forget awhile their affliction, and conveying them out now and then amid the singing of birds and the fragrance of the flowers. The Rev. Oswald Dykes is president of the Somers Town Blind Aid Society, which was instituted in 1864, and which from day to day cheers and aids those dwelling amid the shadows. The visitors ever keep the "one thing needful" above all else, but the range of reading is wide and varied, and the comfort this must be to the blind can be judged only by those who have lived with friends thus situated, and whose craving has ever been to listen to reading aloud. Pleasant entertainments are given weekly to the protégés of this society, who thoroughly enjoy the music, readings, etc., and some in enfeebled health have been sent away for rest and change by the sea; some have been assisted to employment, some saved from the workhouse, and all strengthened and lifted up by those who, in the Master's name, become eyes to the blind, and express their longing thus: "Our first aim is to lead our blind to Jesus, the Light of the world; our mission is begun and continued in Him." We note that this society's yearly working expenses are under £16, and all else goes immediately to the aid of the blind.

"Visiting their homes to read to them."

"BRING AN OFFERING."

We have read of a poor widow who, bringing a rouble to a Russian Bible Society, was asked if her subscription were not too much. "Love is not afraid of giving too much," was her beautiful reply. We all know that it is not always the largest purse that opens for God's work. The poor too love to spare somewhat for His service, to lay part of their hard earnings upon the Master's altar. Indeed, we heard once of a laundress who gave from a full heart to missionary work, but who, coming into a fortune, pleaded the multitude of her expenses, and would give but a meagre sum to the once-loved work; so dangerous, save for God's mercy, is the abundance of riches to the human heart! There is doubtless some justification for the complaint, "One cannot give to everything." While we are thankful to know the channels of benevolence are innumerable, some grow discouraged because they can make no response to such claims, for they are too poor to subscribe. Well, God knows the emptiness of the purse as well as its abundance; but money is not the only offering worth having! A thoughtful essayist has lately said, "We all cry, 'Great is money, and it shall prevail!' Do we miss the true force? Money is a thing moved, not the motor-force. Our fulcrum lies among things unseen, eternal." Our true strength to help on God's work is not our purse, but the force of prayer; greater things are done by the heart and hands uplifted to the King of earth and heaven, than by the gold piece carelessly cast into the treasury, which sometimes we eye so wistfully. And we are reminded of what a little lad said once in a Bible-class we were leading. Our talk had been of the manger, of the shepherds, of the wise men's offerings, and we asked the boys if they had learnt any lessons from the subject we had taken. The child looked up and said, "Those shepherds hadn't anything to bring to Jesus—but they brought themselves."

"GOD IS AWAKE."

"Let me pass on to you," said a sympathetic correspondent to one in trouble and perplexity, "the words of a great writer that have often helped me: 'God is awake, and utterly loving!'" Some of our poorer brethren and sisters have learnt to understand this truth by means that at first seem commonplace, but which to them have been life and hope. Work grew scarce, the tools and furniture went, the room grew bare, the children asked for bread: what wonder if now and then the doubt arose as to the love, the very existence of Him who seemed to have forsaken them? Some uttered no word of their need, and made no sound of complaint; but "God is awake," and it came to pass that visitors sought them out in their despair, gave the children breakfast and dinner tickets, released the tools, bought garments, and filled the shadowed place with the spirit of praise. In face of need and poverty sectarian differences are forgotten; all must joy in the noble work accomplished by the London Congregational Union, a work for which the Rev. Andrew Mearns, Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, will thankfully receive added help. Bread and milk, and porridge, and warm dinners, better than hospital medicine, have overflowed from the channels thus supplied; pastors and district visitors have been furnished with grocery tickets for the deserving; the unemployed have been set to work; tens of thousands of garments have been distributed, and many have been sent out to Canadian homes. It is sorry work to comfort the hungry with a tract alone, to preach to those whose one conscious need is bread. Let us learn from Him whose cry across the waters to wearied, heart-sick ones was, "Have ye any meat?" and who prepared food for them over the fire of coal, and bade them "Come and dine." Let our brotherly uplifting, our seeking of the poor, our prompt, overflowing help, reveal to many a doubting one the Master's care—

"Far and near, as one Thou sendest,
I would publish what Thou art,
That the weary world might hear it,
And return unto Thy heart."

"PAIN AND GAIN."—p. 405.

PAIN AND GAIN.

A NEW STORY WITH AN OLD ENDING.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "BEAUTY AND THE BEAST," ETC. ETC.

"VILETS, fine v'lets! 'Ave a bunch of v'lets, sir! On'y a penny a bunch."

The little flower vendor, who had been standing patiently at the corner of the dull East London street, ran eagerly forward as he spoke, and held up his broken basket with an expectant twinkle in his shrewd black eyes. He had long ago settled in his small mind that "the Parson was a good sort," and with the keen business instinct that the poor soon develop, he knew that the biting east wind would tell in his favour.

"Violets? All right, my lad, I'll take a bunch. How has business been getting on lately?"

"On'y middlin' well," said the boy, shaking his head. "Yer see, the other fellers they swells out their bunches with stalks as 'as no 'eads, an' it tells agin yer when ye'r trying to sell fair."

His listener nodded. He was a tall, gaunt young man, with a thin, earnest face which people were apt to call rather hard, and his nod was emphatic, as though his own experience endorsed the lad's words.

"It is hard lines sometimes, Tom," he agreed.

"Precious 'ard!" said the boy heartily. "But ye'r allus telling as 'ow we ought ter be honest, an' as 'ow honesty pays in the long run if we peg away long enough, an' I 'm goin' to give it a fair chance. A'ter-noon, sir!" and shouldering his basket, he trudged sturdily away.

Left to himself, William Leighton turned into one of the gloomy, poverty-stricken houses, and entering his own little sitting-room, flung himself down into the depths of an old arm-chair, which was standing by the fire. His tea stood ready on the table, and the kettle was singing merrily, but he felt tired and moody to-night, and was in no hurry to begin his solitary meal.

"Honesty pays in the long run if we only peg away long enough," he repeated. "That little chap makes a better preacher than I, for upon my word I am beginning to doubt it."

He glanced round the cheerless room, with its bare, drab-coloured walls and scanty furniture, and then thrust his hands deeper into his pockets and shivered. He was usually courageous enough, and far too busy for self-analysis, but the death of a fellow-worker whom he had loved and honoured had depressed him to-day; and if he chose to waste his tea-hour, why, it was no business but his own. So he went on thinking.

"Let us see what honesty has done for me. On the one hand, there is a snug country living amidst the blessed fields and lanes, with my father's approbation, eight hundred a year, and the sweetest girl in Christendom for my wife. And all to be had by dropping the eternal question of right and wrong, by 'packing a few stalks into the bunch,' as Tom would say. On the other hand, there is slaving my life out in this detestable East-End, with eighty pounds a year, and . . . Kitty, is that you?"

The sudden question dispelled the moody silence like a cheery burst of music, and the young curate sat up and pulled himself together.

"Yes, it is Kitty," said an aggrieved little voice, coming from the other side of the door, and sounding somewhere on a level with the keyhole. "An' I've knocked three times, an' you didn't hear me."

"I am sure I am very sorry," said Leighton, laughing. He opened the door, and picking up a child who stood upon the threshold, he carried her back into the room. "So you have come to have tea with me, have you, little one! How has the cough been to-day?"

"Pretty well, thank you," she answered gravely, and then, still held in his arms, she looked eagerly round the room and back into his face. "Mr. Leighton, I didn't open the window once," she added impressively; and sliding down on to the ground, she looked up at him with happy glistening eyes.

"Bless me, yes!" cried the curate, with a sudden recollection; "and you were to have some violets if you kept it shut."

"Violets all for my very own self," cried the child delightedly; and then, when he had taken Tom's little bunch from the vase over her head, and had given it into her eager upstretched hands, she clambered into the big arm-chair, and curled herself up contentedly in its seat. She was a pretty little thing, but looked terribly delicate, Leighton thought, with her large eyes preternaturally bright, and too vividly red spots on her thin white cheeks.

"What makes you like to have the window open?" he asked abruptly.

"If you lean right far out and look up," explained the little girl, "you can see the top window the other side of the street, and they've got, oh! such a pretty pot of min—min—minette there!"

"A pot of mignonette, have they?" said Leighton kindly; but there was a little frown on his face as he busied himself with cutting the bread. "What does aunt say to you when you make your cough worse by putting your silly little head out of window, just to look at a flower-pot?"

"She doesn't mind," said the little one; "she gets as tired of the streets as I do, and we both love a bit of country."

"You poor little thing!" Leighton came back to the fireside, and taking her on his knee, began coaxing her to eat. "You have never seen the real country, have you, Kitty?"

"Only scraps of it in pots," said the child quaintly.

"And how old are you?"

"Nearly seven."

It sounded a sad little answer enough in the ears of this country-bred, stalwart young fellow, whose own passionate love for his native lanes amounted almost to worship. He had never quite lost that cramped, confined feeling which London had first given him, and being in a broken, impressionable mood to-night, this sick child's eager longing to look up from her own home in the basement to the pot of mignonette in the opposite window struck him as curiously pathetic. How languid she was to-night, and what a mere feather-weight to hold as she lay back in his arms, with her hot little head pillowed against his shoulder! And certainly the cough was more frequent than it used to be.

"Kitty, how would you like to go to the country for a month?" he asked suddenly.

The baby-face crimsoned with delight. "Into—the—country?" she stammered.

"Now, don't you jump up like that," remonstrated the curate; "you'll only make yourself cough. Yes, I think I know a dear little old woman in a dear little old village who'd be very glad to have you for a time, and then you would have to get fat and strong and rosy, and come back and tell me all about it."

"Won't you come too?" asked Kitty wistfully.

"No, dear, I can't."

He did not tell her that to send her away would necessitate losing his own hard-earned holiday; but he went on instead to talk of the sunshine, which was so golden and so hot that it did not seem in the least to belong to the pale, faint sunbeams which came straggling down into the dark, narrow streets. And then he talked to her of the fields which were so wide that no man jostled against his fellow, and where the violets and the other poor dusty flowers that little Tom hawked about the streets grew fresh and pure and beautiful: a place, in fact, where one had breathing time, and where there was room for everybody.

"That sounds like heaven," said the little child dreamily; and that was the main idea she carried away with her when, a week later, she went down into Hampshire under the care of a kindly guard. One other thought she took with her to her new home. One of the curate's few possessions was an ivory miniature of a brown-haired, sweet-faced girl, and little Kitty—who, like all solitary children, was full of untaught fancies—had fallen into the habit of imprinting a morning and evening kiss upon the smiling, upturned face. "Mr. Leighton's pretty lady," she called her, and one day she asked her friend "why the pretty lady didn't come to live there?"—"I wanted her to, but she wouldn't come," Leighton had answered grimly; and it was with the half-defined notion of meeting the original of the picture, and of asking her point blank to come and cheer up her aunt's lodger, that the child started on that wonderful journey which, as Leighton prophesied, was to make her "rosy and strong."

"So this is the child, Mrs. Dobbs?"

"Yes, Miss Olive, that's the child. Deary me! whatever have I done with Mr. Will's letter? He tells me her name is Kitty Selwyn, and that she never quite got the better of a fever she had in the winter, and that the doctor has ordered fresh air to set her up again."

"Is she quite a common child—a street child, I mean?"

"Oh no, Miss Olive; she speaks quite pretty, and Mr. Will says—that letter must have got tumbled behind the press—that her father was a gentleman who quarrelled with his friends. He ran away and 'listed, and then he married a work-girl."

"Well, I'm glad Mr. Leighton has the money to spend on such matters."

This conversation was the first thing of which the new arrival was conscious on the morning following the day when she had bidden good-bye to her London home. Opening her eyes, she found that the speakers were a rosy-cheeked old woman and an energetic-looking young lady, who was frowning portentously as she uttered the last words. For one hazy moment it almost seemed to the child that her face was familiar, but the impression vanished as the lady turned and came towards the bed.

"Well, you small child, so you are awake at last!" she was beginning briskly, when old Mrs. Dobbs interposed.

"And as hungry as a hunter, I'll be bound," cried the good dame. "You just lie still, there's a dear lamb, and I'll get your breakfast. You were too tired and sleepy to do aught but go to bed last night. You will wait here, Miss Olive, until I come back!"

"Make haste, then," responded "Miss Olive" carelessly. "I never have the faintest idea what to say to children."

She glanced again at Kitty as she spoke, and that glance probably influenced the future of several lives, for from an artistic point of view it suddenly occurred to her that the little girl might be worth cultivating.

"I wish you would sit to me," she began impulsively; and as Kitty opened her eyes in blank amazement, she added hastily, "I mean I want you to let me paint your face and put you in a picture."

"That will make two Kitties," said the child, with a laugh. She sat up in bed and clapped her hands, pleased with the idea.

"No, not two Kitties," said Miss Olive, with a smile. "I shall paint you as Boy Cupid."

"But I'm not a boy; I'm a girl," objected Kitty; and her visitor laughed outright.

"You precise little mortal!" she exclaimed. "Well, then, 'The Envoy of Love.' How does that suit you? Envoy means something sent."

"Sent to you by Love?" echoed the child. "Why, I was sent to you by Mr. Leighton," and the next moment she was wondering why the face of this young lady should have turned a deep burning red.

But these few words had quite settled the question as to whether Miss Olive Fenroy would choose to interest herself in the ailing little Londoner. That very first day she took her out with her for a long, happy morning in the beautiful spring-lighted fields; and this first ramble was the forerunner of many another they took together, Olive on foot, and her little charge on the broad back of a sedate old pony.

The delight and wonderment with which the little child welcomed the commonest every-day things of country life awoke a keener perception of their beauty in the more jaded eyes of her companion. When Kitty, slipping from the old pony's back, would point to the flickering balls of light which, slanting through the trees, fell softly upon the moss below, and whispering that these were the kisses of the angels, would run to press her baby lips upon their brightness, Olive Fenroy thought it only a pretty conceit the child would outgrow in time; but when, after listening to the carolling of the birds, Kitty knelt reverently in the long waving grass, and thanked the Christ who had made their music so lovely, Olive grasped dimly something of the deeper meaning of these sights and sounds to which she had been accustomed since childhood.

"Mr. Leighton says this," and "Mr. Leighton thinks that," formed the staple of Kitty's talk, and her innocent confidences served to bring Miss Fenroy's lover very vividly before her. For he was her lover, she was sure of that, although it was six long months since she had heard of him; for Will was too staunch to change. Had anyone tried to recall in so many words the suspense and the worry, and finally the decision of last autumn, Olive would have fiercely resented it; but this little child was too young to understand, and the girl let her chatter as she would. Kitty had told her of "the pretty lady" in the massive gilt frame whom Mr. Leighton had tried to bring into his solitary rooms, but who "wouldn't come," and instead of combating the scorn with which the little narrator filled her story, Olive had only kissed the flushed, indignant face.

So he still kept that ivory miniature! How well she remembered the birthday—why, it was three years ago by now—when she had given it to him. The old Squire, who had long set his heart on the marriage of his only boy with the adopted daughter who was about the only person who had any influence over the imperious old man, had met them at the door as they came in together from their ramble in the lanes, and then and there had definitely promised the lad the family living as soon as he should be qualified to hold it. Will's answer was the forerunner of the storm which was afterwards to descend upon his devoted head.

"I shall be delighted if it can only be made possible," he had answered; "but I am sorely afraid there is a greater call for workers in town."

And last autumn he had stuck to his decision. The autocratic old Squire had threatened and raved to no purpose, and Olive (in those days she was his promised wife) had pleaded and coaxed in vain. "I hate going away, but it seems to me right, and I mean to do it," he had answered, and he had kept to his point. Then the Squire played his trump card.

"Your poor mother expected me to hand you over her own little property when you entered the Church," he told his son with ominous quietness, "but I will not, sir! not a penny of it will you see until I die! If you choose to go and grind yourself to a shadow, of course you can do it, but you don't have the money, and you don't have Olive."

How often during these last few months the girl had regretted her own share in the matter no one would ever know. She had been piqued by his apparent indifference to her wishes, and had been overruled by the Squire's impetuosity, but in the quiet, lonely winter that followed she had grown to realise not only her own love, but also some of the motives which had placed a stranger in the pleasant country rectory, and "the young master" in the midst of the London turmoil. But it was Kitty herself who finally won the girl into listening to the dictates of her own heart rather than to the Squire's invectives, and it happened in this wise.

Kitty's month in the country was almost over when one glorious morning the two set out for a long walk across the sun-lighted fields, in quest of a certain blackbird's nest which rumour had located in a lovely little nook which bore the name of the Fairy's Dell.

"You don't want the pony to-day, do you, pet?" she asked as they started; "there are a number of stiles which poor old Dobbin could not get over, and you are so strong now that it will not tire you."

"Yes, I am strong and rosy," quoted Kitty gleefully; and indeed she looked the embodiment of health. The pink gingham frock left the dimpled arms bare, and both they and the bright, laughing face which was framed by the old sun-bonnet were browned by exposure. She ran along by Olive's side, swinging the big basket she had brought in search of flowers, and talking merrily.

"Do you know," she said, as they left the fields and clambered down into the dell, "when I first saw you I thought you was somebody else."

"Did you, Kitty? Who? Mind that stone, dear."

"I thought you was somebody else, and then you was yourself," answered the child in her curious old-fashioned way, and then she broke into a little cry of rapture. "Oh! Miss Olive, isn't it beautiful!"

As the girl hastily stopped, the blackbird, upon whose nest they had come unawares, broke into song.

They made a pretty picture just at that moment—so pretty, indeed, that others than Leighton might have cared to gaze. The little child was standing on higher ground than Olive, with one chubby hand clutching the big wicker basket, and the other holding up one small finger to enforce a reverent silence. Some steps below her stood Olive, with a humbled, wistful expression on her face. The baby thanks which had been rendered by her little companion when first she had listened to the song of the birds seemed to find an echo in some words that Will had spoken years ago, when as children they had played together in this same Fairy's Dell.

"I should like all the poor people in big towns to come and listen to the birds and what their song means," he had said in his boyish way; "and if they can't come, I'd like to go and tell them."

Olive's eyes filled with tears. Yes, Will's dream had come true, and she, who had been his fellow-dreamer, had been the one to try and hold him back!

She turned to the child, who was watching her intently. "We must be going—" she began, when she was interrupted by a bright, exultant laugh.

"I know who you are! I know 'xactly who you are!" cried Kitty excitedly. "You're Mr. Leighton's pretty lady, the lady he wanted, and—oh! you wouldn't come!"

The sorrowful break in her voice as she spoke the last words went to Olive's heart. She lifted the child off the bank, and began kissing her soft cheeks. Dropping the basket, Kitty flung both her warm little arms around the other's neck.

"You are crying," she announced triumphantly. "I sce you. You want to come home with me."

"I don't think— Perhaps Mr. Leighton does not want me now."

"But he does. Oh! do come. Please do come." She waited a moment, and then added slowly, with a touch of very like pathos in the baby voice, "He is so lonely. It feels bad to be lonely, you know. It hurts.

It was being lonely that made me go out into the cold to look up at the flowers, because they seemed nearer my daddy. And Mr. Leighton is lonely, and he wants you."

The brown eyes were very misty, but the look upon her face was still the one which little Kitty had recognised as that of "the pretty lady," and she ventured to give a soft kiss to the lips which were so near her own.

"You do want to come home with me, don't you?" she said persuasively.

There was a pause, and then Olive answered her. There was only the sunlit silence and the pleading child to listen; but I think that had the tremulous leaves been changed to a waiting audience, the words would have been uttered just as bravely and lovingly.

"Yes, I do want to come," she said.

People argued in after days as to the whys and wherefores of the Squire's sudden change in his behaviour to his son. That the summer found Olive and Will married surely pointed to the fact, gossiped the wiseacres, that after all the old man had a soft corner in his heart for his only child, and that he had been secretly rejoiced to find he could not turn him from a set purpose. And so the matter was discussed over sundry tea-tables; but not one of these clever people thought of connecting the happily-ended love-story with a little picture which hangs in a certain East End house, and which the owner prizes only less than an ivory miniature which is also in his possession. It is the picture of a little child, with her blue eyes full of sunshine and beauty, and her red mouth breaking into smiles, and it bears this fanciful title: "The Envoy of Love." M. E. W.

"LIFT UP YOUR HEARTS."

III.—THE LONELY.

BY THE REV. W. MANN STATHAM.

WE can never understand any kind of experience till we are in it. We may write poetry in youth full of beautiful sentiments about autumn, but we must come ourselves to the time of fading leaves—to the season of Millais' "Chill October," fully to realise the pensiveness of life's autumnal experiences. One by one our dear friends and associates depart from us, and we are to a certain extent left alone. New generations have their own special fellowships and friendships, and they cannot understand the feelings which we have when we revisit the old school benches, the old college quadrangles, the old village homes, the old country churches, the old centres of early duties, and the old trysting-places of bygone days. I do not wish to suggest, however, that loneliness is peculiar to the evening of life, for many, to use the words of Holy Scripture, "sit solitary in families;" and this, too, in early days, when the bread-winning takes them from home to such experiences as the governess-life! Some, too, by very solemn providences are widowed and otherwise bereaved at life's mid-day.

A talk, therefore, to the lonely about "lifting up the heart" will perhaps be one of those counsels which are angels of help and comfort to many—a word, indeed, as Holy Scripture says, in season to the weary. First of all, let us remember that in our own special experiences we should look first to our blessed Lord Himself, who was "acquainted with grief." For does not His life teach us, as the Brother born for adversity, that He felt loneliness? Yes. He says to His disciples, "Ye shall leave Me alone;" but He adds, in words of matchless beauty and marvellous consolation, "And yet I am not alone, for the Father is with Me."

Surely He who as our Divine Saviour has taken our manhood up into God, can now fill us with the same holy rest; for has He not said, "I will never leave you nor forsake you"? We can never then really be alone, for our blessed Lord has taken us into a spiritual unity of life, into fellowship with the ever-blessed Trinity; for "our fellowship is with the Father, and with His Son, Jesus Christ, our Lord;" and we may have the holy prayer of our Great Intercessor fulfilled in us, "And I will pray the Father, and He shall give you another Comforter, that He may abide with you for ever."

In the deepest and divinest sense, then, we are never alone.

"Lift up your hearts," then; for although change, and separation, and death can destroy for the time being all human fellowships, yet we are one with our blessed Lord. He says, "I in them, and Thou in Me, that they may be made perfect in one." What, indeed, can separate us from the love, and care, and pity, and guardianship of the Lord Jesus Christ? Nothing save sin wilfully indulged—unrepented of—unforsaken sin! Lift up your heart; Christ is with you wherever travel may take you, or bereavement leave you destitute, or sickness confine you to your quiet chamber, or privation distress you with its painful struggles. The first point, therefore, in this paper to be well pondered is this, that the devout Christian, the true disciple, the faithful follower, is never really alone, because the Saviour is with us always, even unto the end of the world.

Lift up your heart too, because even loneliness may help instead of hindering your true joy. If "sorrow shows us truth as night shows us stars," so loneliness in life's devout experiences makes the Good Shepherd's voice more clear and distinct to our souls. No confusing voices of the world come to us in our solitude; we are alone, perhaps that we may be led to hear more distinctly the voice of God calling us to self-denial, and to sympathy with others who are "distressed in mind, body, or estate." Lift up your hearts; God is turning your seasons of solitude into audience-hours for your soul, so that you too may say, "Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth." What an honour for us to enter the secret pavilion of God: and what condescension on the part of the Most High and the Most Awful to speak alone with our souls!

"Lift up your hearts," for loneliness is even in a human sense capable of being relieved. The district visitor seldom feels lonely—there are city ministries, and village ministries too, open to us all, and to have the blessing of the fatherless and the widow, and those that have no helper, breathing over us, is a joyful benediction. We may each live so as to go "out of ourselves," and if we cannot visit the sick we may fill up spare time with some ministries of love to others. I am not forgetful of the fact that there is a loneliness which must sit or lie at home, in a weakness which cannot be relieved in the active way of which I have spoken. In such experiences we can at all events lift up our hearts, and thank God for power to think, to read, and to have fellowship with other minds, more especially to ponder devoutly the Holy Book, that Word which is a tried Word, full of promises—promises on which the weary and heavy-laden hearts of a thousand generations have learned to lean as on the true and faithful Word which cannot be broken.

We have all heard of the great traveller, Karsten Niebuhr, who in his old age became blind. In these dark hours his countenance was said to be often lustrous with delight. He told his friends that the majestic scenes he had so often beheld in far-away Eastern lands, scenes flooded with the golden sunshine of day, and with the clear, blue-black, starry vault of night—filled his memory with unfading pictures; so that though he could not see the Holstein round and about him, he could see the heavens and the sunny Eastern lands, and delight in the mental panorama. What a lesson for us all! If we treasure up the glories of the sacred Scriptures—if, as our blessed Lord says, "My words abide in you," we shall have much to cheer and inspire us when we miss the busy scenes of earth and time, and are curtailed in amidst the solitudes of our own homes.

Lift up your hearts, and then there will be light in your faces. None are so lonely that they are quite shut out from others. Electricians have told us—to our surprise—how much electricity is contained in one drop of water. Who can tell us what amount of inspiration there often is in one smile, quickening in others, as it does, hope, comfort, and holy energy! God created every one of us for our own good, it has been said; yes, and for the good of others, and God would have our whole life, not only a sacrifice, but a song. "Rejoice in the Lord always," says the holy Apostle St. Paul, "and again I say rejoice." Nothing will better save us from being cynical critics of the faults and failings of others than the habit of making them the objects of our affection and of our interest. Then there is the reflex influence from others of thus lifting up our hearts. If "like cures like," how true it also is that "like creates like." A lonely spirit will quicken loneliness in others, just as a cheerful man will create cheer in others. Never let us forget that Christians should be as anxious to be saintly as to be "safe." If we are cheerful, hopeful, and thankful, others will gather the grapes of charity from our lives, and will be gladdened and refreshed by us, and—

"What in a world where cries for help
Must ever sound till sins shall cease,
Can be a goodlier work than this,
Griefs to assuage, and joys increase?"

We are all so apt to seek sympathy rather than to give sympathy, that many lonely people think of the world's relation to them, rather than of their relation to the world. This is a miserable mistake, for this reason, amongst others—that we can get joy only by giving joy. Some have discovered the great secret, which is only saying that they have begun at last to understand the Old Testament Beatitude, "Blessed are ye" (not that reap, but) "that sow beside all waters."

There is the special means of heart-uplifting which must not be forgotten—it is prayer. The power and peace of true devotion can be only attested by its experiences. It is on the Mount of Olives that we gather not only calm but comfort. All sense of loneliness is lost when we realise the fulness of the promise, "Draw nigh unto God, and He will draw nigh unto you." Loneliness of course brings with it much introspection. Then it is that—filled with the consciousness of fault and sin—we draw near through Jesus Christ, our Mediator and Advocate; then it is that we realise the deep meaning of the words, "He is the propitiation for our sin;" then it is that the hindrance to all peace and gladness of heart is removed, for it is ours to feel the consolation of the inspired words, "blotting out the handwriting of trespasses against us, nailing them to His Cross." Yes, true Christian prayer leads on to the conscious consolation, "Be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee; go in peace." Perhaps we have tried many other methods for lifting up our hearts—such as choice music, quaint stories, quickening friendship, pleasant imaginations, or change of scene and clime, but all in vain! Would it not be wiser to remember always that peace and gladness come only through the Cross and Passion of our blessed Lord?

Lift up your hearts, ye lonely ones, as ye meditate on the loved ones who have gone before. The Resurrection of our Lord left an open grave behind and an open heaven before. "If Christ be not risen, then they also which have fallen asleep in Christ have perished." This is part of an apostolic argument which St. Paul accentuated in such startling ways because it led up to such a glorious climax: "Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the First-fruits of them that sleep." First-fruits! And what a harvest there is to come! We can understand the sad melancholy which underlay the superficial gladness of light-hearted Greece, of which Luthardt speaks in his volume of evidences—because there was no great hope of immortality filling men's hearts and lives. We could scarcely comfort the lonely with any real cheer, if we could not say to them, "Them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him." The golden age of Greece and Rome lies in the past, and so do the golden ages of all sad and lonely ones who have endured separation and bereavement when the light of immortality has gone out. "Without Christ," men are still "without hope;" "but we know in Whom we have believed, and that concerning our own souls He is able to keep that which we have committed to Him until the day of His appearing." And we know that however lonely we may be—left, perhaps, in the solitary home without our beloved ones—that "God has provided some better thing for them;" and that in a few short years we shall see them again, and be "together" with the Saviour; when we shall "no more go out," and the beautiful words will be fulfilled that we once sang with them in the Church of our fathers on earth—

"For ever with the Lord, Amen! so let it be."

For all these reasons, then, let all the lonely lift up their hearts, and be well assured that as they take a brother's counsel, it will be no easy thing to realise this ideal, and to walk in the high places of holy fellowship with a sunlit countenance, and a saintly soul, reflecting on others the light of the countenance of God.

If, however, we ask, we shall receive, and if we seek we shall find. Our quest after God may indeed be associated with the old self-query, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me?" but the same source of consolation is open to us as to the Psalmist in the old times before us: "Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise Him who is the health of my countenance, and My God."

THE SALT OF THE EARTH.

BY EDWARD GARRETT, AUTHOR OF "EQUAL TO THE OCCASION," "THE MAGIC FLOWER-POT," ETC.

THIRD PAPER.

HAVING, in the previous papers, already considered what may be the outcome of the influence of truly godly people living quietly in obscurity, and also to what large ends may grow the small beginnings of their active work for their Father who is in heaven, we will now pass on to a consideration of at least equal importance—to wit, the power of unknown and solitary individuals, against evils which have so wrought themselves into the very constitution of society as to appear to careless eyes so inevitable that they almost lose their character of evil.

Let us begin with one heroic figure looming far back in the mists of ecclesiastical history. It stands amid the crowds breathlessly watching a fierce gladiatorial combat in the Colosseum of Rome. This figure is in the crowd, but not of it, and bystanders jostle each other to remark him, for he is a Christian. Has he come from Nitria or from Phrygia? they ask. Nobody knows. Nobody will ever know. He stands mute and motionless. We cannot doubt that he was rapt in that fervent prayer which gives a man a share in the Divine Omnipotence. Suddenly, with a cry upon God, he sprang into the arena, and with his own hands parted the infuriated combatants, in the name of Christ. The mob, maddened by this check of their cruel pleasure, fell upon him then and there, which had nothing to do with voluble protests and noisy censures. His action is the "testimony," evidence, or proof of his inward conviction. Such a "testimony" did John Woolman give, when it was suddenly "borne in upon him" that as slavery was an evil, so he must not, in his capacity of a man of business, draw up any document respecting property

"He was rapt in that fervent prayer."

and stoned him to death. But his daring deed brought to sudden fruition the prayers of thousands, the preachings of hundreds. It was as the sudden blossoming of an aloe after a century's growth. That was the last of the gladiatorial sports. By an edict of the Emperor they were forbidden for ever. "The Colosseum, henceforth useless, crumbled slowly away into that vast ruin, which remains unto this day, purified, as men well said, from the blood of tens of thousands by the blood of one true and noble martyr."

Anybody, however lowly, who honestly withdraws himself and his life from any share in the complicated circumstances which further, even remotely, any cause which he sees to be evil, deals that cause a deadly blow. He "bears his testimony" against it, in the true, old-fashioned meaning of the phrase, of which slaves were a part, since if he did so he was himself consenting to make a gain steeped in human tears and blood, and was thus receiving his daily bread not from God, of Whom he asked it, but from the power of evil, from whom he prayed to be delivered!

But only humble and patient minds, content to "wait upon God," can hope to receive such blessings of self-revelation for their guidance in action--

"The restless will
That hurries to and fro
Seeking for some great thing to do
Or secret thing to know," is in the end often but idly busy, only cutting off, as it were, the tops of the tares instead of wrestling with the enemy who is sowing them; or at best, as has been wisely said, "waiting as a servant upon human misery, when it might be possible to anticipate and avert it."

Too many of us have "got to regard mere bustle as an integral element of human life." We crave rather to be doing something, than to be careful that the right thing is done. We become busybodies under the delusion that we are philanthropists. There is a habit, growing more common every day, of inquiring concerning any Christian men or women of whom we hear, "What is their work?" "What are they doing for Christ?" meaning, are they Sunday or ragged-school teachers or temperance lecturers, or on what Boards or Committees do they sit? Now these are excellent works, but their sole value lies in their being discharged by those who are already Christian servants, Christian mistresses, Christian shopkeepers, Christian doctors and lawyers and landlords. Many of those who are the foremost to own that salvation is of faith, and not of works, seem the first to forget that the works which truly evidence faith, are not the voluntary tasks we undertake, but first the conscientious discharge of those duties which are laid upon us. I remember being struck by the immense stress which a certain Christian lady laid upon her son's offer to give some help in a Sunday class of poor lads. She called it "his first desire to labour for His Master." Yet the youth had passed through the whole of a professional curriculum at a great University, devotedly doing his work, daily resisting temptations which his mother could perhaps scarcely understand, rebuking coarseness and frivolity by his steadfast abstinence from them, purifying the very atmosphere round him by his own purity. Was that life no work for the Master? Was that "testimony" nothing? Are not such examples impressed upon those who witness them as no mere "teaching" can be? Who that has had any wide experience has not noted how their remembrance rises with a softening and enlightening influence upon hardened hearts or sceptical minds? Are they not the Master's own living letters seen and read of all men?—the vivid illustrations in real life which give sermons all their point?

It has been truly said that "it is the bustle and hurry of our modern life which causes shallow thought, unstable purpose, and wasted energy, in many who would be wiser and better, stronger and happier, if they would devote more time to silence and meditation; if they would commune with their own heart in their chamber, and be still. . . and that without solitude, without contemplation, without habitual collection and re-collection of our own selves from time to time, no great purpose is carried out, and no great work can be done." "To speak heart to heart with God, you must love to be with Him alone," said a saint of olden times. It is so that we gain—

"That deep insight which detects
All great things in the small,
And knows how each man's life affects
The spiritual life of all.

"And strength the evil to forsake,
The Cross of truth to bear,
And love and reverent fear to make
Our daily lives a prayer."

We need a great deal of detachment from the world before we can dare to join in the ancient prayer: "My Lord and God, take from me all that may keep me from Thee. My Lord and God, give me all that may take me to Thee. My Lord and God, take from myself and give me to Thee."

It is hard to say how much must be lost from life because we are restless under the "Still Hour," which is sometimes prolonged for years before God calls us. We will not cultivate talents whose ultimate purposes we cannot foresee. We fill our hearts with the chaff of unprofitable acquaintances, because we are too impatient to await that true friendship which is often a soul's best inspiration. We fritter away our time and our energies in mere frivolities and petty dissipations, because there seems nothing else for us to do! Can wine be poured into a vessel already filled with muddy water? Before God can occupy a heart the world must be cast out. It is the hungry soul which He fills with good things.

Let us see how God led one life from the day of small things to a great and glorious sacrifice in His service. She of whom we tell was one of a class who are often restlessly longing "to do" when they should be meekly learning "to be," and who are sorely tempted to fill the fields of their lives with swiftly growing, showy weeds, rather than to endure the bare look of the furrows in which good seed is quietly working towards the light. For the heroine of our true story was a wealthy young girl belonging to the superior middle class.

Her name was Margaret Mercer, and she was a native of Maryland, in the United States. The daughter of a wise and cultivated father, she enjoyed intellectual opportunities which may have been somewhat advanced for that place and time (the close of last century). These opportunities she diligently improved. She did not think that exact study and careful execution were surely not needed by one whose beauty and grace gave her sufficient social attraction, and whose fortune placed her beyond all practical necessities. Let this be noted. For if she had failed to keep step with duty in this early stage of her life's progress, she must have grievously confused the music of its close.

Yet this fulfilment of her appointed tasks was not done in any phlegmatic or mechanical spirit. She had all the aspirations and yearnings natural to warm and noble young souls—

"Early did life's mighty question
Thrill within her heart of youth,
With a deep and strong beseeching!—
What and where is Truth?
Deeper than the gilded surface
Had her wakeful vision seen,
Farther than the narrow present
Had her journeyings been."

Margaret Mercer frankly owned: "I, like every little mole toiling in his own dark passage, have been given to murmuring, and my great complaint for some time past has been, that I was cut off from every means of usefulness, and could not find anything on earth to do that might not as well remain undone."

Circumstances presently placed her, in the full bloom of her beautiful and accomplished womanhood, amid a vortex of fashionable society. She mingled with it, only to be speedily convinced that its interests and entertainments were absolutely incompatible with her own highest and truest spiritual and intellectual life. With her, to realise this meant instant renunciation. She found that when her soul asked food the world gave her a stone, and not for an instant would she pretend to think it bread. She wrote, with her candid directness—

"I acknowledge that there are many persons around me vastly better than I am; but I am speaking of society, not people; and I confess that the un-idealized chatter of females is beyond my endurance. They are very capable of better things, but what of that? is it not yet more annoying that they will do nothing better? . . . When I go into gay scenes, the illusion is gone, and I fancy the illuminated hall to resemble the castle of enchantment, where Armida kept all who were capable of virtue bound in the lap of pleasure. . . ." And there was no faltering, no uncertainty in her own determination. By this time she had looked out upon the wide world, and had seen that its many fields were white unto harvest; and though she had not yet found her appointed vineyard, of one thing she was quite clear: "If I cannot do good where there is so much to do, I never was and never will be a votary of pleasure."

So, again, Margaret Mercer chose "the good part," though she could not dream to what large issues her renunciation was tending. For society generally proves but an enervating school for the mind, where we are apt to lose the power of sacrifice and to acquire the trick of admiring "ideals," without the least endeavour to make them realities.

The death of her father, Dr. Mercer, while Margaret was still a young woman, not only put her in full possession of her fortune, but brought her face to face with that question of slavery which was already profoundly agitating American life, both political and social. In 1816, the American statesman, Henry Clay, had established the Colonisation Society, with the object of assisting freed negroes to return to their own country. This resulted, a few years later, in the purchase of a tract of land in Upper Guinea, on the west coast of Africa, where, before the year 1853, nearly 11,000 freed men of colour from the United States were to be found, in the enjoyment of every right and liberty—except indulgence in ardent spirits, and trading in materials of war!

Margaret Mercer found that her wealth was mainly in slaves. She did not therefore close her ears to the pleadings of the abolitionists and open them to the arguments of the champions of slavery, who were then to be found not only in political circles, but in literature and in the Church. She did not feel that it was not for her to inquire deeply concerning what found favour in so many good people's eyes, and was certainly so profitable to herself. Rather she realised that, being a slaveholder, it was her immediate duty to look fully into the matter. The result of her investigations was the conviction that slavery was a crying wrong—an outrage on our common humanity.

What then?

She resolved at once to set all her slaves free, to assist them to Liberia, and to give them as good a start there as her remaining means would allow. This would exhaust the whole of her fortune and leave her penniless.

One can imagine the outcry that must have risen about her when her determination was announced. Was she setting herself above her good and beloved father, who had seen no harm in his wealth in human flesh? Margaret would surely answer, with a quivering lip, that her father had sought to do right as far as he saw it, and that doubtless the insight he had now gained was far beyond any that had yet come to her. She would be told that Liberia was but an experiment—nobody knew how it would end—only no dreams ever came true without much disappointment and disillusion. She would say that we can but feel our way along in this world's maze—doing "the next thing," and passing through disappointment to ultimate satisfaction, perhaps of a kind we do not expect, and would not be prepared for yet. And some would tell her that her courage was very grand and her determination very beautiful, but what would it amount to? She would become a poor woman deprived of powers of doing good, and a few hundreds of well-treated and well-trained slaves would be set free to grow into real manhood by struggling for themselves. But American slavery would not be touched. Down in the rice-swamps the driver's lash would still be red with blood, and human love and goodness would still be outraged and cheapened in the slave market. Perhaps Margaret would say nothing then, and her heart might even sink to feel what truth was in these words. Or she might take courage remembering that the emancipation of Israel from the Persian yoke began on the day when one humble old Jew refused to bow down before Ahasuerus' haughty favourite. But at any rate she remembered that "to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin." Her path was clear again. Her determination did not falter.

But how could she have carried it out, had she not been so diligent in her early days that she was now a soundly informed and accomplished woman, whose own labours could secure her independence? And could such a vision of duty have arisen before her eyes had she allowed them to be blinded by the glare of pleasure or the dust of worldliness? "Unless a man be at liberty from all things created, he cannot attend to things divine," says A'Kempis in his "Imitation of Christ."

Margaret Mercer lived for twenty-six years wholly dependent upon her successful labours as a teacher. She had a happy and wholesome life; for, says the Wise Man, "Health of the soul in holiness of justice is better than all gold and silver." Then she went home to the heavenly habitations wherein she had laid up such wonderful treasure. She died in the year 1846, long before her nation, in its great war between North and South, abolished slavery for ever. But it was a doomed institution from the hour that such heroic lives as hers were pitted against it. As St. Philip Neri said, "Give me but ten men wholly

"She reads to them at eventide Of One Who came to save."

detached from the world, and with them I will convert the world."

About four years before her death, Longfellow issued his poem, "The Good Part"—

"She dwells by Great Kenhawa's side
In valleys green and cool;
And all her hope and all her pride
Are in the village school.

"She reads to them at eventide
Of One who came to save;
To cast the captive's chains aside,
And liberate the slave;

"And, following her beloved Lord
In decent poverty,
She makes her life one sweet record
And deed of charity.

"For she was rich, and gave up all
To break the iron bands
Of those who waited in her hall
And laboured in her lands.

"Long since beyond the Southern Sea
Their outward sails have sped,
While she in meek humility
Now earns her daily bread.

"It is their prayers, which never cease,
That clothe her with such grace;
Their blessing is the light of peace
That shines upon her face."

Let nobody imagine that the present day gives no opportunity for such renunciations. There is not a difficult problem that perplexes statesmen and philanthropists, whose solution could not be immensely furthered by the unselfish consideration and self-sacrifice of individuals, and this paper may serve a practical purpose if it tries to indicate a few.

Who will refuse to follow any fashion which gives labour that is unwholesome to the labourer by compelling him to work in poisonous substances or detrimental atmospheres?

Who will study to get all their work done under their own eyes, in their own provincial cities or villages, instead of sending it up, under some erroneous ideas as to economy or "style," to the great capitals, thereby lessening the workman's wage by the cost of transit, and by the profits of sundry unnecessary middlemen; and also compelling the working classes to crowd into the great cities, where the conditions of life are unhealthy both for mind and body, since the necessities of fresh air, sunlight, and pure food become impossible; the result being a state of social congestion leading to evils which drive thoughtful people almost to despair?

Who will look carefully into the sources of their own income, prepared to return to honest labour rather than to live in idleness on dividends of ten, fifteen, or twenty per cent., distributed to shareholders by Limited Liability concerns which pay their workers about tenpence for twelve hours' work! Are such workers "free to carry their labour to a better market"? Are not Hunger and Ignorance terrible taskmasters which hold such bound in a bondage as bad as the worst slavery under the abolished "domestic institution"?

And after "thinking on these things" candidly, as did Margaret Mercer, and coming, like her, to a conclusion, who will proceed to emulate her courage in carrying it out, in spite of all disheartening sense of its seeming futility as directed against such a power of evil on the side of the oppressors? Let any such cast their bread on the water: it shall not fail to return after many days.

"A hundred years of preaching Cannot proclaim the creed
Of love and power and pity
So well as one brave deed!

"A glorious gift is prudence,
And they are useful friends
Who never make beginnings
Till they have seen the ends;
But give us, now and then, a man
That we may make him king,
Just to scorn the consequence
AND JUST TO DO THE THING."

NOT ALL IN VAIN.

CHAPTER XVIII.

SEEKING.

"But I am tied to very thee,
By every thought I have;
Thy face I only care to see,
Thy heart I only crave," SEDLAY.

"PEOPLE do not vanish like smoke," said
Mary Owens in the cloisters at Westminster. But Stephen, during his weary search for his old love, was inclined to think people did sometimes perform that feat. On his arrival at Flashford early in the morning, he put up, as he had done once before so long ago, at the "Royal Alexandra Marine Hotel." The same unctuous waiter was there still, only a wee bit balder and a trifle greasier than of old, and not remembering Stephen in the very least. This big, bronzed man, with grave, quiet eyes and close, firm mouth, did not recall the bright, gay-faced, boyish youth of five years ago. Some strange sense of shyness held Stephen's tongue from questioning him with regard to Hilda. He wanted to find her himself unaided. It proved to be not an easy task. First, in his quest, he presented himself at the gate of the Parsonage. The brass plate which had borne Dr. Romney's name when he, Stephen, had been wont to go in and out familiarly through that gate was now replaced by one signifying to all whom it might concern that within was the residence of one Rev. J. B. North Bird. Stephen smiled at the double-barrelled absurdity of the name: it reminded him of his revered brother-in-law, Hawthorne Whyte, and he wondered absently did all clergymen have names like these. A slatternly maid-of-all-work, with shuffling slippers and ragged, dirty gown, answered his ring. She was not sure if Mr. North Bird were at home. At least, he was at home, but she did not know if master could see anyone so early. This hint drew forth Stephen's watch, and he found, to his shame and confusion of face, that it was not yet nine o'clock. Modestly he apologised, and was about to withdraw, when a lanky girl of about fourteen presented herself behind the maid-of-all-work, and remarked in an abrupt manner that if the gentleman would come in "Pa" would see him. Evidently from the vantage of the hall-door she had been listening to the colloquy between Stephen and the servant.

Stephen stepped inside. What a rush of feeling came over him as he beheld the wreck of the garden which Master Drury had loved and tended with such fatherly care! A few flowers struggled for existence by the walls of the house, although half-choked with weeds, but in the centre beds not a vestige of cultivation remained. The grass was long and tangled, the creepers hung forward into space from the walls, the gravel walks were almost obliterated with weeds. Could he come back from his long rest in the churchyard close by, it would break the old man's heart, thought Stephen. Well for him that he cannot, that his lot is cast in the pleasant gardens where the four rivers flow. On the doorstep sate a small child of about two years of age, with yellow hair, and large, round, wondering eyes. He gazed up at Stephen, and gravely remarked, as the strange gentleman passed him into the hall, "Pap in house." Stephen wondered if this youngest nestling was of German extraction, but he speedily discovered, by the volume of roars that met him on entering, that there was a little bird younger still than the solemn young gentleman on the doorstep. He was shown into the drawing-room, untidy, unclean, and unkempt as the rest of the house. Two big, sullen-looking lads uprose at his arrival, and shuffled from the room. On the lawn outside the window, two girls, of the same pattern as she who had given him admittance, but smaller, were arguing shrilly with a small, sturdy boy in knickerbockers—having the best of the argument too, Mr. Wray observed, as the girls went away in triumph towards the garden, leaving the male sex wailing woefully. The baby up-stairs was screaming fit to rupture every blood-vessel in its body, when the Rev. J. B. North Bird entered the drawing-room where Stephen waited for him. He was a small, light-coloured man, with a look of extreme perplexity on his insignificant face. Seeing how many nestlings there were in the nest, Stephen could pardon this expression. Mr. North Bird rubbed his little hands together nervously, and prayed Stephen to be seated.

"Thank you. It is rather early, and I shall not detain you," replied Stephen courteously. "I hope you will pardon my intrusion."

"Do not mention it," murmured Mr. North Bird sweetly.

"I have come down here, after an absence of some years from England, to look for some old friends of mine. They lived here when I last saw them, and the hope that perhaps you know whither they went on leaving this is my excuse for troubling you."

"Do you mean Dr. Romney, my predecessor in this parish? He is dead."

The poor little man's countenance had visibly fallen during Stephen's speech. He had inwardly hoped this imposing-looking stranger had come about pupils—for he added to the other pleasures of existence the joy of taking pupils. Mr. Wray was too young a man to have sons old enough to place out with a tutor, but a younger brother or a nephew would have been most acceptable in the present ebb of finances at the overstocked Parsonage.

"Yes, I am aware of his death," replied Stephen, with a slight cough, compelled now to drop the convenient plural personal pronouns, behind which he had been shielding himself. "But he had a daughter."

"Yes—a Miss Romney. I had a letter from her. She was an old lady."

"No; she was very young," said Stephen.

"Indeed!" remarked Mr. North Bird. "I wrote to her, when I was presented to the living, not to hurry herself, or put herself about in vacating the Parsonage-house. And the letter I had in reply led me to form the opinion she was an elderly person. In fact, I concluded she was the sister rather than the daughter of the late Dr. Romney."

"Did she say in her letter whither she was going?" Stephen asked, feeling his pulses beat fast and his head swim.

"I do not think she did," replied Mr. North Bird, tapping his slightly bald head with one thin finger, as though to recall his fugitive thoughts. "I have her letter in my desk. I shall let you see it."

"Thank you very much," murmured Stephen, and the little parson glided from the room.

In a few moments he returned, and put in Stephen's hand an open letter. Stephen could hardly look at it at first, this piece of inanimate paper on which his darling's eyes had rested—her hand traced words. When he did look at it, he received rather a shock. He had never seen any of Hilda Romney's handwriting, but he had naturally imagined it delicate, graceful, and refined—dainty as herself. This was an untidy, blotted scrawl, with fine, sharp, slanting letters, and the stiff angularity of an old and ignorant hand, while the spelling made his blood run cold. The letter was simple and short, and so far as the wording of it went, just what he could imagine Hilda writing. She thanked the incoming clergyman for his courtesy, and mentioned the date on which she would vacate the Parsonage, in which she expressed a pretty little wish that he might spend many happy days. That was all. No smallest hint as to whither she was setting her face when she left her old home.

"I have eleven children," said Mr. North Bird pathetically, as Stephen rose to go, "so I fear my days here are more likely to be anxious rather than happy. I am deeply grieved, Mr. Wray, that I cannot assist you to find your friend."

"Excuse me for troubling you, Mr. North Bird, and allow me to thank you for the courtesy shown by you to Miss Romney."

The clergyman would have liked to ask the patronage of this lordly-looking stranger—it might easily be that he could procure him pupils if only the idea were suggested to him—but, after all, poverty had not yet quite ground the instincts of a gentleman out of his breast, so he let his visitor depart in peace.

The small child on the doorstep was weeping as Stephen passed out—weeping with a quiet, hopeless patience that went straight to Stephen's heart. He never could bear the sight of misery in others, but specially the grief of a little child struck home to his heart.

"What is the matter, my little man?" he asked kindly, bending over the child.

"Me bwroke me tart," sobbed the boy plaintively, evidently neither hoping nor looking for redress.

Stephen, unlearned in baby talk, looked about him, and beholding the shipwrecked fragments of a toy-cart, once gorgeous in green and scarlet paint, comprehended the matter.

The young man smiled. This little heart was full of sorrow just as keen and overwhelming as that surging in his breast over his broken toy.

"Don't cry, my man," he said cheerily. "What is your small name?"

"Tom," replied the infant, with great deliberation, looking up at him.

"Well then, Tom, I shall tell you a secret. If you watch that gate there into the lane well—mind, I say well, otherwise you might miss it—I am quite sure some time to-day a beautiful cart will come to that door for you. There might be a lovely horse with it, but of that I am not quite so certain. But remember, you must watch the gate well."

"Who tolded you?" asked the child, drinking in his words as though an angel spoke.

"That's a secret. But you just, believe me and watch the gate."

At this moment Mr. North Bird reappeared, wondering rather to find his visitor still there.

"I have been asking my wife about Miss Romney," he said, deprecatingly blinking his watery eyes in the outer sunshine. "Ladies so often pick up and retain little portions of gossip which escape us. She remembers hearing that Miss Romney went to live with friends, and she suggests that you should inquire for her at the post-office. Probably the young lady left her address there."

"That is an excellent idea," replied Stephen, who had not a vestige of the amateur detective in his composition, and would never, left to his own unassisted genius, have thought of this expedient. "Please convey my best thanks to Mrs. North Bird for her kindness. I shall certainly inquire at the post-office. I should have thought of doing so before troubling you."

The post-mistress at Flashford-on-Sea was a lady who made confectionery in her leisure moments. Half-way down the main street of Flashford stood the little shop. The letter-box under the window was flanked by a background of hard-looking tarts and buns, veiled beneath thin green gauze; while within the shop to the right was the screened desk where you might procure stamps, telegraph forms, postal orders; and to the left a long counter, piled with cakes, sweets, and soda-water bottles, ran along the wall. Miss Hartson, a thin, meagre-faced lady, of middle age and juvenile aspirations, with shiny black curls laid flatly against her cheeks, presided impartially over these two departments.

When Stephen entered the shop, she was attending to her Governmental duties, having issued two penny stamps to a young rosy-cheeked fisher-girl through the small semi-Gothic aperture set apart for that purpose. The girl stopped open-mouthed to stare at the handsome gentleman, while Miss Hartson inwardly hoped her curls were smooth and her collar straight.

"Can you give me the address of Miss Hilda Romney?" asked Stephen, boldly going to the point, and trying to speak in a masterful yet uninterested tone, as though he were the brother or guardian of the young lady in question. "When leaving Flashford, some three years since, I believe she left her address here."

"No, sir, she did not," replied the post-mistress. "I remember the young lady well, but I never knew her to either write or receive any letters while she lived here."

"Can you tell me, then, where she has gone? I have been abroad some years, and have lost sight of the family." And Stephen cleared his throat, which had grown suddenly husky.

"I never knew much of Miss Romney," said Miss Hartson primly; "she never patronised my humble shop."

A glance at the indigestible dainties beneath the green gauze, and a backward remembrance of a pair of small white hands kneading flour in the Parsonage kitchen long ago, was enough to convince Stephen of the truth of this statement. A sudden inspiration seized Stephen. He walked over to the counter where the cakes were laid out, and stood contemplating them. Miss Hartson glided from behind the postal window, and stood meekly awaiting his commands with folded hands.

"I want a few dozen of these things," said Stephen, pointing an ignorant masculine finger at the pink and white sugary abominations beneath his gaze. "And some jam tarts, and some apples and oranges, two or three dozen—I think the poor man said there were eleven children—and send them, please, to the children at the Parsonage—wait, I shall give you my card to enclose."

Miss Hartson slyly glanced at the name on the card, but it conveyed no idea to her limited intelligence. The royalty of this unlooked-for order did, however, loosen her tongue. Trying to look as if she had not been both surly and disobliging before, she remarked in a deprecating manner that she had heard that Miss Romney had gone to live in the country somewhere—not very far from Flashford, she believed, but could not exactly say where. She had left the Parsonage immediately after the death of her father and her affliction.

Stephen thought these were synonymous terms, but he said nothing, only paid for his "esteemed order," and marched out of the shop.

Wearily wore on the long, bright day. He could not walk into every shop and private house in the town to inquire where Miss Romney had gone. "Gone to live in the country somewhere" was pretty vague, but it was all the clue he had. He even descended from his lofty heights of ambitious self-help to make inquiries of the waiter at the hotel, but the man knew nothing more than Miss Hartson had already told him. He, too, had heard "Miss Romney had gone to live in the country somewhere." No more than that. Stephen sat in the hotel gardens perplexed in mind, weary in body, looking out over the blue, unwrinkled expanse of sea which stretched before him. "Out in the country." He might have guessed such would be Hilda's refuge. Not amidst the trampling crowds of city streets, so long as in the country somewhere near at hand young chestnut buds were opening in the sunshine, and daffodils were shaking their yellow heads to the breezes, and birds were chanting the praises of the God who made them. There, where the long, cool shadows fell across the grass, would Hilda be, with the free, full anthem of nature going up around her from grove and verdant field. But where? Where should he turn next to seek her? A nursery-maid passing towards the town at the foot of the garden, and roughly dragging a small child by the arm, under the mistaken impression that the infant's limbs were of cast iron, aroused him from his meditations. The child's wails recalled to him the promise made to little yellow-haired Tom North Bird that morning. Wearily he rose up and went to the town to fulfil his promise, somewhat ashamed to think of the little man watching the gate for the toy that did not come. He was long in finding a shop where they kept toys; but at last he lit on one, a small, shabby place, in the most insignificant part of the town. There, amidst a battered collection of tin trumpets, tops, and marbles, he succeeded in unearthing a cart, and with some further difficulty a mottled horse, with reins and blinkers complete. The old woman who kept the shop promised to have the things sent to the Parsonage immediately, and Stephen addressed the parcel in his firm, bold hand to "Master Tom North Bird." As he was about to leave the shop, a little girl came in.

"Mother wants to know if you want any butter to-day, ma'am," she asked, with a quaint courtesied courtsey.

"Tell Mrs. Peters I don't want it to-day, my dear—my lodger has gone away. And how is your mother, my dear, and the young lady?"

"We are all well, and poor Miss Hilda keeps as bright as she can."

Hilda! The way Stephen pounced on the little girl almost took her breath away. "Whom did you say, my girl? Speak up; do not be frightened."

"Miss Hilda, sir," stammered the child; "she has lived with us since her papa died. Our grandma was her nurse."

Stephen remembered the old woman as though her face reappeared before him by a flash of light through the lapse of years.

"Gran'ma is dead now, but Miss Hilda lives with us, and mother says as how we are to be kind to her, and help her, and do everything we can for her," went on the child, gaining courage as she looked up into the big man's kind face.

"Let me make no mistake," said Stephen, whose face had gone white as ashes underneath the sun-brown. "This is an important thing to me, my little girl. What is this young lady's other name?"

"Romney—Miss Romney," said the little maid, wondering that he should ask what it seemed to her everyone in the world should know.

Found at last! Stephen's brain reeled, and it was some time before he could speak.

"You live still," he said, with his breath coming hard and fast, "in the little cottage out near the hills?"

"Yes," said the child. "We call it Woodbine Cottage, but anyone along the road will know it better if you ask for Peters's house."

An hour later Stephen dismissed his driver at a short distance from the cottage. He remembered every inch of the breezy road along the common, within sight and sound of the sea. The little cottage was just the same, except that spring flowers bloomed in the garden borders, scarlet anemones, dusty auriculas, and heavy-headed violets nestling under their flat green leaves.

Mrs. Peters, comely as ever, opened the door. That she did not recognise him was evident by her face.

"I am a friend of Miss Romney's," he said, frantically endeavouring to calm his voice and demeanour. There was no use in appearing to these people like an escaped lunatic! "Can I see her?"

"She is in her own little parlour, sir—the room we built for her when she came to us. Step this way."

"Perhaps you had better ask her if she will see me," Stephen said, hesitating. "My name is Wray."

A sudden gleam of remembrance, of partial recognition, crossed the young woman's face. She took the card he gave her, and went back into the house.

When she returned, she looked grave and troubled.

"Follow me, sir," she said quietly. "Miss Romney wishes you to come in."

Along a narrow dark passage, through an open door, which was closed gently behind him, and Stephen stood once more in the presence of the woman he loved so deeply, so faithfully, so well.

She stood near the flower-framed window, with her pale, pathetic face turned towards him, no smile, no glance of recognition, of pleasure at again seeing him, upon her countenance. The little room, though spotlessly neat and clean, was plain even to ugliness in its arrangements. She had evidently not heart enough to make it pretty, nor to greatly care what her surroundings were, lost to the world in this lonely little cottage by the hills.

Stephen felt a great tide of emotion rising up in his throat, choking him, as he went forward and clasped her slight hand in his. She was trembling from head to foot.

"So you have come home again," she said. "I am glad!"

"I would give my life to hear you say those words, Hilda. Thank you for them. Yes, I am home again. My father is dead, and there was no longer any reason why I should not come back to England. And having come back to England, I have come back to you."

Then a feeling of remorse overtook him. Was this exactly true?

"Mary Owens, my friend, counselled me to do so," he stammered, "otherwise I should not have dared to do so."

Long ago, whenever he mentioned Mary Owens' name, a coldness used to come between them. So it was now, as she withdrew her hands from his clasp, and motioned him to a seat.

"It was kind of Miss Owens," she said quietly, "only I wonder you have found me. I did not think anyone could have told you where I live."

"It was hard enough to find you. Hilda, why do you bury yourself like this? It is not right; it cannot be good for you, or healthful for you, either body or soul. You are too young——"

"I have peace here, and friends, and they bear with my sorrow," she said.

"Would it not be better to come out in the world, and forget your sorrow, Hilda? It cannot be right that you should allow it to overmaster you thus."

She turned her face towards him with a startled expression on it.

"Then you do not know?" she said.

"What should I know?" he asked, a sudden dread coming upon him. "I know nothing about you except that I love you, and that you have always put me from you."

"I could not help it," she said, wincing where she sat as though he had struck her.

"Long ago you refused me, Hilda," he began; but she sprang to her feet, and stood facing him.

"Listen," she said, holding up her hand. "Listen, and I shall tell you why. It is true long ago I said 'No' to you over and over again, because I knew what the years were bringing, and would surely bring. The years have come, and they have brought their sorrow with them. Oh, Stephen, do you not know? Is it possible that you do not know? I am blind!"

CHAPTER XIX.

"THE THIRD TIME OF ASKING!"

"I claim you still, for my own love's sake!"

R. BROWNING.

On the cliff overlooking the sea they sat—Stephen and Hilda. He had led her out here in the bright morning sunshine. Far below at their feet the sea lay calm and brilliantly blue. Every crevice of the cliff was filled with primroses, down to the very edge of the soft mossy grass; away behind them on the hill-slope a slanting sheet of bluebells waved their heads in the wards, reading the past in the light of the present, thinking of her whose welfare he would gladly have purchased with his life, until dawn came, and gathered itself to daylight, and left him free to go to her once more.

"'So you have come home again,' she said."—p. 416.

sun-warmed atmosphere. The fields around were golden with armies of cowslips and fleets of buttercups. A lark carolled high up in the air above their heads.

Stephen's face was very white, and his eyes had the unrefreshed look left by a wakeful night. In his agony of sorrow he had not slept—had only paced forward in his room, to and fro, backwards and for-

Then he had led her unresisting out into the sunshine by the seashore. Now for words to tell her what he felt! He looked at the girl's sad white face in a sort of rapture of pity. What had his life been in comparison of hers? It broke his heart when he considered the silence, the sweet patience, the drear darkness, the weight of sorrow crushing that young heart, uncheered by one smallest ray of hope.

"When did it come to you, my darling?" he asked her brokenly. In his great grief he lavished tenderest names upon her, as we do to a dear little pet child who is hurt. She did not reprove him.

"The last thing I saw was my father's open grave," she said, in low, awestruck tones. "They led me home blind."

"And have you known for long that this was coming to you?" he questioned tenderly.

"I have grown up under its shadow," she replied, passing her hand wearily across her sightless face. "I have known since I was a little child it must be so with me. My mother was blind for over a year before she died."

"But why should you, therefore, think it must be your fate also?"

"Because at times my sight would suddenly fade—sometimes only grow dim, but of late it would go out altogether, leaving only darkness behind: often it has been so. It used to frighten me at first; then I got used to it—now I am completely blind."

"Then that was the shadow I have seen upon your face, dear, long ago. I have often wondered at the sudden clouding of your face, which was usually so bright, so clear," he cried impetuously.

"Yes; often when I have been with you it has come," she said. "Once, I recollect, it was that lovely evening you had taken me out in a boat, and there was an exquisite sunset, and I was so perfectly happy, when all at once it came, and shut out everything from me—your face, the sea, the sky, all went in a moment."

"And you did not tell me!" he murmured.

"Why should I?" she asked simply. "You could not have helped me: no one could. They said the sorrow about dear Uncle Drury, and the watching by my father, brought it on sooner than it would otherwise have come. I do not know."

"How good you are, Hilda! how patient!" he exclaimed.

"No, I am not patient," she said; "my heart is too full of pain to let me be patient. You must not say that of me, because it is not true. If you could only look into my heart, you would see how wicked I am—how far, how very far, from being patient and submissive."

She threw up her hands with a little despairing gesture, then meekly bowed her head, while great sorrowful tears rolled down her thin white cheeks. Stephen sat looking at her, all his love a thousand-fold intensified in his dark true eyes. He looked at the pale hand lying in her lap, and thought of the untold wealth he would gladly give might he but hold it in his, or even touch it.

"It comforts me to know you are sorry for me," she went on presently, forlornly wiping the tears as they thickly gathered and fell. "It is like a cup of water in a thirsty land. Sitting in the dark for ever, doing nothing, has been hard, guessing at the things about me by their feel and form. It is always night with me—a night without stars. Sometimes I passionately long for one moment of sight. I crave to see the blue shimmering of the sea, or a fruit-tree white with blossom, or the stars shining high up in a deep grey summer sky, or the children gather a flower and give it me, and I long to see its colour. All these common sights, that others think so little of, gone from me for ever! I loved them so well. To me it was such joy to see a glorious sunrise, or look out over the sea, so wide and fresh and fair—or to note a golden laburnum growing amidst the tender green of the larches, or to watch the soft morning mists rising from off the hills. It was not much: it is granted to almost everyone to see these common daily things, but I loved them all. And they are gone for ever. To sit and think of them is all I can do—when the sun shines warm on me, to say to myself, 'To-day the sky is blue, and great white clouds float softly along it; or perhaps it is dappled with silver. And the sea is blue too, with the cloud-shadows racing over its surface.' Memory is all I have left. I pray God of His great mercy to leave me that. I sometimes dread lest it too shall fade out into darkness, and leave me bereft indeed."

A great white butterfly came floating by on the breeze, rested an instant on a branch of gorse where the first spring flowers were opening, and fluttered away. Stephen watched it hovering, flitting, going, while his soul answered to the girl's heart-sick, bitter cry, and he knew not what to say to her.

"But there must be some remedy, some cure!" he exclaimed passionately. "My own dear little girl, it is not just, it is not fair that this shadow should always rest upon you. I cannot bear it—I will not bear it!"

"Hush!" she said gently. "Help me to be patient and submissive to God's will, rather than rebellious. Teach me to be good. No, there is no hope for me, Stephen, none. Long ago, when I was a very little girl, and first complained of this strange dimness, Uncle Drury took me to a doctor in Bullionston for advice, and he, when he heard of my mother, said that there was no hope—that I must be blind also."

"He was some stupid country fool," said Stephen hotly; "possibly not an oculist at all. Let me take you to one of the best men in London, and let us see what he will say before we pronounce it hopeless. Oh, Hilda, Hilda, my darling! if you can bear this, I cannot. My heart is broken for you."

His voice failed and broke, and in the silence she knew that he was weeping. Mutely she stretched out her hand towards him; he seized it, and bowed his face down on it, and she felt his hot, scalding tears, and heard the long, fierce sobs that shook his manhood to its depths.

Awhile she let him weep—she that had no longer tears for her own sorrow. Then she laid her other hand softly on the bowed head, and gently stroked his hair.

"Do not, Stephen, do not! It hurts me to hear you grieve like this for me. See, I do not grieve any longer for myself. That is all over and gone now. I have wept, but I smile now. Look in my face, and see if I am not contented—I do not say happy—I do not think even God expects me to be that—but contented. Cannot you be contented too? I should not have this to suffer except it were God's will. He has given me this cross to bear, and shall I refuse to carry it? I have you to be sorry for me. Christ had no one in His dark hour. Stephen, dear Stephen! do not weep: it breaks my heart."

The touch of the small hand on his hair, the sound of her quiet voice—though he scarce knew what she said, only that she called him by his name—soothed him.

"I feel the warm sunshine, I smell the flowers, and the fresh breezes of the sea come to me," she went on presently. "I can hear the birds singing in that wood close by, and in the mornings early they come and perch about the branches near my window and sing to me. For this shall I not thank God?" and she stretched out her hands to clasp the warm, fragrant air.

He sat looking at her in silence—silent because he dared not trust himself to speak—tears of great pity and utter love in his eyes, and yearning pain at his heart.

That great, simple, manly heart of his was nigh to breaking this bright, balmy morning in May, because that for all his love he could not ease her suffering. She held his very life in that little fragile hand of hers; all that he had was hers—his heart, and strength, and youth. And yet he could not help her.

Then she talked calmly of outside, indifferent things, gave him a little sketch of her life since her father died and Master Drury's kind old smile was laid beneath the churchyard sod. She spoke of the kindness she had met with, told him of the little interests she strove to make for herself in her darkened life, so that she might not be altogether useless—not altogether a burden; of the sorrow, deeper than loss or bereavement, which lay upon her, she scarce spoke at all. Her desire was rather to lead his thoughts away from that.

But Stephen's thoughts could not be turned from this one awful dominant fact—that her life was spoiled, and he could in nowise help her.

He stood up abruptly, and left her sitting on the mossy sward alone.

He stooped, and gathered a little posy of the pale, sweet primroses, and bringing them back to her, laid them in her lap.

"How fresh! how sweet!" she said, laying their soft petals to her pale cheek. "There is nothing so spring-like as the smell of primroses. I love them!"

"There is a schooner far out," he said abruptly. "She has all sail set, and in the sunshine she looks like a great butterfly poised above the sea. Far in the distance I see a fleet of brown-sailed fishing-boats. The sea fades into sky, and half of them seem sailing in the air."

Hilda's head droops lower over the primroses in her hand.

"Can you imagine," he went on, "how golden yellow is the gorse, just freshly bursting into bloom? and how vivid is the green of those young larch firs in the plantation to our left? Away inland among the trees I see the faint blue smoke above the hidden farms."

"You are cruel!" she cried passionately, throwing his flowers from her. "Cruel, cruel! unkind! Will you not let me forget?"

"I am cruel, my darling, that I may be kind," he said tenderly, while the tears stood in his eyes, and he gathered her hands into his strong, close clasp. "I want to make you discontented. I cannot bear to see you accept your fate so quietly, and sit down under the cloud that has overtaken you. I want to make you feel such a longing to see these things around you that you will come with me to London. I want to have the best advice for you. I am persuaded that you might be cured. So many people are cured in these days of maladies that our fathers and mothers sat down under as hopeless. I want you to consent to try, at least, what may be done."

"Is it wise, is it kind," she faltered, "to raise hopes within me that may be doomed to fresh disappointment? Is it not better now, after these long days of darkness, when I have almost learnt to submit in patience—is it not better to leave me so?"

"No, no! a thousand times no!" he cried impatiently. "Think what it would be to you—a successful operation, your sight restored—your life again bright as a young girl's life should be."

She covered her face in her hands.

He went on tenderly, his voice deep and husky with emotion—

"Think what it would be to me."

She raised her head, and turned her sweet, sightless eyes towards him. He interpreted the meaning quickly enough.

"Do not misunderstand me, darling," he said. "I do not mean what I said selfishly. I have no hope of ever being more to you than I am now—your friend. But your friend I will be. You surely do not mean to take that poor privilege from me? It is because I love you so dearly, so entirely, that I ask you to make this one effort—because your sorrow is my sorrow, your joy my greatest happiness, your blindness, darkness, is misery of soul to me. I want you to be happy. I would give wealth and health, yes, life itself to make you happy, to lift this burden from you, to clear this shadow from your path. To know you bright and happy once more would be lifelong happiness to me. I could then step aside, and if you so willed it, never ask to see your face again."

"What love is this!" she cried bitterly. But a deep crimson flush rose and burned in her cheeks, while her lips trembled—almost it seemed with happiness. "To think that after all these years you love me still! What have I done to win a heart so true, so utterly faithful as yours? Oh, Stephen! forgive me—it was not all my fault. I never dreamt you would love me so. I have hoped, yes, I have prayed that you might forget me. I have of late pictured you as the husband of Miss Owens. I have thanked God that you had forgotten me."

"I have never ceased to love you, Hilda," he said simply. "If I thought I had succeeded in stifling my love for you—I honestly tried to do so—now this morning I find I made a mistake. But when I spoke of love to you long ago, dear, it always vexed your little heart because you could not return it. It was an offering that found no response in you. That was in nowise your fault. Love is free to come and free to go; and you never loved me, and frankly told me so. That is over and done with now, and there is no one to blame. Most assuredly I do not blame myself for loving you; for, knowing you, I must love you, and Heaven knows I am not coxcomb enough to blame you for not loving me. There is little in me to love. But it is not of love I want to speak this morning. It is of you, dear, always of you—it is only to plan how you may be helped—how you may, under God's grace, be cured. I shall never more vex you with speech of love; only believe always my heart is yours, my service is yours, and my happiness is yours, inasmuch as I shall never know a happy hour again until this shadow is lifted from your life."

"The children gather round me, and I tell them stories."—p. 421.

"And if I go to London, and if I try what can be done, and if it fails?" she asked, in low, awe-struck tones.

"It will not fail," he said passionately.

"I feel that it will," she said, with a sorrowful shake of the head. "I know I am hopelessly blind. The doctors can do no more than make conviction certainty—what then?"

"What then?" he said hoarsely. "Why, you will have done all within your power, and if the case is pronounced hopeless—but it won't, it can't be: that would be too cruel—why, then you are no worse off than you are now this morning, sitting here with me on this green hillside."

"No worse off! Ah, Stephen! how can you say so? To come back here to my little cottage home, where they are kind and faithful to me, because they have always known and loved me, the only friends I have, save you——"

"I am glad you recognise my friendship," he said quietly.

"Come back here to pass my life in the certainty of darkness for evermore. To have a most painful hope raised in my heart, only to have it stifled for ever. To go forth, longing, yearning, reaching towards light, to return with the sentence pronounced, 'No hope.'"

"But why come back here?"

"Where else have I to go?"

Stephen glanced below him to where the little ivy-clad cottage was outlined against the green cowslip-besprinkled meadow beyond, with its casements opened to the light and air, and a tendril of white smoke curling above its thatched roof. No other house but that—no other friends than the humble hearts within it.

"It must be dreary for you. They are good and kind, I am sure," he said deprecatingly, as half in doubt what he was going to say. "But they cannot be proper society for you. If you must be blind, all around you should be as bright, as cheerful, as congenial as possible; someone to read for you, to tell you what is going on in the world you cannot see, to bring you a breath from the living world where men live, and move, and work. Life here must be perfect stagnation."

"They are kind to me," she said forlornly. "And they are all I have. Do not try to make me discontented; I do not stagnate. I can sit and think of the places I have seen; I can remember, for instance, that autumn day I went up the hills with you, and how soft the heat-haze lay upon the sea, and dimmed the outline of the hills, and how pink the heather was, and the gorse how golden and fragrant. I can picture dear Uncle Drury's face, and see him in the night watches—night or morning I know not which, all is night to me now—or I can think I am in church, listening to my father's voice as he reads the service. And in the dusk the children gather round me, and I tell them stories; or when it is bright and sunny, as to-day, Kate Peters takes my hand, and leads me to the little garden, where I can sit in the comfortable chair her husband made specially for me, and dream that I am in the garden at home, and that I have only my eyes closed, and that presently the bell will ring and rouse me, and I shall go down to the house to dinner; or when Kate is busy I sometimes mind her little baby for her, and the gentle touches of its small, soft hands upon my blind eyes seem some way to bring me nearer to God."

"But it is a sad, sad life for you, my darling," he urged. "Even your own showing of it wrings my very heart with its pathos. Think of a life like this stretching out before you for years and years!"

"I dare not think," she said.

"It need not be like this," he pleaded. "Can you not let me try and make a happier life for you?"

"I do not see how you could."

"Oh! if I could only show you what is in my heart! If only you could believe me, dear, when I speak; if only you could believe it is not selfishness which prompts me! I will never speak to you one word of love; but will you not even now trust me, put your hand in mine, and let me make your life a little more like what it should be? The world would not understand a mere friendship between us—the world never does trouble itself to think the right thing; otherwise, I should ask you just to let me be your friend, your brother, your guardian. But let me have a dearer and a closer claim to shield you—I will serve you with all my heart. Surely, dear, surely as my wife you would be a little happier—your life would be somewhat less desolate than in that little cottage below there. I will promise not to let my love for you become a persecution to you. I will not speak of it to you, darling. I will not even call you darling, if you do not like. I will be solemn and staid as a judge, and as cold as a mummy. But do give me the right to take care of you and do things for you! Think what joy you could give me by consenting. What would it be to me to have you to come home to of an evening: to read to you all the new books as they came out; to have you sing for me in the twilight the old songs you used to sing long ago at the Parsonage. Hilda, dear Hilda! grant me my request."

"Stephen," she said, very sweetly, and gropingly stretching forth her hand until it rested upon his, "I thank you very deeply—I cannot tell you what I feel, nor how all ashamed I am to receive a love of which I am most unworthy. I do not know why you love me as you do, but I accept it as a fact; and in my lonely life your friendship will be a great boon, a blessing, a brightness above that which I had dared to hope for. But to accept this other sacrifice at your hands—hush! I know what you would say: that it is no sacrifice—but still I cannot, and I will not, accept it. Come and see me sometimes; I shall be glad to hear your voice and feel your presence; it will be something to look forward to when the days are drear and long in passing. But believe me when I tell you this, that if I would not become your wife long ago when I only dreaded this trial, less than ever will I consent now, when the blow has fallen, and I know the worst. Do not ask me any more, dear Stephen. It is only grief to both of us, harping on this theme."

Sorrowfully he looked down upon the slight, thin fingers lying on his own sinewy brown hand. Well he knew the gentle obstinacy of the girl, how she would in nowise yield.

"Hilda," he said, with a short laugh that was mostly of baffled pain, "how I wish I could take you up in my arms, slight little thing that you are, and run away with you, whether you would or no. I am sorry the good old 'Young Lochinvar' days are over. If only I had you safe, for instance, on that full-rigged schooner—only a speck on the horizon now—I would fly away with you to southern seas, or somewhere where the sun would be always bright and warm, and the birds always singing in the trees, and against your will I would take care of you, and make you happy."

"You could never make me happy against my will," she said, and sighed.

"No, I suppose not," he replied, re-echoing the sigh. "Well, I suppose I must only content myself with the permission you give me of remaining your friend, and coming to see you now and again. How often shall I come?"

"Whenever you like," she said, trying to smile. "Once a year, perhaps."

"Whenever I like would be every hour of every day, Hilda," he replied gravely. "And it is a long way from London to these your barbarous shores. Nothing amuses me more than the calm way you women expect a mutilated man to keep afloat, and do his daily work as if he were all right."

"What do you mean?" she asked.

"Why, if I am in London, and you are here in this little cottage by the sea, am not I mutilated? It is not a pretty word, I know, but it fits the case exactly. I there, you here, a yearly visit, a few words of greeting before the time of saying good-bye arrives—I call that nothing but mutilation. I declare I could get on better without a limb than I expect to do now, with the knowledge of you here alone, blind and desolate. Do you think any pleasant sights will have much charm for me henceforth?"

"Stephen, you feel things too deeply. You must reconstruct your life. Can you not marry? When you come to think seriously of it, a blind wife would really be a sore affliction; and then your wife can ask me on a visit, and I shall come—"

He put his finger on her lips suddenly. "I can stand a good deal," he said sternly, "but not talk like this from you."

"Is Miss Owens still unmarried?" she faltered.

"Yes," he replied, thinking what ages ago that day in Westminster cloisters seemed, when he had asked Mary to be his wife.

"I think she always cared for you," said Hilda.

"She never did," he answered. "She told me with her own lips that once she did love someone, but that he did not care for her. Mary and I are nothing but very good friends. I asked her the other day to marry me, and she refused."

"Perhaps she did not think you loved her enough," said Hilda, growing red.

"Perhaps so. Her answer was that she had loved, and been disappointed. I had loved and been disappointed too, you see, so I knew what she meant. I had a sort of dreamy idea of two marred lives making one perfect one, but Mary was wiser than I, and put me from her—I am glad she did now. I would rather have you on the come-to-see-you-once-a-year system than be the adored and jubilant husband of any other woman on earth."

"Perhaps it was for you Mary Owens cared," thought Hilda. But she did not put her thought into words, and, shortly after, the sunshine passed from off the spot where they were seated, and Stephen, rising, led her down the hillside.

CHAPTER XX.

FROM CROSS TO CROWN.

"I bless Him for my life and for my death,
But most, that in my death my life is crowned."
MISS MULOCH.

"WHY did you not send for me sooner? I would have come to you. It is not good for you to be here alone," said Mary Owens, as she bent tenderly over her old friend, Mr. Davenent.

The old man was lying on his small, narrow bed, his face as white as the pillows underneath his head.

"I knew your love would never fail, my child," he said, smiling up into her eager, anxious face. "But I have wanted for naught, and I told them not to send for you until the end drew near. And to-day the doctor told me it was time. Will you stay with me to the end, dear?"

"Of course I will," she murmured brokenly.

"It is not that I am afraid to die," he went on feebly. "I know in Whom I have believed, and He is near me now. He will turn the shadow of death into the morning. But it will be sweet to pass hence with a human heart which loves me near me, holding my hand until I reach the other side. Do I ask too much of your love, Mary?"

"No; nothing that I could do for you would be too much," she answered.

"Then you love me, dear child?"

"I do—I do—oh, indeed I do! When you are gone I shall have no one left to love"—and she broke down, sobbing, kneeling by his bedside, with her face hidden in the clothes. Very tenderly the old worn hand rested on the bowed head, and his face was as the face of an angel.

He lay quietly hour after hour. Mary, grown calm, sat by him, tended him with every sweet observance her love could dictate, read for him at his request, or softly repeated favourite hymns for him.

Now and again, as his feeble state would let him, he spoke to her: told her much of the days when he and her mother were young and loved each other. He had no restless sufferings or death pains to harass him; very quietly and calmly he lay, life fast ebbing from the tired limbs that had toiled so long and so faithfully.

"They say this has come suddenly," he said, turning towards her, as the long, bright day wore on to evening, and the small, bare room grew darker. "But to me it has not been sudden. I have felt my strength decaying, each one of my old limbs growing stiffer as I went about my work; my eyes grown strangely dim, and my natural force considerably abated. The grasshopper has been a burden."

"And yet you would take no rest," said Mary, with tender reproach.

"No; I needed none. Besides, the labourers are few. There is no time for rest. Life is brief, and sin and sorrow are all around. The green pastures are before me, and fulness of rest is there. It sorrows me most of all to go hence and leave my people. But I try not to think of this—to remember that He Who takes me away can make it up to them. And what am I, that they should miss me? Why do you not reprove my conceited moanings, Mary?"—with the old bright, quaint smile she knew so well shining out on his thin face.

"Leave your work with me," she said earnestly, taking his hand in hers. "I have money, and I shall see that all that you have been doing here shall not fall to the ground. It will not be the same as though it were still yourself—that can never be—but trust me, dear father, for it all."

"Thank you, my child; I do. When Mary makes a promise, the thing is sure."

As the evening wore on he seemed to grow stronger. He sat up in his bed, propped up with pillows, and took a white rose from the flowers Mary had brought him, to hold in his hand and look at lovingly. Mary sat by him, and sang for him soft, gentle, tender hymns about the home above. His face was full of the glory of life's sunset, with some of the awed solemnity of the joy of heaven's dawn. For him at eventide there was light.

"The end is not far off now," he whispered, as she bent over him to arrange his pillows. "You and I shall sit and talk together no more until we meet in the Land o' the Leal. Do you remember singing that one day for poor old blind Jameson, dear? You sang it to me also, though you did not know all that I love are there; and you will come some day. Mary, my child! Mary, see that you come. Choose the better part, and remember now that I say this to you here on my death-bed, at the end of a long life: there is nothing so good as love, neither fame, nor riches, nor intellect, nor power—nothing like love. The man who loves best is most Godlike. See that you love Christ first and best, and then love all His creatures for His dear sake."

Mary is silent, for she cannot trust herself to speak.

"All else will fade away into nothingness," he murmured. "But love remains. When I was young I walked in my own ways, and after the counsel of my own thoughts. And He cut down my green gourd. And now is it sweet to go hence to His rest. I have done my work, I have finished my course. May He for whom it was done Himself make it perfect."

Then he lay very still for a long, long time. Mary could scarce hear his breathing; at times she bent over him in her agony of fear lest it had stopped, and that he had gone without a farewell glance or word. He had never been one to give trouble, and he gave none now. Little by little the sounds of the daily turmoil of the outside world died away into silence. The sky darkened, but a dim light burned behind a curtain, making fitful shadows on the carpetless floor. The little room was fragrant with the white lilac and the roses Mary had brought with her. In the next room watched the old woman who had always waited on Mr. Davenport, and kept his small rooms neat and clean. The small clock on the mantel-piece ticked loudly. Mary watched the hands move slowly yet inexorably on. Never had the sense of how time, once gone, never returns, pressed so keenly on her soul as now, when she looked from the clock to the worn, white face on the pillow. And more than ever the paltriness of human hopes, and joys, and sorrows, and interests, spread itself out before her, as she sat and waited in the stillness where a soul was passing away, and a spirit returning to God who gave it.

"And you, Mary," he said faintly, suddenly unclosing his eyes, and looking on her with gentle kindness; "your mother will ask me of you: what shall I tell her?"

"Tell her how good you have been to me," she answered, stroking the thin hand, cold, though the night was warm and a bright fire burned on the hearth. "Tell her how faithfully you have fulfilled the trust she left you; how tenderly you have striven to make me better, wiser, holier. Tell her how I shall miss you, who have been all to me: father, mother, friend, counsellor."

"And shall I tell her she will one day see you again?" he asked wistfully.

Mary's head bowed upon his hand. Reverently she spoke, and low, when she looked up and answered him. "Tell her, with God's help, yes."

"Thank God for that," he murmured. "Often have I reproached myself about you, Mary, since that sorrowful night when you opened your heart to me, and I knew for the first time the foundations of your happiness were laid on earth."

"It is so no longer," she whispered softly. A faint pressure of the dying hand answered her more fully than words could have done.

The little clock chimed midnight, the firelight flamed and leaped in sudden lights and shadows on the bare, plain walls of the little room. The still face upon the pillows seemed to grow greyer and more wan as the slow hours went on. Mary could not tell if he slept or were only lying at rest, and thinking of the life lived and the glory about to be revealed. In her sick agony of sorrow, she almost wished, but for the pleasure they had given him, that she had not brought the flowers which filled all the room with their heavy fragrance. Never again should the scent of white lilac come to her without bringing back sharp memories of this sorrowful night. No one knows how long a night can be until they have passed its leaden-footed hours by the bed where one lies dying.

"And Stephen, where is he?" the old man asked abruptly, opening his eyes, and speaking as naturally as if hours had not gone over since last he spoke.

"He is away just now in the country," answered Mary, wondering if it was only three days ago since she had met him in the cloisters at the Abbey—wondering at herself that she had felt grief that day. It was for now—this sad, solemn moment—she should have kept her tears.

"He loves you—you will marry?" the old man feebly asked.

"He loves me not in that way," she answered calmly. "I shall never marry, dear father."

"Ah! I hoped always it would all come right," he murmured. "I wanted to know my Mary a happy wife—the light and centre of some good man's home."

"That will never be," she said.

"If he loves you—as, indeed, he must—and comes to you, do not send him away. Not for pride, or want of love—do not go with a homeless heart to the end of your days, Mary. There is nothing so desolate as that. Riches cannot make up for loneliness."

"No; but work can fill the place of love," she said softly—"as it has done with you."

"There is nothing so beautiful as love. Your work will be all the better if your heart behind it is not forlorn and aching. Mine ached for many years, dear child of her I loved. My lot has been cast among earth's solitary ones, and from the depths of my own sad experience I say to you, save yourself, if you can, from such a fate. If you cannot, then accept it as God's will for you, and His love will make the rough places smooth and the crooked ways straight. But for any false ideas of self-sacrifice do not make two lives dark—Stephen's life and your own."

"No," she said sweetly, passing tender fingers over the brow where the death-dews were gathering. "I will do what is right—I will do whatever is best for him." And in her heart she resolved that this was a promise she should hold most sacred. At any, at all costs, would she keep faithful to this word given to the dying man.

May dawns come early. Soon the grey light from the outside world came creeping into the room—not the jubilant sunrise of the country, where the clouds mass themselves in royal robes of crimson and purple and gold about his upward sweeping path, and the rivers sing among the hills, and the birds twitter joyously in their nests, but just the cold grey light growing momentarily intenser, coming into the every nook and corner that the darkness of night has hidden, blending itself with the sickly flickering of the candles, and making the fire look dull and dead.

As the light grew stronger the dying man moved restlessly.

"Say the comfortable words," he whispered, turning his dim eyes to the patient watcher by his side. Mary at first was puzzled—she did not know what he meant; but at last it flashed upon her, and, reverently kneeling down, she slowly, softly repeated them, beginning with "Come unto Me, all ye that travail and are heavy laden, and I will refresh you."

Ere she ceased he had gone hence. As the man lives, so doth he die. So dies this old man, in great peace and absolute patience, closing meek eyes in the long, silent sleep till the trumpet shall sound. What his hand had found to do, he had done it with his might: "for behold, there is neither work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave." While it was day he had worked patiently, quietly, in face of darkness and disappointment, and weakness and loneliness. Now he had gone away to that land that is very far off, into the sunshine of the great smile of God.

"THE LEAST OF THESE MY BRETHREN."

A STORY OF GERMAN PHILANTHROPY.

ROMANTIC story is that of the labours of Count von der Recke Volmerstein among the destitute, the idiotic, and the orphans. England is richest, perhaps, of all the countries of the earth in such chronicles; but no work of like faith within our own shores carries such simple, quiet beauty; and for this reason: in England, orphan and idiotic asylums are supported by united efforts of numbers; while in the case of which we write, these institutions were the outcome of one man's self-renunciation. Count von der Recke Volmerstein voluntarily gave up his paternal halls and palaces, to house the poor recipients of his charity, and dedicated to their support the revenues of his estates as offerings unto his Lord. If ever a man deserved the blessing, "Ye have done it unto Me," that man is this German nobleman. The story of his self-abnegation and humility comes like a far-off breath from the land of Paradise.

When a boy, Adelbert von der Recke Volmerstein manifested deep tenderness for every living thing. A beautiful dove was drowning in the sullen waters of the moat which surrounded his ancestral home, and, heedless of his own danger, he seized a washing-tub and paddled out to save the bird, while his mother, terrified into silence, expected to see him perish before her eyes. As he grew into boyhood, he pleaded the cause of the idiot lads who were labouring on the surrounding farms, so successfully with his father that this nobleman granted a house on his estate of Overdyk, which house the young Count at once made into a home for idiots. The first inmate of this home was a lad who had been employed by a peasant to tend swine, and who not only fed with these swine out of their troughs, but slept with them at night. This was in 1819; and in 1822 the young Count opened a larger asylum for orphans and destitute children, at Düsseldorf Abbey, on the banks of the Rhine, and thus continued and extended that long career of personal self-devotion which has contributed so much to the success of the institutions.

By this time his philanthropy had grown to be far-reaching and wide, so as to embrace orphans and homeless children as well as idiots. These he trained up in the fear of God, besides giving all a special education, whereby they could earn their own support in the great world without, whenever they were fit to be discharged. The building was not his by inheritance, but by purchase, and this purchase absorbed so much money that for a long time the Count halted, undecided anxieties of her husband's work, while their little family grew up around them, learning how to serve others, and witnessing for themselves the many providential interpositions which occurred from time to time on behalf of the institutions. For sometimes the oil in the cruse and the meal as to whether he should accomplish it or not. But it was prayed over and pondered for many months. At last the final bargain was made; between four and five thousand pounds of English money were paid, and Düsselthal Abbey, together with 115 acres of good land, became the property of the Count. Hither he brought his young wife, a daughter of one of the noblest families of the land, and together they strove to fulfil the commands of our Lord in ministering to the homeless, the sick, the naked, and the hungry.

The Countess fully shared the toils and the in the barrel failed, so that they literally had to depend upon their Heavenly Father for the next supplies. It was not, therefore, surprising that the Count and his helpers became mighty in prayer and faith. In answer to these prayers, doubtless, the hearts of many good people were moved to send help to the needy children. The Count gives a few of his experiences in relation to the providential character of the relief which he received at various times when in distress for want of means. The touching simplicity of his story cannot be improved upon. Thus:—

"Yesterday we had no salt in the house, and no money to buy any; we sought the Lord in our distress, and He who heareth the prayer of faith was near to help. The salt was necessary, and in firm hope and humble confidence I ordered the miller's man to come to me the next morning for orders and the money for a sack of salt before he went to the town. I stood at the window as he came across the courtyard. Seven dollars and a half were wanting; there was no money in the purse, and I had already given the last shilling of my own. My distress was great; but before the man had ascended the stairs, I heard a knock at the door, and a farmer entered, who brought seven and a half dollars, which he had owed me some time. Now I could give the money for the salt, with a joyful and grateful heart.

"At a time of great distress I had a bill of sixty-eight dollars to discharge on a certain day. The morning before we had not sixty-eight pence. I knew not where to obtain it, but one Source alone never failed us in the hour of need. I sought Him in fervent prayer, Who hath declared 'The silver and the gold are Mine.' I pleaded His own sacred promises, His gracious assurance, and these were made good the next day. The post-bag brought me sixty-eight dollars at noon, from a distant land, and we rendered praise and thanks unto our Lord. But our faith and patience were to be put to a further trial; a man came very unexpectedly, after dinner, with another bill, which must be paid immediately, and this took away twenty-four dollars. Oh! then it was needful to cry again for help, that our faith and hope might not be brought to shame; and He heard us when we called upon Him, and gave us more than we asked. In the afternoon the post-man came again with a letter from my beloved father, enclosing twenty-two dollars, and expressing a wish that they might be blessed to our assistance, and that, if He thought fit, the Lord might double this sum by the way. See, this prayer of my pious parent was answered, for another letter at the same time brought forty-five dollars from a kind friend in Lauenburg; so that when our creditor came in the evening, I could cheerfully give him his sixty-eight dollars, and had still some left for the next day.

"It happened once that, for the purpose of supplying the needs of those under my care, I had been obliged to incur a debt of one thousand dollars. The day when my bill for that amount became due was approaching; I perceived that I had not the money to meet it, and after careful consideration I could see no prospect of obtaining such a sum. In this difficulty I had recourse to prayer, and after a time I received a feeling of assurance that the Lord would provide for my wants and send me the assistance I required in good time. This feeling increased upon me, though my secretary grieved me with his doubts and fears, and was continually saying, 'You may hope the money will be forthcoming, but where is it to come from?' When the day arrived and no prospect of money appeared, he seemed to triumph in the disappointment which he thought was awaiting my still unshaken faith and hope. When I perceived this, I retired to my own room, closed the door, and on my knees implored the Lord, for His name's sake, and for the sake, too, of this man's immortal soul, that He would not let my humble confidence in Him be put to shame, nor suffer the impending distress to come upon me. I arose strengthened and composed, so that when he entered, and asked me in a mocking tone to give him my orders for the discharge of his bill, I answered him calmly, 'Do not be afraid, but go now to the post and fetch the letters.' I had no suspicion of the manner in which relief was to be sent to me. I only knew that my Lord, in whose service I was engaged, had seen our trouble, and I felt confident He would send relief, for He has promised to hear the prayer of faith; and His Word is everlasting truth. My secretary turned to go, but stopped himself to ask, 'But if I do not find anything, what then?'—'Only go,' was my reply, and I again lifted up my voice to the throne of grace. He came back with an altered countenance, and as he rushed into my room he burst into tears, and handed me a letter with a stamp on the cover, showing that it contained one thousand dollars. The Lord had beheld our distress before it reached us, and had already provided against it. On reading the letter I found that a pious young man, a baker in Berlin, had been to a friend of mine in that city to ask his advice, saying he had lately acquired a considerable property, and wished to know how he could put out one thousand dollars at the safest interest. My friend mentioned several ways, such as the funds, purchase of land, etc. 'No, no; these are not of the kind I mean,' he said; 'I wish to devote this money to the service of the Lord, and I want your advice as to the best way of doing that.'—'Oh,' replied my friend, 'if that is what you mean, send it to the orphan and destitute children at Düsseldorf.' And this was the money that arrived in the hour of our need."

Over three hundred children found a home within the walls of this abbey; but this fact only stimulated the Count to seek for other channels of benevolence. Idiot children seemed to have been the Count's peculiar care. His mind reverting to his earliest effort on behalf of idiotic children at Overdyk, nearly half a century before, he opened a large Stift, or Good Samaritan Idiot Asylum, at Crashnitz, on one of the Silesian plains to the east of Prussia, whither the family had removed because of the Count's failing health. This Schloss had a large number of children and young people as inmates, from whose minds all, or nearly all, intelligence seemed to have fled. A number of Protestant deaconesses, trained under the good Count's direction, were appointed to tend the children in 1860, while all the arrangements for night and day seemed designed to educate and cherish every little spark of reason, wherever existing. Outside the house itself little sheds were erected, where the most capable of the patients were taught to do carpentering, while the most helpless were amused by watching them. In the balconies the children took necessary recreation in wet weather. Over every door a passage of Scripture was painted up, and pictures, object-lessons, rocking-horses, appliances designed to amuse as well as to convey instruction, abounded in every apartment. Bible lessons, given at first in much simplicity, and with doubt as to the ultimate benefit to a very large proportion of the listeners, succeeded beyond all anticipation. As the words of Eternal Truth fell on the dull ears of the idiots, new interests were awakened, and new aims in life brought into being. Thenceforward, many of them grew to love the Jesus of Whom they heard.

Amid the desolations of war, in 1866, the work at this idiot asylum was consolidated and extended. Barns and outbuildings, designed for the instruction of the boys in husbandry, rose around the Schloss; in addition, improvements and enlargements of the original building were carried out. Many friends of the undertaking counselled a prudent retrenchment of the work, rather than an extension, in that time of unrest and anxiety; but the Count, strong in faith, went on as calmly and confidently as if nations were not arrayed against sister-nations. He says, referring to this time, "We had, indeed, rich cause, amidst the fears and the fortunes of war, to praise the true and gracious God for His help, which we had foreseen in faith, and which was sent to us so faithfully and graciously, day by day, that no single day were our children or our household in need; and no one Monday was the money wanting for the weekly wages of the masons and carpenters. And so, amid the tumults of war and the rejoicings of peace, our barn and cowhouse rose prosperously to the roof."

The asylum was made use of as a hospital for sick and wounded soldiers during the war of 1866, as many as thirty-four occupying it at one time. The twelve deaconesses and probationers of the institution gladly added these new duties to their former ones. And the convalescent soldiers united with their friends in entertaining and caring for the idiots. Doubtless, as the brave fellows went back to their homes, they carried many a pleasant reminiscence of their sojourn in the hospitable Stift.

Over one hundred and fifty idiots are now accommodated in the asylum and the smaller wing which has arisen by its side, while a succession of teachers and deaconesses have entered into the work. But the aged Countess has long gone to her rest, full of days and honours.

In 1864, failing health drew on, as the result of her unwearied labours in the behalf of the institutions. She had assisted her husband faithfully in the personal superintendence of the homes, from the first day of her married life until the last one of strength which remained, having sometimes to work unceasingly from five in the morning until half-past ten at night. Not only was she housekeeper, to save expense, but also sick-nurse, having at one time as many as fifty cases of scarlet fever under her care, including one of her own children. All of these happily recovered. Her own family numbered ten children, all of whom grew up to honour the God of their parents. Not long before the death of the Countess, Queen Augusta of Prussia conferred the Louisa Order of Merit upon her; but her humility was so great that she could not believe the honour to be meant for her, and begged to be allowed to decline it. Her request was not granted, seeing that the Queen was graciously determined to honour a lady so distinguished for good works as the Countess Recke. She exchanged earth for heaven in 1867.

But the memory of these philanthropists is still green and fragrant. Many have prayed for blessings on their heads; while many more, through years yet to dawn, will mention them in grateful honour. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these My brethren, ye have done it unto Me." And surely senseless idiots are most truly among the very least of Christ's little ones.

A MODERN HEROINE.

NOT every heroine needs must do -
 Some gallant thing,
 That thrills a nation through and through,
 All wondering.

Not every heroine needs must stand
 In blaze of glory,
 Talked of, and praised by all the land
 In poem and story.

Felicia is my heroine's name,
 And brave is she,
 As any maiden known to fame
 Or chivalry.

Dark, truthful eyes, a loving mouth,
 A sweet fair face ;
 A very maiden of the South,
 With all its grace.

And she was loved as she should be,
 By one good, true :
 No fitter, worthier mate than he,
 As well she knew.

But a great trust was hers to hold
 With courage rare :
 A mother crippled, yet not old,
 Must be her care ;

And brothers, sisters growing up,
 Asked all her love ;
 And she—she gladly took the cup
 From God above,

And with a brave heart said " Good-bye "
 To him so dear,
 And followed Duty earnestly,
 With scarce a tear.

Since then full twenty years have sped,
And from the nest
The little ones in turn have fled
On many a quest.

But the old mother still remains
Her daughter's care ;
And lo ! my heroine finds her gains
All centred there !

The dear old face oft at her wiles
Glow like the sun :
I fancy then the Master smiles
And says, " Well done."

An old, old story this, you say.
Thank God, it is !
We meet such heroines every day :
Just such as this !

THE RESURRECTION OF THE BODY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE GREAT TWIN BRETHREN," "THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN," ETC. ETC.

RELIEF in the Resurrection of the Body is, and has always been, an essential part of the creed of Christendom ; the subject is one of absorbing interest to the faithful, and one against which the strenuous and sustained attacks of sceptics have been long and constantly directed. Much has been written about the matter, but a brief restatement of the case, viewed by the light of modern science, may be found, I trust, helpful to some seekers after truth.

First, let us try to gain a clear notion as to what we mean precisely by "the Resurrection of the Body." The general, if not universal, belief among Christians in ancient times—the belief which is still, I venture to think, the popular belief among uneducated people—is the one which we find represented in such quaint pictures as that in Lutterworth Church, in Leicestershire—the church where Wycliff preached—the belief that though the various parts of man become dissolved after death, and are perhaps dispersed to the four winds of heaven, yet at the Resurrection every several particle of dissolved and corrupted man shall be again united ; that all the parts and limbs of the body, howsoever they are scattered, wheresoever they are lodged, shall be made to fly together again ; that the ruined fabric shall be recomposed ; that every bone shall be brought to its old neighbour bone, the self-same muscles and sinews be twined together as they were before, and be covered with the selfsame flesh and skin ; in short, that all the different parts of the human body shall become again the same parts of the same body to which they once belonged.

Now, Science has taught us to reconsider this belief ; nay, further, it compels us to abandon belief in such a Resurrection as this, because it teaches us beyond all doubt or question that the human body when dead decays, and becomes in course of time entirely disorganised, that it is resolved into its elementary particles, and—mark this—that those elementary particles may be and often are absorbed into other bodies, whether of animals or fish, or plants or trees, and thence again may even become incorporated into other human bodies ; so that the same identical particles may actually in the lapse of ages have formed essential parts of many separate and distinct bodies.

This is no vague theory, but a proved and certain fact, and therefore the old-fashioned idea of the manner of the Resurrection of the Body involves the unavoidable absurdity that there might be several claimants for each single particle ! and doubting scoffers in modern times have naturally made the most of this absurdity, which of course you will see never struck people at all, whether believers or unbelievers, until the discoveries of which I have been speaking were made.

But Science tells us something else, which, if it does not give us a complete answer to the questions, "How are the dead raised up ?" and "With what body do they come ?" does at least give us a clue to the right answer, and mightily confirms our faith in the fact of the Resurrection of the Body, because it sweeps away the cobwebs of ignorance, and shows us that a most true and real resurrection of the body does not necessitate nor depend upon the reunion of every several particle which went aforesaid to compose that body.

Science tells us that there is constant waste, constant renewal, constant change, going on in our bodies ; that no single particle in the body of a full-grown man formed any part of his body when he was an infant, that no single particle of his baby body remains a constituent portion of the body of his manhood. What a startling difference between the full-grown man in his prime and the helpless infant, "mewling and puking in the nurse's arms !" Yet from birth to maturity, and on to most extreme old age, in spite of all the changes in his body through growth and wear-and-tear, and by reason of the food which he digests to restore the ravages of time, the man never changes from one individual to another ; he never loses his own original identity: he is always essentially the same person. There is a germ, a seed, a seat of life somewhere, which is I, myself. True, Science has not yet discovered where it is nor what it is, but Science can and does tell me that it is not this material body of flesh and blood and bones. Science assures me that I have worn out, as it were, several different natural bodies during my passage through this world, and therefore, although the last earthy body, wherewith I shall be clothed, do perish after death, it is no absurdity to hold that God may give to me a spiritual body, a heavenly body, incorruptible, immortal, and yet that I myself may still remain the very, identical—the real, unalterable I, myself!

This, I believe, the All-Ruling, All-Powerful God can do; this is what I mean that I believe He will do, when I declare that I believe in "The Resurrection of the Dead," "The Resurrection of the Flesh," "The Resurrection of the Body."

And before I pass to my second point, let me say that the most stupendous change, the most considerable increase of glory in the Resurrection body, compared with those bodies which we now possess (which I have tried to show you is quite compatible with the complete preservation of our own identity), need never be thought to interfere at all with the recognition of that identity by those who have known us on earth. Show one who has studied entomology some gorgeous, heavenward-soaring butterfly, with its hundred-tinted wings, and he will recognise immediately and describe for you minutely the colour, bands, and stripes, and spots, he will at once recall to memory and tell you without any hesitation each distinguishing feature of the grub, the dingy, creeping caterpillar which once was it itself, and which has been so wondrously developed into the "imago," the perfect insect, of marvellous beauty. Why, then, should we doubt that when we bear the image of the Heavenly, we, with our fuller gifts of intelligence, shall know, and shall be known by, those who, along with us, have borne the image of the earthly?

In regard to the ground for our belief in the Resurrection. When asked "Why do we believe it?" the answer must always be, "Because it is a doctrine to be gathered most plainly from Holy Scripture." Philosophers of old time thought the soul, indeed, might live for ever, but that the body perished at death; Christ tells us otherwise: He tells us the body will live for ever.

A future life after the death of the body, the immortality of the undying soul, is the universal belief of mankind: it is a belief which, like that in the existence of God, unless stifled, lives on, amid whatever debasements in the human heart and consciousness. Heathenism believed in the continued life of the soul; and possibly those mysterious Egyptians—the relics of whose palaces and temples fill us, when we only read about them, with awe and wonder—perhaps they believed in the Resurrection of the Body. I think so, from the care which they took to embalm and preserve their dead.

At all events, the doctrine is taught, with more or less distinctness, by a few passages in the Old Testament, the sacred books of the Hebrew people, and (though men may deny the truth of the statement) no one has ever attempted to deny that in many places and in a variety of ways it is clearly stated as a fact in the New Testament that "All men shall rise again with 'their bodies,'" and therefore I believe in the "Resurrection of the Body."

Nor are we left without any analogy in nature to inform us of the likelihood of such a Resurrection. We have the example of the corn of wheat, the grain, the seed, which Jesus Christ and His Apostle St. Paul both instanced when teaching on this subject. Bear in mind, it is most important that this instance of the corn of wheat or other seed must not be urged and pressed as a logical argument. It could never have been introduced as such by our Lord or by His Apostle, because there is no clear and proved similarity of the body to a seed, and no logical argument can be founded nor conclusion arrived at unless identity of nature be first undoubtedly established. But, as a striking analogy, as an instance in Nature where a resurrection and revival of a seemingly dead thing occurs, often and known of all men, in this way it is most valuable and suggestive. At least it bids us remember this: that the seed is not dead for all it looks so dry and withered, and therefore by analogy the life of man likewise may not be extinct for all its outward husk and covering, the body, be cold and decaying. The body of the seed which is sown actually dies and decays, and becomes decomposed, but the tender germ lives, and in due time springs up with quite a different and a far more glorious body than it had before, with shoots and leaves, and buds, and flowers and fruit, instead of the ugly husk which once enclosed it. So that if any man objects against the possibility of the Resurrection of the dead whom we have laid in the grave, we can point to an undeniable fact which falls under daily observation, and say, "Thou fool! that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die; and that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body which shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain; but God giveth it a body as it hath pleased Him, and to every seed his own body."

In the third place, let us take a rapid glance at the effect which is, or ought to be, produced upon us now by this our faith. It is a source of amazing consolation to those who receive it. The doctrine of an immortality as vague and shadowy phantoms, which the Greeks and Romans imagined, is utterly unsatisfying. The in some respects beautiful teaching of Buddha, that all the souls of men are sparks from the Divine Soul, and shall be at last again absorbed into Deity, is dull and saddening, because it deprives us of our own personal identity. The Christian doctrine is that God created man to be immortal, that He made him, body and soul, to be an image of His own eternity.

When man fell, and the image of God was defaced in him, and the likeness of God obscured, the sentence pronounced upon him at once implied that, whatever may have been the case among the brute creation, death was not man's original portion: life was the inheritance to which he was heir; in wrath at sin, God, his Almighty Father, cut him off with death, and yet in mercy did God purpose to restore to man through Christ his birthright—life.

In that sentence, "Till thou return unto the ground: for out of it wast thou taken, for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return," it is contained that even man's body was not originally formed to be dissolved. Death would have been no sentence of punishment, had it been already man's destined fate. And this impression becomes conviction when we read of Enoch that "God took him," that he "was translated, that he should not see death, and was not found, because God had translated him," and of Elijah that "he went up by a whirlwind into heaven."

We believe that the immortality of the body which was lost to humanity by Adam is restored to humanity by Christ.

We ought, then, to derive unfailing comfort from the contemplation of the splendid vision which the Resurrection of the Body opens out to us. Comfort, when we think of the glad greetings, and the knitting up of severed friendships, never more to be parted. Comfort, when we think of the wonderful development of beauty and power, and capacity for knowledge and enjoyment, which shall be ours when this body of our humiliation is made like to the glorious Body of Christ for all eternity.

There is a thought of warning, too, no doubt, which we must not forget: the thought that to some this gift of life will not be a boon, that some of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall wake to shame and everlasting contempt. You know who those are. I will not dwell upon that dark side now; I turn to the brighter prospect, and I say to you who are members of Christ's Church, to you who have been grafted into Christ's Body, to you who maintain your union with Him through His appointed means of grace, to you, I say, in the magnificent words of St. Paul:—"Behold, I shew you a mystery: we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump. For the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in Victory! O Death, where is thy sting? O Grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law; but thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.

"Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord."

MAGGIE'S WATCH.

A STORY FOR CHILDREN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "ANYHOW STORIES," ETC.

CHAPTER III.

JANET was delighted with her new home, with the balconies, the flowers, with everything. She was quite astonished at the mountains.

"It must be such a long way to the top of them," she said; "and oh, Maggie, I hope they won't fall!"

"Why, of course they won't!" Maggie answered. "You are not used to mountains yet," she added. Then Janet looked at the lake. It was so blue that she thought it must be made of the sky turned upside down, and so clear that she felt quite sorry for the fishes.

"They must be so easily caught," she said to Maggie, "for the fishermen have only just got to pull them out;" at which Maggie laughed with all the importance of a person who had seen much of foreign parts, and is the possessor of a watch and chain.

"You silly little darling!" she said grandly; "they can soon swim away. You shall have a fishing-rod; we'll save up and buy one. Oh, but there's your watch, so we can't!" she added, with a sigh.

"Don't be unhappy about that," Janet answered. "I don't mind not having one, for you know you can always tell me the time."

After dinner nurse had to unpack, and mother rested on the sofa while the children went on the balcony and talked in whispers, for fear of disturbing her. Sometimes they couldn't help laughing out, and it did the mother good to hear them. "Dear children!" she thought, "it is a comfort that they are happy together." Then Maggie looked in, and saw that mother was awake.

"Mother dear," she said, "we want to ask you a great favour. May we go to Clarens? You said we should be able to go for our music lessons alone, and I do so want to show Janet where it is; and on the way we can look in at the Bazaar, and see all the little things carved in wood."

Mother remembered that Clarens was only ten minutes off, and quite a safe road, and that she had often seen children as young as hers going along it alone. So she said "Yes"; and the children were delighted, for they thought it very grand to go out by themselves.

"Perhaps we might spend our threepence, for it is Saturday——" But then Maggie remembered Janet's watch again, and was silent.

The mother listened to their merry voices as they went laughing and chattering down the white stone staircase. "Dear little things!" she said to herself, and then dropped off to sleep.

For just half an hour the mother slept, and then she was awakened by the sound of hurrying steps coming up the stairs, and the loudest weeping and bitterest cries that ever you heard, dear children. There were some words that tried to shape themselves in the noise, but they were so confused it was impossible to understand them. The mother flew to her feet and opened the door, her heart beating wildly.

"Oh, my darlings!" she cried, in fear and dismay, "what have you done? what is the matter?" and as she spoke she felt convinced that they had broken all their legs and several of their arms. But there were the children coming up-stairs, safe and sound, though weeping bitterly. As they drew near, the loud and miserable sounds grew into words.

"Oh, mother, mother! I have lost my watch and chain!" Maggie cried, throwing herself into mother's arms; and Janet, weeping just as sorely, echoed—

"She has lost her watch and chain!"

"My dears!" exclaimed mother, in dismay; and looking at Maggie, she saw that the watch-pocket was empty, and that no watch-chain was fastened in the button-hole made for it in her dress.

"I have lost it, I have lost it!" cried Maggie. "Oh, I am so miserable! I have lost my watch and chain."

"Oh! what shall we do?" sobbed Janet; "she has lost her watch and chain!"

"But tell me where you have been," said the bewildered mother.

"We went to Clarens, and it rained for a minute as we came back, and we ran, and we stood up for a minute till it left off, and we ran again, and when I looked it had gone, and we went all the way back, and looked, and looked——"

"Yes, mother, we looked everywhere," sobbed Janet.

"But it was gone, it was quite gone," cried Maggie, weeping afresh.

"Yes, mother, quite gone," echoed poor little Janet.

"But we will go and look for it at once," the mother exclaimed; "we will, dear children, and we'll find it;" and seizing her hat, and scarcely thinking of cape or gloves, she flew down-stairs out into the street. "We'll find it, dears, we'll find it!" she cried out again, looking back at the children, who ran after her hand in hand, still bitterly lamenting.

On they went, mother and Maggie and Janet, along the upper road to Clarens. They looked at every inch of ground they passed over, under the hedge, by the side of the wall, everywhere, but there was no watch and chain. They asked everyone they met, but no one had heard of it. They went into the two or three shops they passed, but the shopkeepers shook their heads—they knew nothing of it. Nowhere was there any sign of it, and mother too began to despair. Maggie's sobs grew loud again; the tears ran faster and faster down her pretty pink cheeks, and in order to cry louder and more easily, she opened her mouth very wide, and showed all her little white teeth.

"I have lost my watch and chain!" was still her burden. Close beside her walked Janet, with all her brown curls pushed back and very untidy, the dimple in her chin hardly showing at all as she sobbed out her dismal second—

"She has lost her watch and chain!" Then poor Maggie broke out bitterly—

"Oh, if this day were only a dream! why are nasty things never dreams? oh, if this were only a dream!" But it was no dream, and only too true. No one had heard of it, or picked it up, or knew anything about it. And after they had gone long past the spot at which Maggie had had it last, they gave it up, and turned round to go back to Montreux, a sad little party of three; for though mother did not cry, she was nearly as miserable as her little girls.

"We'll offer a reward and speak to the police," she said; "perhaps that will bring it back."

"And if it doesn't, Maggie darling, I'll save up all my money, if it's years and years, to buy you another," said Janet, putting her arm round her sister's waist.

"Oh no, you can't, Janet," answered Maggie, too miserable even to be grateful; "besides, I could never love any watch as I loved that watch; I never could! Oh, I have lost my watch and chain!" she cried once more; and almost before the words had died away there stood before them three dirty little boys with very dark heads cropped close, very brown eyes, very round, grave little faces, and wearing very old clothes. Maggie thought afterwards that she should never forget a single little bit of how they had looked. She could never make out where they had come from; but there they were, the three little boys who seemed to have appeared all in a moment from nowhere. They looked gravely at the mother and the two little girls, as if to be sure that they were not making a mistake; they looked at Maggie's tears and then at each other; then one of them slowly held out his hand, and there was Maggie's watch. It was safe and sound, save for the little ring that had come off, and which would soon be put on again.

Maggie looked at it for one dazed, happy moment, and then she gave a cry of joy—

"Oh!"

And Janet, feeling that it would never do to say more than Maggie, broke into laughter till it seemed as if the tears and smiles and dimples were having a game of hide-and-seek all over her face, and joyfully cried "Oh!" too. Then the second boy came forward with the chain and the ring of the watch, and the third boy stood shyly aloof until his companions beckoned, when he came forward too, and, in French that was rather difficult to understand, explained how they had found it by an old doorway, by which Maggie chain!" And then they all went home, and had jam, and Swiss cakes with sugar on the top, and milk rolls for tea, and were very happy indeed.

It was an odd thing, but Maggie could no more sleep that night than she could the night before, and after trying and trying, and finding she really couldn't, she remembered she and Janet had stood for a minute for shelter when the rain-drops first came down.

"There was Maggie's watch."—p. 132.

Of course mother gave the boys a great many francs, and they ran away very quickly, while the children looked after them with gratitude too great for words. But when they were quite out of sound, and nearly out of sight, Maggie raised a happy shout—

"I have found my watch and chain!" and Janet laughed aloud, and cried out, in just as happy a voice, "She has found her watch and chain!" and mother, as pleased as they, echoed—

"Yes, my darlings, we have found the watch and sat up and called, "Mother!" and in came nurse, and told her to go to sleep.

"I can't," Maggie cried; "and I know mother will come;" and of course mother came, and she threw her arms round mother's neck, and said, "Mother dear, I can't bear Janet not to have a watch. I shall never be happy till she has one."

"She will one day, dear, perhaps when she is as old as you are."

"But I want her to have it now," she cried, pushing back her hair. "Mother, you know my birthday comes in January; do you think if I asked everyone to give me a present in money instead of anything else, and if she did the same on her birthday, and we both saved up all our pocket-money, do you think Janet could have a watch in the spring!"

"I am not quite sure, Dickie-bird."

"I wish you wouldn't give me any pocket-money at all till Janet has a watch. Oh, mother! I do so want her to have one!" Then mother stooped and kissed the flushed little cheeks.

"Go to sleep, darling," she said. "I think Janet will have a watch in the spring."

"Really, mother?"

"Yes, really, darling."

Maggie gave a long sigh.

"Let me go and tell her," she whispered, and getting out of bed, she stole on the tips of her little bare toes to Janet's tiny room. Janet was half-asleep, but she opened her eyes wide when she saw Maggie in her white nightgown, and was going to sit up, but Maggie pushed her back. "Janet," she said gently, in a voice full of solemn happiness, "Janet, lie still, darling; mother says you shall have a watch too in the spring. Yes, really; and I am so glad! Why, you were just as miserable as I was when I lost mine, and I think you cried even louder." Then the two little sisters put their arms round each other's necks and kissed; and Maggie went softly back to bed and to sleep, happy and satisfied.

BIBLE TRADES, AND THE LESSONS THEY TEACH.

CARPENTERING.

BY THE REV. J. HILES HITCHENS, D.D., AUTHOR OF "ECCE VERITAS," ETC.

PERHAPS the earliest allusion to the trade of a carpenter is that found in the books of Samuel and Chronicles, where we are informed that Hiram, King of Tyre, sent carpenters with cedar-wood to David in order to build David a house. Nearly a century later we find Jehoshaphat repairing the Temple, and the money which the people had voluntarily dropped into the offertory box beside the altar was employed, we are told, in paying "the carpenters and builders who wrought upon the House of the Lord."

Though the trade is not definitely mentioned in Scripture prior to the time thus referred to, yet it is clear that carpentering work had been effected centuries before.

Noah could not have constructed the Ark of gopher wood, and made it so correct as to dimensions; he could not have joined the pieces together; he could not have formed a window and door such as would open and close, without some knowledge of carpentering and some acquaintance with the tools of a carpenter. Moreover, the tools must have been in existence and in use prior to his time, which, of course, suggests that carpentering must have been practised in the patriarchal times.

Amid all the changes which occur in the history of varied handicrafts, it is interesting to find that the same trade implements as are used to-day were in full use in the childhood of the world. The carpenter about to begin work selects a piece of timber which he calls a plank, or a slightly thinner piece which he terms a board. Such are the phrases used concerning the Tabernacle and the Temple. God said: "Thou shalt make boards for the Tabernacle of shittim wood. Ten cubits shall be the length of a board, and a cubit and a half shall be the breadth of one board." Then in the first book of Kings we find Solomon built the walls of the Temple with "boards of cedar," and covered the floor with "planks of fir."

In order to shape the plank or board, the carpenter uses a saw; and such a tool was known to and employed by the workers in the early times, for we read of the "hewed stones" being "sawed with saws" for the foundations of Solomon's Temple.

To fashion the wood according to the needed purpose, the carpenter must have at hand his rule, his line, his plane and his compass. And so Isaiah the prophet says: "The carpenter stretcheth out his rule; he marketh it out with a line; he fitteth it with planes, and he marketh it out with a compass."

Very often the carpenter has to join various pieces of wood by what he terms a mortise and tenon; that is to say, the mortise is a hollow place or socket in one piece of timber, into which the tenon or projecting piece, cut to exact measurement in the other piece, is intended to fit. But those are God-used terms. The Almighty, in giving the Israelites full directions for the construction of the Tabernacle, said: "Two tenons shall there be in one board, set in order one against another; thus thou shalt make for all the boards of the Tabernacle. And thou shalt make forty sockets of silver under the twenty boards, two sockets under one board for his two tenons, and two sockets under another board for his two tenons."

Amongst other tools we may reasonably expect to find the hammer and nails. They are indispensable. And they were very well-known articles in the early ages. Possibly, as now, they were then kept by most householders for sundry little domestic arrangements. A hammer and a nail were near at hand for Jael the wife of Heber, for after the woman had enticed Sisera into her house, and he had fallen asleep, she seized a hammer and drove a nail into his temples, thus accomplishing his death. But we cannot think of hammer and nails without remembering the shameful misuse to which they were put when the Saviour of the world was nailed to the cross of Calvary.

But the trade of a carpenter has been specially honoured by the fact that the reputed father of Jesus was a carpenter, and that Jesus Himself spent His youth, up till the age of thirty, in following the same calling. For eighteen years of Christ's life we have no record except what is implied in the query propounded by some who heard Him preach—"Is not this the carpenter?" The people of the neighbourhood wherein Jesus had been brought up knew the nature of His business. They knew that He had toiled as a mechanic, earning His livelihood by honest, useful industry. To us it should be a matter of thankfulness that Christ was a carpenter. He has thereby taught us many things. He has proved His voluntary humility. He has shown us the dignity of labour. He has taught us that manhood is not to be estimated by certain adventitious circumstances; that it is not the house in which a man lives, nor the clothes he wears, nor the work he does, that makes or mars the man; but that the man is what his soul is—what his thoughts, affections, motives, and principles are. And He has shown us, further, that whilst a man toils with his hands in fashioning ploughs, making yokes for oxen, or in other ways, he can at the same time be cultivating his head and heart, and thus be daily fitting himself for a position of usefulness on earth and honour in heaven.

As I stand by and watch a carpenter at his work, I am constrained to think that he does physically what I am asked to do morally and spiritually. There is a lofty sense in which we are, or ought to be, all engaged in carpentering.

The carpenter is given wood, out of which material he has to fashion some new thing, in the construction of which his mental and physical powers must be brought into exercise. So God has given each of us time. Plank after plank, or hour after hour, He places at our disposal. He has given us mercies innumerable that we each, in the workshop of the world, may construct a character that shall be new, and beautiful, and enduring. As the carpenter needs application, care, thoughtfulness, patience, and perseverance in his work in order to be at all successful, so do we. It will not do for us to employ our moments and our mercies anyhow. We must exercise forethought and caution. It is vain for us to imagine that the task can be completed by one or two strokes. We must persevere to the end. Our day's work will not be done till the eventide of life. We must use the saw to cut off those habits which are injurious to both us and others. We must apply the plane to smooth down some of the unevennesses of our tempers, some of the crudeness and roughness of our dispositions. We must work with the rule and square in hand, that what is done by us may be in perfect accordance with the pattern set us in the Scriptures. We must form a tenon and mortise—a union between ourselves and that and those who are good; the tenon of our sympathy and benevolence must fit into the mortise of a brother's love, and the mortise of our own affections must correspond to the tenon of our friend's advances. There must be reciprocity of Christian affection. All our good resolutions, good actions, and godly efforts must be made secure by the nail of prayer, driven home by the hammer of a vigorous faith. Thus must we perform our life-task for the Divine Taskmaster.

It is true the carpenter finds recompense in his work, but he also receives wages for his work. There is the development of muscle in his arm, colour in his cheek, strength in his limbs, and general health throughout his organism. He can eat well, sleep well, as the result of his daily labour; and he is much happier when at his regular employment than when out of work and idle. So shall we find in the task to which we are called of God. He who conscientiously strives day by day to do something for God and his fellow-man, experiences untold satisfaction and delight. Aiming to construct a good character, and wield a holy influence, he realises unutterable joy, and carries the recompense within him. Still, as the carpenter looks on to Saturday night, when his definite wage shall be paid him, so we can look to the hour when the Infinite Employer shall summon all His servants and render unto every one of them according to his work. We have before us an eternal reward for well-doing.

"Thy Will be Done."

Words by CHARLOTTE ELLIOTT.
Smoothly.

Music by A. H. MANN, Mus.D., Oxon.
(Organist of King's College, Cambridge.)

The musical score is written for voice and piano. It consists of three systems of music. The first system begins with a treble and bass clef, a key signature of two sharps (F# and C#), and a 3/4 time signature. The melody starts on a half note G4, followed by a quarter note A4, and then a half note B4. The lyrics 'I. My God, my Fa - ther, while I stray, Far' are written below the notes. The second system continues the melody with a half note C5, a quarter note D5, and a half note E5. The lyrics 'from my home, on life's rough way, Oh, teach me' are written below. The third system concludes with a half note F#5, a quarter note G#5, and a half note A5. The lyrics 'from my heart to say, Thy will be..... done!' are written below. Dynamics include p (piano) at the beginning and ff (fortissimo) before the final phrase.

2.

If Thou shouldst call me to resign
What most I prize—it ne'er was mine;
I only yield Thee what was Thine:
Thy will be done!

3.

E'en if again I ne'er should see
The friend more dear than life to me,
Ere long we both shall be with Thee:
Thy will be done!

4.

Should pining sickness waste away
My life, in premature decay,
My Father, still I'll strive to say,
Thy will be done!

5.

If but my fainting heart be blest
With Thy sweet Spirit for its Guest,
My God, to Thee I leave the rest:
Thy will be done!

6.

Renew my will from day to day;
Blend it with Thine, and take away
All that now makes it hard to say,
Thy will be done!

7.

Then, when on earth I breathe no more
The prayer, oft mixed with tears before,
I'll sing upon a happier shore,
Thy will be done!

THE MESSAGE OF JEREMIAH THE PROPHET.

BY THE REV. R. E. JOHNSTON, B.A.

LOOK first at the days in which he lived. They were full of stirring incident in Judah. The happy memory of good King Hezekiah was fading already among the dim shades of the past. Three-quarters of a century had elapsed since his death, and during the greater part of that time, throughout the fifty-five years of Manasseh, and the two years of Anon, the land was defiled with idolatry and cruel vice. It is a dark background for the days that follow; there is an opportunity at least for the young lad who is called to succeed to the splendour and the wretchedness of the Jewish throne. He is only eight years old, but trusty councillors are at his side. His mother first, of whom we know nothing but her name, the type of many a noble woman since her time, eager to gain fame only in her child's integrity and wisdom. With her, Hilkiah, the high priest, wielding a power, diminished indeed by the lack of exercise—for the priestly order might have prevented some at least of the wickedness of the time—but still second only to that of the king. Shaphan, too, responsible, together with his fellow-scribes, for the maintenance of the ancient Scriptures and traditions, an honest man, but the successor of many negligent guardians, whose indolence or crime had allowed the sacred roll of the Law to fall from their grasp, so that they did not even know where the scroll lay hid. Besides these, the court of young Josiah could produce some upright, godly men, no doubt, but not very many; such men formed a very small minority.

For the most part, the state of the people at the beginning of Josiah's reign was this—nominally and outwardly they worshipped God, but it was worship of the lip only. The Temple was still standing, but its beauty was tarnished, the golden lacquer-work had been stripped from pillar and door, the splendid cups, the basins, and the other vessels of gold and silver, together with the money that should have been in the sacred treasury, had long ago taken the weary journey to Assyria, and for their absence it was but a poor compensation that gaudy images connected with the worship of the sun should stand in the courtyard of the Temple.

The brazen chariot, with its horses, emblems of the monarch of day, who traverses the sky from east to west in a golden blaze, were by no means the only evidence that the streets of Jerusalem presented of the prevalence of idolatrous worship. In the very court of the Temple was an idol image, or perhaps a cluster of idols—"a grove," as our Bible calls it—shrouded doubtless in the gloom and darkness in which the degrading rites of the heathen gods loved to find their home. On the roofs of many houses, and on every rising ground in the neighbourhood, were still to be seen the altars on which sacrifice to the sun-god was offered, and the hideous emblems of many deities found a resting-place in the houses of Jews, who still claimed with pride the title of "the people of God." For a parallel to this iniquity you might look at that shameful scene enacted in Paris, when an unhappy woman, "the goddess of reason," sat enthroned by the mad spirits of the Revolution on the very altar of Notre Dame, receiving homage from the licentious crowd. Just as profane and foul were some of the religious practices of the Jews in the chosen city Jerusalem.

In the midst of such corruption now a great upheaval declares itself. Josiah, enthusiastic and pious, commands a prompt reformation. Offerings flow in, the Temple is restored, heathen emblems are utterly destroyed, and while the work proceeds a greater thing is achieved—the scroll of the Law of Moses is discovered hid in the house of the Lord. The king, deeply impressed, gathering round him all the dignity and learning of the city, together with the humbler sort, stands by a pillar of the Temple to read aloud such searching words. The effect is instantaneous. Terribly affrighted, the people in very truth do begin to think of a better life and a holier worship; their steps are turned homewards with a new consciousness, a new desire oppressing their souls—the consciousness of sin committed, the desire to leave the guilty path.

But even as the crowd disperses, another voice arrests their footsteps. There is a young man standing by one of the Temple gates, a man upon whom the weight of sorrow and the keen sense of mental pain have left already their indelible impress. During five years the people of Judah had begun to grow accustomed to the plain-spoken denunciations that fell from his lips; they were familiar with his message, but familiarity produced no respect; a deaf ear had been turned to his warning; his claim to be a messenger from God had aroused no feeling but contempt and dislike. Yet the prophet was persistent in his work. Ever present in his imagination was the memory of the two mysterious visions that came to him when first the Lord touched his lips. Still, in fancy, he could see the rod of an almond-tree bursting forth into bud and blossom long before the other trees had awoken from their winter sleep: a sign that God's anger was now aroused, and very soon would take effect. And closely connected with that vision, the memory of another—a great seething-pot turned on its side, with its face from the north towards Jerusalem, telling the prophet that soon the turmoil of war, which was raging then in Mesopotamia, between the armies of Babylon, Nineveh, Elam, and Media, should be ended, and the fury of the conquering Chaldeans should be poured forth over Judæa.

Fired with such memories, filled with ardent longings for the repentance of his countrymen, the young man had spoken sternly from time to time to his fellow-tribesmen in Benjamin and at Jerusalem. In those early days of his mission, there is, indeed, a note of hopefulness mingled sometimes with the voice of threatening.* But from the days of Josiah's reformation the hopefulness disappears. Even while the people are streaming forth from the Temple the prophet is there to proclaim the judgment of God.† They had heard by the voice of the king what punishments were promised in the days of Moses to those who should steal and murder, and commit adultery, and swear falsely, and worship false gods; and even now, while they professed to turn to the Lord, they were filled with a lying spirit, claiming the privileges of their race, professing repentance without honest purpose of reform. So, henceforth, there is nothing to be done but to warn them of the trouble that is near at hand. Far off in the distance of time there may be hope of restoration ‡ if the people repent; indeed, the name of the prophet is itself a promise, else why should he be called "Jeremiah" ("the Lord exalts") if God did not mean the name to carry a ray of hope through the clouds of terror and destruction? But until seventy years shall be accomplished § there is no hope of deliverance; for the lifetime of the prophet there is only the vain endeavour to persuade the people to accept their fate with as little of suffering as possible.

It was not an easy task that was laid upon the prophet. Often we find him plunged in grief and distress at the wilfulness of the Jews, and they, in return for his words, tried frequently to take his life or do him injury. Thus, in the later years of Josiah, the men of Anathoth, the birthplace of Jeremiah, sought his life; and about the same period Pashur, the chief of one of the "courses" of priests, enraged by the prophet's boldness in preaching in the court of the Temple, caused him to be scourged, and afterwards put in the stocks.

Josiah's reign continued thirteen years after his great reformation. The good king did what he could; but it is not the decree of a king that can turn a nation to righteousness, and Judah was treading still the downward path. Next came the reign of Jehoahaz, son of Josiah; but it lasted no longer than three months, and he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord. So the King of Egypt, Pharaoh-nechoh by name, whose forces had defeated and slain Josiah, carried his successor captive to Riblah, set up one of his brothers to be king, and changed his name from Eliakim to Jehoiakim, at the same time extorting tribute from the troubled nation. During the eleven years of the reign of Jehoiakim, the balance of power among the great nations of the East shifted. Egypt was in its turn checked by Babylon, whose king, Nebuchadnezzar, destined to spend seven years of his life in a strange fit of madness, according to the warning of Daniel the prophet, held Judah for a time in bondage. The tribute was paid to Nebuchadnezzar for only three years, and then another rebellion freed the Jews for a moment. But retribution was at hand. Under the next king, Jehoiachin, the Chaldean army again besieged Jerusalem, and eventually carried off as prisoners to Babylon the king and his household, together with seven thousand of the best of the people.

In the absence of most of the royal family, the King of Babylon appointed an uncle of Jehoiachin ruler of Judæa, and gave him the name of Zedekiah. The course of events was the same as before. Zedekiah reigned as tributary king for nine years, and then raised another rebellion against Nebuchadnezzar. The disturbance was promptly suppressed, and the remaining inhabitants of Jerusalem who were of any importance were transported, first to Riblah, far away at the foot of Mount Libanus, and then to Babylon. For the government of those who were left, Gedaliah, the grandson of Shaphan the scribe, was made responsible; but very soon he also fell, assassinated by some of the turbulent nobles of his court. Thereupon, the whole body of the little remnant of Jews, frightened at the probable consequences of the murder, fled to Egypt for protection, and Jerusalem was left utterly desolate. Such is the history of the last forty years of the kingdom of Judah. It begins with the warning of approaching calamity, it ends with the fulfilment of the prediction; the ruin of Jerusalem is complete, the Jews are scattered abroad in the Eastern world.

Meanwhile, what was happening to Jeremiah? Throughout that era of devastation he never ceased the proclamation of his message. The successive disasters were foretold in his scathing language, and from time to time the bitterness of the people against him knew no bounds. At short intervals he was denounced as a traitor, he was imprisoned, his life was demanded by the people, and only saved through the cowardice of the king, or the friendship of a few powerful supporters; and finally we see him carried away into Egypt at the last emigration, so that the latest prophecy from his lips is dated from the Egyptian town Tahpanhes!¶ After this we know nothing more of him. Tradition says that he was stoned to death by the Jews in Egypt, but whether the story is true or false we cannot tell.

Now, as to the writings of Jeremiah. There is this which distinguishes them from similar books—they are intensely personal. Other prophets, for the most part, deliver their message without telling us

* To this period we may probably refer the prophecies of chapters i. to v'.

† See chapters vii. to x. There is a division of opinion among commentators as to whether this discourse was delivered at this particular time. Some authorities place it in the latter part of Josiah's reign, others at the beginning of Jehoiakim's.

¶ Jeremiah xliiii. 8.

very much about themselves or their own history. Jeremiah is different; his own life is his message in a dramatic form. At the beginning of his career, he was forbidden by God to marry any wife, because the next generation of his people were to be the inheritors of the curse,* and from that time very much of his own experience is gradually unfolded in the pages of his book. It was full of tears and woe, a living testimony to the truth and the bitterness of his warnings. Of all the people, Baruch, the faithful scribe, is his only constant friend.

Moreover, Jeremiah is singular among the prophets in the peculiarly free and forcible use that he is led to make of the incidents of daily life. Is he to testify to the coming degradation of the Jews? He must do it by means of a lengthy journey to the river Euphrates, where he hides a new linen girdle in a hole in the rock, leaving it there until its beauty and strength are marred and ruined.† Does the message of the moment teach the sovereign power of God? He declares it in front of the potter's workshop on the outskirts of the city, pointing as an illustration to the power of the potter in shaping the clay according to his will.‡ Or is it a message of mercy that he bears? He delivers it as he received it, under the image of a basket of figs, some of them very bad, but some also good and fit to be used in the husbandman's service.* So throughout his ministry the prophet was taught to use the incidents of daily life to convey and enforce his Master's message.

From the beginning to the end of that ministry his life is full of lessons for us. His work was dangerous and arduous, but in the strength of God he stood firm like a brazen wall; his message was never popular, and his person was hateful to the Jews; yet so long as work remained to be done he was enabled to do it. Strange and terrible warnings were sent through him to the people, but even in delivering them he showed us how the small events of life all have their message from God for us. In fact, Jeremiah stands forth at the close of the period of God's long-suffering with His people, the solitary instance of a true and noble heart wholly consecrated to the service of God, terribly troubled but wonderfully comforted and sustained, accomplishing at length the work set before him to do, leaving the word entrusted to him, a memorial of his life for ever, while he himself passes away into the silence.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SPECIAL LESSON FOR EASTER DAY.

To read—St. John ix. 1—18.

AN EMPTY TOMB. (1—10.) All Christians thinking to-day of Christ's Resurrection. Had been dead three days—part of day counted as if whole day—therefore Friday evening, Saturday, Sunday morning called three days. What had been going on during those days?

(a) Joseph and Nicodemus from Galilee had embalmed Christ's body. (xx. 38, 39.)

(b) Pilate, the judge, had sealed the tomb, and set soldiers to watch. (St. Matt. xxvii. 65.)

(c) The disciples, in fear, keep away.

Now on the third day all is changed.

(a) An angel descends from heaven and rolls away the stone.

(b) Christ rises from the dead and remains near the garden.

(c) Mary Magdalene comes very early to the tomb.

(d) She finds the tomb empty—runs to tell the disciples.

(e) Peter and John run to the sepulchre—find it empty, and depart.

What may we learn from all these?

1. No work unworthy of God's angels or messengers. Some might think rolling heavy stone a menial work.

2. Our bodies will rise again. Christ is First-fruits of Resurrection. (1 Cor. xv. 20.)

3. The benefit of early rising—Mary Magdalene the first to meet Christ.

4. Wait patiently. The disciples, leaving hurriedly, did not see Christ.

II. A WEeping WOMAN. (11—18.) Mary remains at the grave.

(a) She weeps. Christ, her Friend, is gone. Where is He?

(b) She acts. Looks into the tomb. Lo! two angels in white.

(c) She listens. A question asked her—twice—by the angels, and by Jesus, as yet unrecognised.

Then she hears a voice—well known and loved.

(d) She sees. Christ, her Lord and Master—it is He indeed.

(e) She worships. Is told not to hold (or detain) Christ. He will not ascend just yet. She must tell the disciples the news.

(f) She obeys. What a joyful message this time! Notice the character of Mary Magdalene—

1. Faithful—when disciples could not believe.

2. Loving—last at the Cross, first at the grave.

3. Brave—not afraid to keep watch at the tomb alone.

4. Obedient—at once does what is told.

Was the first to receive a special blessing from the risen Lord.

What does Christ's Resurrection teach us?

1. There is a power greater than death.
2. That same power raises those dead in sin. (Eph. ii. 1.)
3. In Christ shall all be made alive. (1 Cor. xv. 22.)
4. Risen with Christ—seek those things which are above. (Col. iii. 1.)

NO. 20. EZRA'S MISSION.

To read—Ezra vii.

I. EZRA'S OFFICE. (1—10.) Nearly sixty years since dedication of Temple. Story of Esther comes in during interval. Now new king of Persia—viz., Artaxerxes, son of Ahasuerus (Esther's husband), and grandson of Darius. A new leader of Jews comes to notice—Ezra. Who is he?

(a) A priest—because of Aaron's family (verses 5, 11).

(b) A scribe—reader, writer, teacher of God's law. But mere office of little worth. What is his character?

(a) A ready scribe—i.e., careful, diligent, earnest in his business.

(b) A godly man—sought to know God (verse 10) and to teach others.

Thus was diligent in his business, and stood before kings. (Prov. xxii. 29.)

Well qualified to lead God's party of pilgrim-Jews to Jerusalem.

LESSON. The Lord ordereth a good man's goings.

II. EZRA'S COMMISSION. (11—22.) Artaxerxes, the great king of Persia, commissions Ezra to head the return of the Jews to their own land.

Notice the form of the letter—so different from ours ("at such a time" means etc.)

(a) The persons. All who are willing—priests, Levites, people. Yet some preferred to stay in the strange land—had made it home!

(b) The gifts. Offerings from the king and his Ministers—from priests and people who stay behind; have some love for their old country! Also king commands treasurers on other side of river Euphrates to give 100 talents of silver (about £40,000), 100 baths (600 gallons) of wine and oil, and salt without measure. What a noble present!

(c) The object. To buy animals for sacrifice, vessels for the Temple, and other things needed for God's house.

III. THE KING'S COMMAND. (23—28.) Artaxerxes not only gives what things are wanted, but lays down rules for Ezra's guidance.

1. God's work to be done diligently. Recognises himself as God's instrument.

2. Priests, etc., not to pay taxes. They are God's ministers. (1 Cor. ix. 13.)

3. Magistrates to be appointed—to carry out God's laws. (Rom. xiii. 1—3.)

4. Offenders to be punished—by fine, imprisonment, or death.

See what all this teaches about the king—

(a) His fear of God—puts His will first.

(b) His liberality—in these costly gifts.

(c) His justice—in providing good laws.

No wonder Ezra praises God for putting all this into the king's heart.

LESSON. Fear God, honour the king.

NO. 21. EZRA'S JOURNEY.

To read—Ezra viii.

I. THE START. (15—20.) Journey begun on New Year's Day (vii. 9); took four months exactly. Starting from west of river Tigris, would pass through Mesopotamia, cross river Euphrates (following much the same route as Abraham), travel south-west to Palestine. First halting-place at river Abaya. Ezra makes review of the people.

Who are present? Priests and people—such as wish to go.

Who are absent? Levites to carry the Ark, prepare sacrifices, etc.; Nethinims, to hew wood, etc. (Josh. ix. 27)—i.e., the ministers and servants of the Temple are wanting. Ezra not disheartened—sends special messengers, who soon return with 38 Levites and 920 Nethinims. So now all ready.

II. THE HALT. (21—30.) Journey delayed short time. Why?

(a) Faith and humble themselves. Had not as yet sought God's help.

(b) Prayer—for God's guidance and protection for themselves and the treasure they were carrying.

(c) Precautions. Priests and princes carefully chosen to guard the treasure. Money weighed out and counted accurately. Put under their charge. Why given to the priests to guard?

Because they are holy—i.e., set apart for God's service. So is the money also set apart. Therefore they the right persons to keep it.

LESSONS. 1. Begin well. Their journey prospered after they had sought God's help.

2. Care in accounts—especially with money given for religious objects.

III. THE END. (31—36.) Journey delayed twelve days by the halt—now begun in earnest under God's guidance and help. Remind of similar ones—

Abraham sent by God to seek a new home.

Jacob going to Padan-Aram—vision of angels.

Israelites starting for Palestine—pillar of cloud and fire.

After four months arrive at Jerusalem—three days' rest—then began their real business. What do they do?

(a) Hold religious service. Offer bullocks, sheep, goats, etc.

(b) Store the money safely in the treasury in God's house.

(c) Further the people, i.e., stir them up to the work.

LESSON. The Lord shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in.

NO. 22. EZRA'S TROUBLES.

To read—Ezra ix.

I. THE SIN. (1—4.) Remind of party who returned from Babylon. No women mentioned, except singing women. (ii. 65.) Like emigrants now—mostly young unmarried men. So a difficulty arose about wives for them. They forgot God's strict rules in

"In the high-backed, old-fashioned pew

"GRANDMAMMA."—P. 412.

times past (Deut. vii. 3), and married wives from heathen around. Notice—

(a) The princes came and told Ezra. Right to report wrong-doing. (Gen. xxxvii. 2.)

(b) Priests and Levites the chief offenders. Bad example soon followed.

(c) Ezra much troubled. Righteous mourn for others' sins. What did he do?

Rent his garment, as Reuben did when he found Joseph gone. (Gen. xxxvii. 29.)

Plucked off his hair, as Job did in his trouble. (Job. i. 20.)

Effect was that all who feared God joined him.

LESSON. Evil communications corrupt good manners.

II. THE PRAYER. (5—15.) Notice these points—

(a) The time. At evening sacrifice—appointed time for prayer. Thus Elijah at Mount Carmel (1 Kings xviii. 36); Daniel in Babylon (Dan. ix. 21); Christ on the Cross. (St. Matt. xxvii. 45, 50.)

(b) The manner. Rent garment sign of grief. Fell on knees in humiliation. (Ps. xcv. 6.) Spread out hands, as Moses did before Pharaoh. (Ex. ix. 29.)

(c) The prayer contains acknowledgment of—

1. Their sin—includes himself with people—sins have been great—trespass against God's law constant.

2. God's justice—in punishing all—kings, priests, people.

3. God's mercy—in letting a remnant escape—giving a nail (i.e., safe abode) once more in His house—touching hearts of kings of Persia—permitting to build up Jerusalem.

4. God's commands—not to mix with the heathen around.

5. God's forbearance—punishing less than they deserve. Therefore they must not presume on God's mercy, and fall into worse wickedness, or will be consumed altogether.

For other examples of similar prayer, remind of David after his sin. (Ps. li.)

Jonah in the whale's belly. (Jonah ii. 2.)

The prodigal son. (St. Luke xv. 21.)

St. Peter after his fall. (St. Matt. xxvi. 75.)

LESSON. I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord, and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin.

NO. 23. EZRA'S REFORMATIONS.

To read—Ezra 2.

I. REFORMATION PROPOSED. (1—5.) Ezra's prayer ended. A great crowd assembled. His example contagious—wonderful sight—all the people weeping much. But weeping not enough—must also be change. True repentance requires three things—

(a) Sorrow for the past. (Ps. li. 1.) They wept.

(b) Confession of faults. (Ps. xxxii. 5.) They acknowledged their transgressions.

(c) Amendment of life. (Ps. cxix. 67.) Determined to put away their wives.

See how determined they are about it—

(a) They make a solemn covenant.

(b) They determine to do it at once.

(c) They encourage Ezra in the matter.

LESSON. Cease to do evil, learn to do well.

II. REFORMATION CARRIED OUT. (6—19.) Ezra's work not nearly finished. He has begun the reformation—stirred the heart of the people—heard their solemn covenant. Still these who assembled only a small part of the people. All the Jews must be told. So they are summoned by a proclamation. Notice several points—

(a) They assembled immediately—showing eagerness.

(b) They disregarded the cold and rain—showing earnestness.

(c) They confessed their fault—showing sincerity.

(d) They asked for investigation—showing good sense.

So certain commissioners appointed to judge each case. Two laymen, two Levites, Ezra, the priest and scribe, and certain chiefs of the elders. All classes represented. The work of putting away the strange wives begun at once. Priests begin—people follow. A trespass offering made as atonement.

What does all this teach?

1. Sin of all kinds hateful to God.

2. Sin must be put away at once.

3. Pardon must be sought.

This as true now as then.

LESSON. There is forgiveness with Thee.

GRANDMAMA.

IN the high-backed old-fashioned pew
She sat, on Sundays long ago,
With her sweet eyes' expressive blue—
Where serious thoughts would often glow—
Intent beneath the wimple's snow.

This was dear grandmamma, when she Was in her teens, and straight and tall,
The Beauty of the family;
Whose cheerful trust had charms for all,
Whatever trouble chanced to fall.

'Twas not alone her faultless face
That made each fond affection start,
For she possessed a fairer grace,
Such as with Time will not depart,
The truer beauty of the heart!

Sweet listener—with her earnest look
Bent on the pastor as he read!
We, too, would prize the Holy Book,
And share with her the Living Bread,
The sunshine on her pathway shed!

J. R. EASTWOOD.

"WANTED, A GOVERNESS."

CHAPTER XVI.

"Faith and unfaith can ne'er be equal powers; Unfaith in aught is want of faith in all."

WE start by the first train in the morning, and go as near to Hamley as we can by rail; that is, to a little sleepy town, scarcely more than a village. And having alighted there, we find, to our great annoyance, that it is impossible to get any conveyance to take us the rest of the way till the afternoon.

"Do you mind waiting here alone?" asks Hilton. "Because, if you don't, I shall walk it. It is only six miles by the fields."

"Oh no, pray don't wait for me."

I answer. "I shall do very well here. I am quite old enough to take care of myself."

"You are quite sure you don't mind?"

"Quite."

"Then I will say good-bye for the present."

I watch him while in sight, and then go out myself, as I feel much too restless to sit in the inn-parlour. I walk about the straggling old streets, attracting a great deal of interest and curiosity on the part of the natives, which makes me very uncomfortable; then wander out into the open country and sit on a stile, until I fancy that my watch must have stopped for an hour, and that it is nearly time to start. But on walking hurriedly back I find that I have two hours to wait; so I borrow a book of the landlady, and after trying in vain to read it, sit and look out of the window and listen to the grating of the countrymen's boots on the sanded floor underneath; and feel as amiable as impatient travellers usually do under such circumstances.

At last the gig is ready, and away we go at a fast trot. The fresh breeze soon blows away my ill-humour, and before we have gone very far, I am on quite friendly terms with the driver, and have heard enough odd stories from him to send Mr. Bloomfield into fits of laughter when I get home.

We have nearly reached our destination, when, on turning a sudden bend in the road, we come upon Hilton calmly seated on a stile.

"I heard you coming as I crossed the fields, so I waited for you," he says, in answer to my exclamation of surprise. Of course we stop and make room for him in the gig, and then he explains that, having been misdirected by some stupid countryman, he had gone miles out of his way. He treats the matter very indifferently, and, as he is not a man to be either laughed at or pitied, I simply express my unbounded contempt for the unknown countryman, and let the subject drop.

There are not more than three houses, properly so-called, in Hamley, so we have no difficulty in finding the one we want. It stands back from the road, and is screened from view by a row of fir-trees, which fact probably induced Mr. Giffard to select it, as it does not appear to be, in any other respect, a desirable residence.

After Hilton has directed the man to put up his gig at the village inn, we enter the garden. I am on the point of asking whether he would not like to see Maggie alone, when it occurs to me, for the first time, that though I perfectly understand his errand, he has no idea that I know anything about it.

The narrow, old-fashioned garden in front of the house is so enclosed with close-cut privet hedges and tall trees that it is a gloomy place even on this bright spring afternoon. The straggling laurels and dwarf box-trees look as if they were seldom warmed by the sun, and even the few purple and yellow crocuses that show themselves in the borders seem to have had a hard struggle for existence, they are so very pale and limp.

As we walk silently over the spongy grass, Hilton is too much absorbed in his own thoughts to have eyes or ears for outward things, so that I, who feel satisfied that all doubts and misunderstandings will at last be cleared away, have a mind at rest, and am the first to see a vision that holds us there in the shade, spellbound, feasting our eyes on its calm, exquisite beauty.

We have come to an opening in the privet hedge, and beyond it stretches a great orchard, all white with blossom, in the midst of which sits the object of our search—Maggie—wholly unconscious of the eyes that are looking at her with such love and admiration.

The whole place seems asleep, except that the trees are waving their topmost branches with a soft rustling sound, and sending down little showers of petals, which fall slowly to the ground like flakes of snow. The sun himself is just out of sight behind those dark trees, but all the air is full of mellow light, and a faint golden haze is creeping over the distant meadows and clothing them with a vague, mysterious beauty, not their own, while here and there some pear-tree, taller and statelier than its fellows, rears its head to be crowned with pale red and gold.

And Maggie—my little Maggie!

She is leaning back in her chair, gazing towards the distant meadows with a tender, dreamy, far-away look which would make me tremble for her but that I remember who is standing by my side.

Suddenly she catches sight of us, starts up with a little cry, and the next instant—

I have not the least doubt that she is clasped in Hilton's arms, but I cannot say for certain, because I am walking away, as fast as I possibly can, in an opposite direction. What an absurd creature I am, to be so excited! I walk twice round the garden at a furious pace before I come to my senses, and remember that I may as well go into the house, since someone may be looking at me from one of the windows.

The house proves far more bright and comfortable than I expected, and by the time I have found out about the postal regulations and written a detailed account of our journey to Mr. Bloomfield, I begin to feel quite at home in it.

Then the lovers come sauntering in from the orchard, blissfully unconscious of the fact that they have kept the tea waiting an hour. And when I feel my little girl's arms about my neck and her warm young cheek against mine, I forget all about it too.

At bed-time Maggie comes into my room, and we sit talking by the fire till I don't know how late.

She tells me about her father; how kind he was to her; how much she loved him, and yet how he vexed her by not allowing her to go and see her uncle. She supposes he had some good reason for it, but it made her very unhappy. Then about this sudden departure from London, and his illness and death, in a strange place amongst strange people; and that, when they told him he must die, he had made her promise that she would not write to her uncle until after his funeral; although he said that there was no one in the world to whom he would sooner trust her.

We sit for a long time in silence, feeling very sober and sorrowful, till our thoughts wander back to Hilton again; and as I see the light and colour stealing back into Maggie's face, I lay my hand caressingly on her soft, bright hair, and there is no need of words between us.

"Now it is all over," I say, at last, "will you not tell me what the misunderstanding was about?"

"Yes! I wish to tell you," she replies quickly, "because you might think that it was through some fault of his: and it was all my fault from beginning to end."

But there is not much explanation to be given, after all. It is only what I knew before—that someone told her a lie about Hilton, and she believed it. But she is so full of penitence for having believed any ill of her idol, that she will not rest till she has told me all the circumstances that led to it.

Her life in the country had been so guarded from all contact with, or knowledge of, evil, that she had formed an almost impossible standard of right, and had no toleration for any departure from it. To her surprise and consternation, she found that the people with whom she came in contact in London looked at things from quite a different point of view.

With many of them it was not thought a sin to read worldly books or discuss worldly topics on the Sunday. A deviation from the truth was not always a lie—it seemed—an act to be regarded with horror and repented of with shame. A profane word did not appear to degrade a man in the eyes of his fellows—unless, indeed, it were spoken in the presence of ladies. And in a hundred other ways she found that her point of view was different from theirs.

It seems that this had not the effect of making her hold herself aloof from others, as if they were inferior to her; it did not blind her to the fact that many of them were excellent people, and honourable too where great matters were concerned. So it simply made her doubt the correctness of her own standard; and though still holding tenaciously to the same strict rule for herself, she hesitated to sit in judgment on others.

That was the first shock.

Another was that her grandfather, whom she had always looked upon as infallible, had taught her things which science had proved to be mistaken. And if he had been mistaken in some things, how was she to depend on the truth of anything he had taught her? Would she have to throw aside the teaching of all those years, and begin again at the very beginning? Even the creed he had brought her up in, which she had accepted with simple faith as the only true one, she heard condemned as false, and its followers spoken of as "under the yoke of the Evil One!" "At first I used to rebel against it," she says, "but gradually the preacher's eloquence, and the fact that all the rest of the congregation believed what he said, told upon me. I felt that I was so miserably small and young to sit there and dare to set up my judgment against that of all the others."

So gradually she had lost faith in her grandfather, and that seemed to strike at the root of everything. She knew her own youth and inexperience, and dared not trust to her own unaided judgment. And having lost the confidence which comes from a calm sense of certainty that one is believing and acting rightly, she was prepared to believe or disbelieve almost anything.

It was not unnatural that, while her mind was in this state, she should have chosen Hilton, who had such a firm belief in himself, and was so looked up to by the members of his family, to guide her out of her difficulties.

But when the first unreasoning faith of childhood is once killed, nothing can ever revive it. And so it happened that when she discovered that he had falsely called himself her cousin, he fell at once from the high place that he had held in her esteem, and it was easy to believe the graver charge against him.

On the night of the party, someone (whom I, of course, know to be Julia) called her away from the rest, told her some dreadful tale about Hilton, and finished by saying that he was not Mr. Bloomfield's son, but a poor boy whom he had adopted out of charity.

"I was indignant, and would not believe a word of it," she says, her cheeks flushing angrily at the recollection. "But I went straight to Hilton and asked him if it was true that he was not my uncle's son. I wanted to hear him say that it was not true, and of course I dared not speak of that other tale I had heard. I scarcely dared to think of it!"

"What did he say?" I ask.

"He looked annoyed, and asked who had been telling me. Of course I would not tell him; and then he was angry, and said it was true, but it was nothing to be ashamed of, and he had only made a secret of it because he did not want all the tattling fools in the neighbourhood to be gossiping about him, and inventing a hundred tales about his origin."

"And then?"

"And then I believed that other wicked lie!" she says; and goes on to tell me of the great darkness that followed; the utter hopelessness and shipwreck of faith, the shrinking from and abhorrence of Hilton, which had given place to a deep sense of humiliation when she discovered that, although she believed him

CHAPTER XVII. AND LAST.

"No one is so accursed by fate,
No one so utterly desolate,
But some heart, though unknown,
Responds unto his own."—LONGFELLOW.

WELL, it is all settled at last, and I am on my way back to London. We intended to bring Maggie home with us, but her friend, the minister, came with his daughter, and insisted on taking her to Hastings with them for change of air. She wished to see her uncle first, but there was no time for that. Hilton to have been guilty of great baseness, she loved him as much as ever.

All this she tells me in impassioned language, which gathers intensity as she proceeds; until she suddenly recollects that it was all false, and her face dimples over with happy smiles, as she protests that she will not waste another word upon the ugly subject.

Then I ask incredulously whether the mere fact of Hil'on's innocence having been proved has restored her lost faith. And she tells me how she has met with some good minister who has taught her a larger, purer faith: one that stands on a sure foundation, and cannot be shaken by any storms of dogmatical eloquence.

There is an interval of dreamy silence, during which my thoughts dwell on the subject of religion, and Maggie's, apparently, wander in another direction. "Isn't it delicious," she says, with a soft, tender light in her eyes, "to know that however much I love him, it isn't half as much as he deserves?"

and I stayed with her till she left; and, at the last minute, he decided to go too, and stay at an hotel—so I am coming back alone.

Of course we have been very careful not to let her have the least suspicion of her father's guilt. Truth is a grand thing; but we must let no ugly truth mar the beauty of her mental picture of his character. No, let him be to her always the embodiment of all that is best and noblest in the nature of man.

I made careful inquiries of his medical attendant, and found that he had been suffering for years from an incurable disease, and that, although his death had possibly been somewhat accelerated by his sudden journey from London, he could not, in any case, have lived much longer. At first, I felt inclined not to lessen Julia's remorse by telling her of this; but, when I seriously considered the disappointment she had lately undergone, and the effect it would probably have on her rebellious nature, I wrote to her at once, telling her the facts as kindly as I could. I feel that, in her present state of mind, it is absolutely necessary that someone should be in her confidence, and have some little influence over her; and I know that nothing but the greatest kindness can secure this.

Mr. Giffard left a will, in which he bequeathed one-half of his property to his daughter, and the other half to his brother-in-law (Mr. Bloomfield). With the will was a private letter to Mr. Bloomfield, and I was not long in coming to the conclusion that Mr. Giffard wished the money to be given, either openly or secretly, to Hilton, as some compensation for the injury he had done his father. Of course, if the young people marry, there will be no difficulty about that.

After what I have seen lately, I shall never again think Hilton cold-hearted. I believe that, although you may live in the same house with a person for years, and think that you thoroughly understand their character, yet something will unexpectedly occur to show that you have been quite mistaken. If anyone had told me, a month ago, that Hilton had such depths of tenderness in his nature as I have discovered during the last few days, I should have laughed at them. It is a true saying that "Still waters run deep."

When I reach Alma House there is no one at home. Julia is gone on a visit to some friends in the north of England; and Mr. Bloomfield has been obliged to go into the City on business, but he told the servants to expect him back before five o'clock.

It is always dispiriting to find no one to meet you at the end of a journey, and I feel it so now. However, as it is no one's fault, I am not going to make a trouble of it. I busy myself for some time in unpacking, then look into the different rooms to see that they have not been neglected during my absence—how cold and empty they seem—and finally sit down in the dining-room with some work.

However, the work is very uninteresting, and I soon let it fall, and sit staring into the fire, and thinking. Thinking is rather dull work just now: there is nothing for me to hope for, or to worry about. Maggie and Hilton are happy and engrossed in their own affairs, so there is no need for me to interest myself about them; and Julia, with her unruly passions and transient remorse, is no longer here to try my temper or excite my pity. There is nothing left for me to do but just mind my own business. Now that I have time to think of it, it is rather lonely to feel that I belong to nobody, and am nobody's business but my own. I wonder drearly how it will be when I am quite old, and no longer able to make myself useful. Shall I retire to some dingy lodging and linger out my days—neglected and forgotten? The boys are fond of me now, I know—they would not wilfully neglect me; but they will have so many other ties then. I draw very dismal pictures of the future, and feel a great deal of pity for the lonely, neglected old maid.

At five o'clock Mary brings in a little table for tea, and as I look at the two solitary tea-cups, the dreadful truth bursts upon me at last—Alma House can no longer be my home! There is no hope of postponing it any longer. I must go. I must find for myself another home, and live once more amongst noisy, self-willed children, insolent servants, and unsympathetic parents. And these my friends—whose interests I have made my own—will go on just the same without me. Mr. Bloomfield will live with Maggie and Hilton, and I shall be forgotten. Ah! therein lieth the sting of it all! They are kind-hearted people—they won't wish to forget me, I know. They will even invite me to stay with them once or twice, perhaps; but they will make new friends, have new interests, and I shall have gone out of their lives. I shall not be likely, in my own narrow life, to meet with anyone who will supply their places to me; and I shall be nothing to them—nothing but a memory—a fast fading memory. "It is cruel! cruel!" I say. "Why should not I have a little comfort as well as other people!" And then I begin to cry. I have not cried before for years. I always put a strong check upon my tears, because I know, from experience, that when once I give way to them, it is almost impossible to stop. But tears, they say, are a luxury; and if I can have no other luxury, I will at least have that. So I sit and cry, like a great girl.

I am so absorbed in my grief, that Mr. Bloomfield surprises me in the midst of it. I meant to have gone up to my room before he came in, but I do not hear him until he opens the room door, and then it is too late. I am horribly ashamed of myself, but I have sufficient presence of mind to sit up and try to look as if nothing had happened.

He shakes hands with me heartily, says he is delighted to see me home again, and wants to know all the news about Maggie and Hilton. He has so much to say for the first few minutes that he does not observe anything unusual in my manner. But when I begin to answer his questions it is impossible not to notice that my voice quavers and trembles like that of a very old woman. He looks at me in surprise, and I hang down my head sheepishly, and long to run out of the room.

There is an awkward pause, and then he says kindly, "I am afraid you felt lonely to come home and find no one here."

"Oh, I am not so foolish as to mind about that," I reply; and then the tears break forth again, and there is no more hope of concealing them.

"Well, there!" exclaims Mr. Bloomfield in consternation; and then adds eagerly, "It isn't anything about the boys, is it? your brothers, I mean. Because if there is anything I can do, you have only to mention it, and I shall be most glad to smooth over a difficulty, or help to smooth it over."

"No-o, thank you," I say; "the boys are all right."

"Then what on earth is it?" he asks, and begins walking about the room. "You took such an interest in Maggie and Hilton, I thought you'd be delighted to get that matter settled."

My voice is not sufficiently under control to answer.

"What is the matter?" he asks, stopping abruptly in front of me. "Why are you crying like this?"

"Because I am a fool!" I answered, in my utter abandonment giving the only reason that occurs to me.

He resumes his walk, and I watch for an opportunity to escape.

"Aren't you comfortable here?" he asks. "I always thought you liked living here—you said you did!"

"So I do!" I say desperately. "But what is the use of it? I shall have to go away now; you know I shall!"

As he stops short in blank astonishment at this outburst, I make a rush for the door and run up to my own room.

I lock the door, throw myself on my bed and cry. Julia cries like a savage; Maggie, like the little angel that she is; and I, like a fool. I know that I am a fool. I tell myself so, over and over again, but I go on crying as much as ever—more than ever. I am aware all the time that my common-sense will come back to me in the morning, and that I shall feel just the same as if nothing had happened (except for the recollection of that humiliating quarter of an hour); and it is the knowledge of that fact which makes me realise so thoroughly my own folly.

Still I lie on the bed and cry till I can scarcely see; and all the disappointments of my life, and all the unsatisfied longings of my life, take up arms against me, and compel me to go on crying.

After a time I rouse myself to send down a message to Mr. Bloomfield that I have a headache, and wish to be excused for the rest of the evening. Then I go to bed, and indulge in the luxury of making myself thoroughly miserable.

In the grey light of early morning I wake up with an aching head and a vague feeling that something disagreeable (I don't know what) has happened. Then, involuntarily, I take up the train of thought I left unfinished last night, and go over again that scene in the drawing-room, feeling every minute an added intensity of shame at the recollection of my exhibition of weakness and folly. I would give half my worldly possessions (no very large sum) to obliterate from Mr. Bloomfield's mind, and my own, the remembrance of that humiliating quarter of an hour.

I hoped that my common-sense would return to me, and that I should feel like my usual self this morning; but I find that I am not much better than I was last night. At least, I am glad to be awake early, as it will give me time to reason myself into a more sensible frame of mind before I am obliged to meet Mr. Bloomfield at breakfast.

I think of my good health and my many mercies, and ask myself, contemptuously, what I have done that I should expect to have everything made smooth for me, when half the people in the world are groaning under a load of care. Besides, at my age, I ought to have learned more wisdom. I ought to remember that time (the great physician) will reconcile me to this change, as it has to all preceding ones. But, somehow, these thoughts don't seem half as comforting to me as I imagined they should have been to Julia; and when the time comes to get up, I don't feel any more prepared for the ordeal of meeting Mr. Bloomfield than I did at first. If I only felt in anything like my usual spirits, I could go down and make light of the whole affair; but this morning I know that any such attempt would be an utter failure, and, if Mr. Bloomfield should begin to joke me about it, I believe I should behave almost as idiotically again — the tears are so very near the surface.

When Mary comes with my warm water, I am cowardly enough to put off the evil moment by asking her to bring my breakfast up-stairs to me; but directly she is gone I remember that that will only tend to make matters worse, as Mr. Bloomfield will be sure to conclude that there is something serious the matter. So I get up at once and dress myself languidly, intending to go down and countermand the order. I have only just finished dressing when she returns without my breakfast, but with a note directed to me in Mr. Bloomfield's handwriting.

I go to the window and read it through—twice—and the second time my hands are trembling so, and my eyes are so full of tears that I can scarcely see the words. He asks me to be his wife!

He does not write as a young lover would, but in an honest, sensible way which touches me a great deal more. I am not to think that he has taken this step because he saw my distress at the thought of leaving. He decided on it directly the news of Maggie's engagement set him thinking about the fresh arrangements which would have to be made in the future, and he discovered how dreary it would be to him without me. He thinks there may be many reasons which will make me hesitate to accept his offer, and begs me not to decide too hastily, as his happiness depends on my answer.

"Not to decide too hastily!" I laugh softly to myself at the idea.

What! after having made up my mind years ago that I must end my days a solitary old maid! After having schooled myself to go through the world fighting my own battles, bearing my own sorrows, and resolutely keeping all my warmer feelings shut up within my own heart, lest they should be trampled on by careless feet! After all that, I am to take due time to consider whether I will become the wife of the best and noblest-hearted man I ever knew! Truly, it needs a great deal of consideration!

I don't feel in the least hurry to go down. I want to keep still a little while, and try to realise it. How glad the dear boys will be! I believe they always felt vexed that I was obliged to go out into the world alone. I must write and tell them about it to-day—all of them. Poor old Jack! Perhaps I shall be able to help him a little now; if I can do nothing else, I can have some of the children here to spend the holidays. How delightful it will be when Maggie and Hilton come and stay with us; or perhaps they may take a house near, which will be even better!

I am almost ashamed of myself for feeling so young and happy; but how can I help it? To know that at last there is one spot in the world I dare call home! to know that there is one heart in the world in which I hold the first place!

He says, too, that his happiness depends upon me. Why, I never even dreamed of that! I daresay he would have felt lonely when the others were gone. I forgot that he might not have cared, any more than myself, to live in another person's house.

What a glorious morning it is! There is a clear blue sky, just flecked with tiny white clouds; all the trees in the square look a delicate pale green in the sunshine; and a bird, somewhere near, is singing as if he meant to fill the whole air with his song.

I will go down now, and give him my answer.

"I can scarcely see the words."

THE LORD WAITING TO BE GRACIOUS.—II.

BY THE REV. DANIEL MOORE, M.A., CHAPLAIN IN ORDINARY TO THE QUEEN, PREBENDARY OF ST. PAUL'S, AND RURAL DEAN OF PADDINGTON.

"And therefore will the Lord wait, that He may be gracious unto you. . . . blessed are all they that wait for Him."—

ISAIAH XXX. 18.

BLESSED are all they that wait for Him." Such is the last clause of a verse considered in a former paper, and it seems to overlay, with a glow of fresh radiance, a promise which sparkled with the brightness of refined gold before. A God "waiting to be gracious," "resting in His love," commanding the chariots of His providence to stand still: and all this, only that He may have mercy upon us—can assurance be more assured, or can the bowels of the everlasting compassions further go? They can. It shall be seen to be to our own interest, to our present as well as to our lasting happiness—to put ourselves in resolved accord with these slowly maturing plans of our God; to wait with calm trust as long as He shall wait. Be it that we are in danger, and there seems no way of escape; that we are walking in darkness, and can see no rift of light; that the enemy is even at our doors, and yet the expected succours come not. Still we know that God is "waiting;" and He tells us what He is waiting for. Is it too much to ask that, as He waits for us, we should be willing to wait for Him? What, if it can be shown that our patience expedites the arrival of the succours? that, as against all our disquietude and unrest, an increase of strength is obtained by sitting still? and consequently that not more true is that part of the promise which says, "and therefore will the Lord wait, that He may be gracious unto you," than that which, in regard to our own happiness, assures us, "Blessed are all they that wait for Him."

In considering the waiting here spoken of we observe first it is—

I.—THE WAITING OF A PEACEFUL AND ASSURED HEART.

AND this is in fact the chief source of its blessedness also. The waiting believer has no surer ground of peace than is to be found in the repose of faith; in the full assurance that the succours he is waiting for are already on their way. The successions of day and night we know are certain things. The night-sentry, who, from his watch-tower, sees the first streak of dawn, has no doubt about the daylight which is to follow. But a saint of God, waiting for the Lord, says the Psalmist, is more sure of what is coming than the night-watch: "My soul waiteth for the Lord more than they that watch for the morning; I say more than they that watch for the morning."

Still the watchman's ground for confidence in the oncoming day is all one with that which we have for the sure arrival of the promised help from God. He remembers that, as the sun knows the time of his going down, so there is a time ordained for his reappearance in the heavens. All the promises of God, like the prophet's vision, are "for an appointed time." If they tarry or seem to tarry—as the daylight sometimes does—we are to wait for them, as knowing that they will surely come, they will not really tarry, any more than, in the end, the sunlight will fail to force its way through the thick opaque of mist and cloud. Hence our rule, under any apparent delays in the expected appearance of God in our behalf, is that laid down for us by the Psalmist, "Tarry thou the Lord's leisure;" wait confidently upon Him, in a posture of bold and reverent expectation. In the end, the vision will speak, if we do but in patience wait for it; and faith will assuredly reap its harvest, if it faint not.

"If it faint not," and if it move not; that is, if it take no action of its own to accelerate the fulfilment of the Divine promises. This is an essential condition, in order to our realising the repose of true faith. "He that believeth shall not make haste," it is written by the prophet. He must neither imagine difficulties nor make difficulties; neither forcing the door of promise, as Jacob did, by unlawful expedients, nor closing the door against themselves, as the Israelites did, by distrust and unbelief. There are many trials of life under which we can do nothing, and must do nothing. We must wait. We must lie passive in the hands of God. When the Israelites stood on the borders of the Red Sea, with Pi-hahiroth on the one side, and Baal-zephon on the other, they could do nothing. They had only to "stand still and see the salvation of the Lord." And their standing still was salvation. It was strength to them; the resolved calmness of an acquiescing trust; God's silence responded to by man's silence. His time, His will, His way: "Blessed are all they that wait for Him."

II.—IT IS THE WAITING OF THE PATIENCE WHICH BRINGS ITS OWN REWARD.

"BLESSED are they that wait for Him;" for this, if for no other reason—that thereby they get an installment of that which they are waiting for. This is not deliverance from their trial at once, but only relief and support under it, more strength to bear, more grace to resist, new consolations to cheer, and quickened hopes to revive. And all these may be regarded as "waiting" gifts, the very fruit and outcome of a resolved and enduring patience. See how this is brought out by the Apostle in that fifth chapter to the Romans. He is tracing the genesis of the Christian's assured and triumphant hope, having its root in the experience of sanctified trials. Of these the immediate outcome is a submissive posture of the soul to the will of God, a holding still upon God, and resting in Him. "Tribulation worketh patience." But then what does patience do? Is this a barren grace? No; it bears fruit after its kind. It worketh "experience." Experience—seeing that the more we bear, the more we obtain strength to bear. And this experience of what God has done, stimulates, quickens, invigorates the hope of what God will do; till at length, from this one dry tree of patience, this negative grace of doing nothing but only waiting, there are yielded "the peaceable fruits of righteousness to them that are exercised thereby."

All this points to the conclusion that the waiting Christian is the only happy Christian; and that the longer he has to wait for the expected blessing, the surer his hope and the greater his peace will be. He waits in faith of the word of promise. And faith in the Word of God, like the Word itself, cannot return unto Him void. It must bear fruit. We never lose a promise through waiting for a promise. Because, while we are waiting, God gives us something else; the promised good, in fact, in some other form. See this in the case of the saints under the altar. They were waiting for God to fulfil His clearly announced promises, and they cried, "How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost Thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?" But the answer to their petition was, that "white robes" were to be given to them, and that they must "rest for a little season." The white robes of waiting would be better for them than a sight of the blood-stained robes of those who had slain the saints of the Lord.

Learn we then, whenever a promise of God seems to tarry, to ask for the "white robes"—that is, for a waiting spirit, and a loving trust, and a full assurance of hope that all will come right in the end. All these must be self-recompensing and remunerative graces. Their reward is with them. Paul grew strong by the act of waiting for succours for his weakness. The father of the demoniac was having his faith increased all the time he was praying for the removal of his "unbelief." At every fresh repulse of the Canaanitish mother, her faith and love to Christ waxed stronger and stronger; and during those three full weeks while Daniel continued waiting, and fasting, and praying, he was unconsciously training his spiritual faculties for comprehending visions and revelations of the Lord. We never know why promises are withheld, nor even whether, at any given moment, they are being withheld at all. Anyhow, we may always reckon upon an equivalent in the interim of waiting, in increased faith, increased peace, increased strength: "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles, they shall run and not be weary, and they shall walk and not faint." "Blessed are all they that wait for Him."

III.—IT IS THE WAITING FOR GOD HIMSELF, APART FROM THE SUCCOURS WE DESIRE AT HIS HAND.

IN that expression, "wait for HIM," will be found to lie the whole stress of the promised blessing. These Jews were expecting relief under their perplexities and fears. How it should come, when it should come, from what source it should come, they knew not, and must not be over-careful to inquire. And so the prophet reminds them, that if they would realise all the advantages of their waiting, they must wait, not so much for deliverance as for a Deliverer; not for a sight of the succours, but for closer union and fellowship with Him who is to bring the succours. "Blessed are all they that wait for HIM."

Thus understood, the caution of the prophet points to a prevalent source of our disquietude, under the harassing trials of life—namely, that we have not yet found out the soul's true rest, have not grasped the conception that this rest cannot be stayed on events or circumstances—on the issue of this contingency or that, but only on the near and abiding presence of a Divine Personality. God has so constituted man's heart that it shall find its first springs of relief and rest in Himself; and if we will not seek them there, we shall find them in nothing else. Out of Him, away from Him, independent of Him, all the wells we can repair to are found to be dried up.

It is a part of true waiting, therefore, to try to be without carefulness—not to be always running after secondary reliefs, leaning for comfort on this broken reed or that; always disappointed of our hope, and not knowing which way to turn or look. Our Heavenly Father knows the unsatisfyingness of these human dependencies—how they slip from us and fail us when we most need them—and so, in lieu of them all, and as a relief surer and better than them all, He has given us Himself. And hope in Him, and trust in Him, and rest in Him will be a strong stay to us, when nothing else will. We have a grand picture of this form of trust in God as the one sufficient substitute for our losses, and the one supporting stay under our burdens, in that majestic declaration of the prophet Habakkuk, who, after contemplating wreck upon wreck, and ruin upon ruin, and breach upon breach, finds that he has all things in God. Oh! yes, he declares, fig-tree and vines, olive-yards and fields, fold and stalls, these may fail every one, "yet will I rejoice in the Lord, and joy in the God of my salvation." Rejoice in the Lord, observe—not in His gifts, but in Himself, in the persuasion of His all-abounding goodness, in the sense of His near presence, in the assurance that He will be Himself far more to us than all He may suffer to be taken away. "In His favour is life, and His loving-kindness is better than life itself," better than the blossoms on the fig-tree, better than the fruitfulness of the olive, better than the clusters of the vine. "Lord, whom have I in heaven but Thee, and there is none upon earth that I desire beside Thee." "The Lord is the portion of my inheritance." How could I desire a better? "Blessed are all they that wait for Him."

Wherefore, in all our troubles and adversities, whenever they oppress us, let us act upon that golden rule of the Psalms, "Rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for Him." There is the marrow of a thousand sermons in those two words, "rest" and "wait." Rest in what God is. Wait for what God will do. Rest—for the bane of our life's happiness is unrest, the inability to hold ourselves still upon God and His promises. Something has gone wrong with us. Our desires are crossed, our plans have failed, we are thrown out of our calculations in regard to what we might most reasonably have expected, and all the winds of life seem to be blowing contrary. And we are restless, torturing ourselves night and day with devising fresh expedients for relief. But all to no purpose. The thoughts are vain, and worse than vain. They drive sleep from our eyelids; they banish peace from the heart; worse than all, they turn into deadness and unprofitableness all our wonted exercises of faith and prayer. At such times, there is nothing for us but a resolute and enforced rest, a calm looking-out on what the Lord is doing for us, and just biding the
